OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

No Change of the Sabbath on Account of the Resurrection of Christ, or His subsequent Appearances to His Disciples.

We have already pointed to the accordance between the circumstances of the Resurrection of Christ, as the First-Fruits from the dead, and those attending the offering of that which prefigured it. And we have suggested, that as in the typical feast the first-fruits were waved before the Lord, in the presence of the people, to be accepted for them, so may we perceive in those occasional appearances of Christ to His disciples, after His resurrection, its fulfillment and true import. And as, in the type, this waving neither made nor interfered with the weekly Sabbath, so might we conclude, that neither would the appearances of Christ occasion any such change. And, accordingly, in the history of the event given in the New Testament, there is no intimation that this was either designed or effected. But we are often told, notwithstanding, that Christ, after His resurrection, met His disciples upon the first day of the week, and this having been assumed, it has thence been inferred, that our Lord designed that day to be observed afterwards as the weekly Sabbath. Desiring the most careful examination of whatever may seem in any degree to favor the alledged change, we may still, therefore, examine the Scriptural account of such appearances or meetings, and thus ascertain whether any countenance be there given to that opinion.

The Evangelists, narrating the first of these appearances, (1 Cor. xv. 4, 8, 20, 22,) state that the women, after the vision of the angels on the morning of the resurrection, departed quickly from the sepulchre, with fear and great joy, and did run to bring His disciples word. And as they went to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus met them, saying, All hail. And they came and held Him by the feet, and worshiped Him. Then said Jesus unto them, Be not afraid; go, tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me.” Matt. xxviii. 8, 10.

If, indeed, the resurrection of Christ was upon the first day of the week, there can be no doubt that this appearance was upon that day, seeing that the circumstances here related took place immediately after His resurrection. Bnt it is not less obvious, that the Saviour, in what He utters, makes no reference, either to any change of the Sabbath, or to this as the reason of his appearing to these female disciples, to intimate or to confirm it. Neither His resurrection, nor this His appearance, is stated by Himself, nor by the Evangelist afterwards on narrating the circumstance, as a reason for affecting, in any way, the divine command of His Father's laws, or of there being any connection between the one and the other. Who, then, has now any warrant so to do?

After this, we are informed that two of the disciples “went that same day to a village called Emmaus, which was from Jerusalem about three-score furlongs. And they talked together of all these things which had happened. And it came to pass, that while they communed together and reasoned, Jesus Himself drew near, and went with them. But their eyes were holden that they should not know Him; and He said unto them, What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another, as ye walk and are sad? And one of them, whose name was Cleopas, answering, said unto Him, Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things which are come to pass there in those days? And He said unto them, What things? And they said unto Him, Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, which was a prophet, mighty in deed and word before God and all the people; and how the chief priests and our rulers delivered Him to be condemned to death, and have crucified Him. But we trusted that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel; and beside all this, to-day is the third day since these things were done. Yea, and certain women also of our company made us astonished, which were early at the sepulchre; and, when they found not His body, they came saying that they had also seen a vision of angels, which said that He was alive. And certain of them which were with us went to the sepulchre, and found it even so as the women had said; but Him they saw not. Then He said unto them, O, fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken! Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into His glory; and, beginning at Moses, and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself. And they drew nigh unto the village whither they went; and He made as though He would have gone farther. But they constrained Him, saying, Abide with us; for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent; and He went in to tarry with them. And it came to pass, as He sat at meat with them, He took bread and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them. And their eyes were opened, and they knew Him, and He vanished out of their sight. And they said one to another, Did not our heart burn within us while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures.” Luke xxiv. 13—32.

This was both an interesting and important interview; but still we discover, in the detailed account of it, nothing to give the slightest countenance to the supposed change of the Sabbath. The declaration of that change is not to be found in Moses, nor in the prophets, nor “in all the Scriptures” which Jesus “expounded,” nor yet in the words of the Evangelist who thus records for our learning the topics of discourse. Is not the fact that such a change of the Sabbath is supposed to have here the Saviour's sanction, evidence distinct that His people are still “slow of heart to believe” all and only the Scriptures?

But when so much importance is attached to our Lord's thus appearing to His disciples, not as the fulfillment of the type of the waving of the first-fruits, but as is imagined to mark the newly-acquired sanctity of the first day of the week, it may be proper to notice how little there still appears to be of the consideration of this being the Sabbath in the minds of these disciples. They went without scruple, “that same day, to a village called Emmaus, which was from Jerusalem about three-score furlongs,” nearly seven miles distance. This journey is not alledged to have been for any religious, or absolutely necessary purpose; yet in no way are they reproved by the Saviour. We are given no reason, from what took place at this interview, to imagine, that the Sabbath was changed; and as little can this be inferred from what took place on the discovery that the fellow-traveler of these disciples was Himself their Lord. It was “toward evening,” and the day “far spent” before they reached Emmaus; there they remained some time, for they proposed to abide in the village, and they partook of food together; yet, so soon as their eyes were opened to the glorious truth of His resurrection from the dead, “they rose up the same hour and returned to Jerusalem,” nearly seven miles more, therefore, “and found the eleven gathered together, and them which were with them, saying, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon. And they told what things were done in the way, and how He was known of them in breaking of bread.” Ver. 33—35. Considering their feelings as Jews, and remembering the case of the female disciples who rested from their work of annointing the body of their Lord on the Sabbath day, we can scarcely suppose they would have traveled thus, if they had regarded this as the Sabbath. There is no new revelation on the subject imparted to them; no reproof expressed by Him who is Lord of the Sabbath, of their having secularized a day that was now to be kept sacred; neither is there explanation or apology offered for them by the Evangelist, on the score of ignorance of what they afterwards better understood.

The resurrection was now past, and if the Sabbath had been, on that account, changed, the disciples were still evidently ignorant of this. An excellent opportunity is afforded the Saviour of instructing His traveling companions, His sincere and loving friends, of the glory which in this new form He was to receive—that henceforth the Sabbath is to be changed to this, the day of His resurrection, in commemoration of that event. But instead of this new revelation, “the Scriptures,” as before, are the foundation of His instructions. They are rebuked as “slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken.” “Beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures, the things concerning Himself.” And these disciples recall afterwards with delight how He opened to them the Scriptures! In all this, while we find nothing of a new Sabbath, we hear the Saviour himself, after His resurrection, and on the very day of it, commending to our reverent observance, the Original Sabbath as still unchanged, seeing it occupies so prominent a place in those Old Testament Scriptures, of which “Moses and all the prophets” were the penmen, and which thus “He expounded unto them.”

Proceeding in our examination of our Lord's “appearances,” the Evangelist narrates that while these two disciples were stating to the brethren in Jerusalem what had occurred to them in their journey, “Jesus himself stood in the midst of them, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. But they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit. And He said unto them, Why are ye troubled? And why do thoughts arise in your hearts? Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have. And when He had thus spoken, He showed them His hands and His feet. And while they yet believed not for joy, and wondered, He said unto them, Have ye here any meat? And they gave Him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honey-comb. And He took it, and did eat before them. And He said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me. Then opened He their understandings that they might understand the Scriptures, and said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name, among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. And ye are witnesses of these things.” Luke xxiv. 36—48.

We may also quote the account given by John of this meeting: “The same day at evening, being the first day of the week, (mia ton Sabbaton,) when the doors were shut where the disciples were assembled, for fear of the Jews, came Jesus and stood in the midst, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. And, when He had so said, He showed unto them His hands and His side. Then were the disciples glad, when they saw the Lord. Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you; as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. And when He had said thus, He breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whosoever's sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever's sins ye retain, they are retained. But Thomas, one of the twelve, called Didymus, was not with them when Jesus came. The other disciples therefore said unto him, We have seen the Lord. But he said unto them, Except I shall see in His hands the prints of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into His side, I will not believe.” John xx. 19—25.

We consider it unnecessary to speak farther at present of the mistranslation “first day of the week;” but it is interesting to notice how both the Evangelists renewedly record evidence of the greatest care on the part of the Redeemer that the understanding of His disciples should be opened to the meaning of the Scriptures concerning Himself; showing unto them also, according to Luke, from the written word, that He “must rise from the dead the third day,” but still saying nothing of what so many of His disciples have since said, in regard to the sanctification of the first day of the week. Moses, the prophets, and the sweet singer of Israel, had all foretold His character and His work; and to their words He therefore directs the attention of His disciples, expounding the meaning of the Scriptures concerning Himself. On the ground of what these Scriptures testified, “it behoved Christ to suffer;” but not only so—on the same authority, it behoved that He should “rise from the dead the third day.” Nothing here of the first day of the week! “The law of Moses,” in the “first-fruits,” not only foreshadowed His resurrection, but by its relation to the passover, pre-intimated that He should “rise from the dead the third day.” Thus, instead of authority for the change of the Sabbath, our proof of the contrary accumulates. The repeated intimation of our Lord on the occasion of His appearing to his disciples, instead of giving any new revelation concerning the first day of the week, thus recurs to the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament, opening the understandings of His disciples, simply, to the perception of their meaning. We are therefore fairly entitled to conclude, that the Sabbath of the Lord, which in those Scriptures we are called to “remember,” was still designed to occupy its wonted place.

It is also manifest, (if this was the first day of the week,) that the disciples, up to this period, had not received the notions which now prevail regarding the sanctity of that day because of there surrection of the Saviour. On this occasion they had not come together in consequence of their expectation that Jesus would meet them. They were not all even aware that He had risen from the dead—many, probably, had not yet heard the rumor, and few of them had seen the risen Saviour—and those who now saw Him, instead of hailing His appearance as the fulfillment of the object of their meeting, nay, instead of their a[illegible]knowledging with joy His resurrection at [illegible] were terrified, “and supposed that they had seen a spirit.” Thomas, rejecting even [illegible] testimony of the other disciples, who had been favored with an earlier meeting than himself, refused altogether to believe that it was so.

We have, however, another remark to make on the particular appearance of Christ, the account of which we have now quoted. The interview it records between the Lord and His disciples, if not altogether, must have been in a great measure, on the day following His resurrection. Consequently, if He arose upon the first day of the week, we shall thus have the second day also consecrated, if His appearances are to be regarded as evidence of a sanctified day. In the preceding interview with the two disciples who journied to Emmaus, we are told expressly, that they urged the Saviour to tarry with them at Emmaus, because it was toward evening, and the day was far spent. Now, after this, they partook of meat at the village, over which Christ gave thanks, before they rose up to return to Jerusalem. Although we doubt not they returned with greater speed than they went, still the distance was, as already said, nearly seven miles. Even Gresswell supposes “they would rejoin the apostles about the first hour of the night;” and, if so, this second meeting was not until the evening of a new day had thrown its shades around them; and in this meeting of the apostles and brethren, the two disciples narrated all the circumstances; “they told what things were done in the way, and how He was known of them in the breaki[illegible] bread,” before the Saviour himself app[illegible] Although, then, the meeting had comme[illegible] “the same day,” yet, as we are told, i[illegible] “at evening,” ere our Lord stood in the midst of them, from the circumstances shown to have taken place, by continuance, it must have th[illegible] been on the ensuing day also; for, it is to be borne in mind, as we have already proved, that both according to Scripture reckoning, and among the Jews, the day began with the evening. So soon as the sun set, a new day commenced, which would be a different day from that on which He arose from the dead, and on which He was seen by the women. Although His appearance to the two disciples had been on the first day of the week, therefore, this renewed appearance to the eleven and the other disciples, were so prolonged, would be on the second day as well as the first. If, then, these appearances constitute a reason for changing the Sabbath, and if they furnish evidence of this, it may be found thus to apply to other days beside the first, were there even more unquestionable evidence in avor of His having appeared that day than here is.

REVIVALS IN SUMMER.

It is sometimes thought that a revival cannot be reasonably expected to commence or to be continued in our churches during the summer months. There are facts, however, which show that this opinion is not well founded.

In a country church, a number of years ago, where the people, for the most part, were accustomed to spend the intermission between the morning and afternoon services of the Sabbath at the meeting-house, a few Christians at the commencement of the summer season procured a room near by, where they agreed to spend this time in strictly religious conversation. No mention was to be made of secular matters, the world was to be excluded as far as possible, and topics concerning vital experimental religion were to have exclusive attention. All persons wishing to listen or to engage in such conversation were invited to attend. At the first meeting a few church members only were present; but they made the interview pleasant and spiritually pro[illegible]e. Others soon joined them, and the conve[illegible] became more and more deeply inte[illegible] and the people of God felt it good to b[illegible]. The curiosity of the impenitent was excited, and a few of them at first gathered around the open door. On succeeding Sabbaths they gathered in larger numbers, and becoming more interested, they entered the room, and were soon willing, not only to listen to the conversation of Christians, but to engage in it themselves, by inquiring what they should do to be saved, and in a short time to tell of a work of grace in their own hearts. During the summer months the meeting continued, and was occupied in a great measures in speaking and hearing of the grace of God in new cases of conversion; and at the close of the season, when the ripened fruits of the earth were gathered into barns, the church had gathered within its fold in large numbers the precious fruits of the outpouring of God's spirit. THE HOURS.

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

The hours are viewless angels,
And still go gliding by,
And bear each moment's record up
To Him who sits on high.

The poison on the nectar,
Our heart's deep flower cups yield,
A sample still they gather swift,
And leave us in the field.

And some fly by on pinions
Of gorgeous gold and blue,
And some fly on with drooping wing
Of sorrow's darker hue.

And as we speed each minute,
That God to us hath given,
The deeds are known before His throne—
The tale is told in heaven.

And we who talk among them,
As one by one departs,
Think not that they are hovering
Forever round our hearts.

Like summer bees that hover
Around the idle flowers,
They gather every act and thought,
These viewless angel hours.

And still they steal the record,
And bare it far away;
This mission flight, by day or night,
No magic power can stay.

So teach me, Heavenly Father,
To spend each flying hour.
That as they go, they may not show
My heart a poison flower.

THE DRUNKARD'S BIBLE.

“Mr. President,” said a short, stout man, with a good-humored countenance, and a florid complexion, rising, as the last speaker took his seat, “I have been a grog-seller.”

At this announcement, there was a movement through the whole room, and an expression of increased interest.

“Yes, Mr. President,” he went on, “I have been a grog-seller, and many a glass I have sold to you, and to the Secretary there, and to a dozen of others that I see here”—glancing around upon the company.

“That's a fact,” broke in the President, “many a gin-toddy and brandy-punch have I taken at your bar. But times are changed now, and we have begun to carry the war into the enemy's camp. And our war has not been altogether unsuccessful, for we have taken prisoner one of the rumsellers' bravest Generals! But, go on, friend W——, let us have your experience.”

“As to my experience, Mr. President,” the ex-bar-keeper resumed, “in rum-selling and drinking, for I have done a great deal of both in my time, that would be rather too long to tell to-night—and one that I would much rather forget than relate. It makes me tremble and sick at heart, whenever I look back upon the evil I have done. I, therefore, usually look ahead with the hope of doing some good to my fellow-men.

But there is one incident I will relate. For the last five years, a hard-working mechanic, with a wife and seven small children, came regularly, almost every night, to my place, and spent the evening in my bar-room. He came to drink, of course, and many a dollar of his hard earnings went into my till. At last he became a perfect sot—working scarcely one-fourth of the time, and spending all he earned in liquor. His poor wife had to take in washing to support herself and children, while he spent his time, and the little he could earn, at my bar. But his appetite for liquor was so strong, that his week's earnings were usually gone by Tuesday or Wednesday, and then I had to chalk up a score against him, to be paid off when Saturday night came.

This score gradually increased, until it amounted to three or four dollars over his Saturday night's pay, when I refused to sell him any more liquor until it was settled. On the day after I had thus refused him, he came in with a neat mourning breast-pin, enclosing some hair, I thought, of a deceased relative. This he offered in payment for what he owed. I accepted it, for the pin I saw at once was worth double the amount of my bill. I did not think, nor indeed care, about the question, whether he was the owner or not; I wanted my own, and in my selfish eagerness to get it, I hesitated not to take a little more than my own.

I laid the breast-pin away, and all things went on smoothly for a while. But he gradually got behind hand again, and again I cut off his supply of liquor. This time he brought me a a pair of brass andirons, and a pair of brass candlesticks, and I took them, and wiped off the score against him. At last he brought a large family Bible, and I took that too—thinking, no doubt, I could sell it for something.

On the Sunday afterwards, having nothing to do, for I used to shut my bar on Sundays, thinking it was not respectable to sell liquor, I opened this poor drunkard's family Bible, scarcely thinking of what I was doing. The first place I turned to was the family record. There it was stated that, upon a certain day, he had been married to Emily ——. I had known Emily ——, when I was a young man, very well, and had once thought seriously of offering myself to her in marriage. I remembered her happy young face, and seemed suddenly to hear a tone of her merry laughter.

‘Poor creature!’ I sighed involuntarily, as a thought of her present condition crossed my mind—and then with no pleasant feelings, I turned over another leaf. There was the record of the birth of her four children; the last had been recently, and was in the mother's hand.

I never had such strange feelings as now came over me. I felt that I had no business with this book; but I tried to stifle my feelings, and turned over several leaves quickly. As I suffered my eyes to rest upon an open page, these words arrested my attention:—

‘Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; whoso is deceived thereby is not wise.’

This was just the subject that, under the feelings I then had, I wished to avoid, and so I referred to another place. There I read—

‘Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow? Who hath wounds? Who hath babbling? Who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine. At last it biteth like a serpent, it stingeth like an adder.’

I felt like throwing the book from me; but once more I turned the leaves, and my eyes rested upon these words—

‘Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink; that puttest thy bottle to him and makest him drunk.’

I closed the book suddenly, and threw it down. Then, for half an hour, I paced the room. It was about nine o'clock, I think, on the samo evening, that I opened the drunkard's Bible again, with a kind of despairing hope that I should meet there with some thing to direct me.

I opened at the Psalms, and read two or three chapters. As I read on, without finding anything directly to my case, I felt an increasing desire to abandon my calling, because it was injurious to my fellow-men.

After I had read the Bible, I retired to bed, but could not sleep. I am sure that during that night I thought of every drunken man to whom I had sold liquor, and of all their beggared families. In the brief sleep that I obtained, I dreamed that I saw a long line of tottering drunkards with their wives and children in rags. And a loud voice said—

‘Who hath done this?’

The answer, in a still louder voice, directly I felt to me, smote upon my ear like a peal of thunder—

‘Thou art the man!’

From this troubled slumber I awoke to sleep no more that night. In the morning the last and most powerful conflict came. The question to be decided, was—

‘Shall I open my bar, or at once abandon the dreadful traffic in liquid poison?’

Happily, I decided never to put to any man's lips the cup of confusion. My next step was to turn the spicket of every keg or barrel of spirits, wine, beer, or cider, and let the contents escape on the floor. My bottles and decanters were likewise emptied. Then I came and signed your Total Abstinence Pledge; and what is better, never rested until I had persuaded the man whose Bible had been of so much use to me, to sign the Pledge likewise.

And now, Mr. President, I am keeping a temperance grocery, and am making restitution as fast as possible. There are at least half a dozen families, to whom I furnish a a small quantity of groceries every week, in many cases equal to the amount that used to be spent at my bar for liquor. Four of my oldest and best customers have already signed the pledge by my persuasion, and I am not going to rest until every man I helped to ruin, is restored to himself, his family, and society.”

THE BIBLE IN IRELAND.

The 48th annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society was recently held in London, when the Earl of Roden, President of the Hibernian Bible Society, delivered an address, in which he described, from his own observations, “the wonderful manifestation of God's blessing in the dissemination and reception of his holy Word in Ireland.” We copy from the Independent a part of his remarks:—

“Hearing that a very great change had taken place in the Roman Catholic mind in various parts of the country—and I will confess, being very skeptical as to the extent of that change, and as to the nature of those circumstances to which I refer—I determined, when an opportunity should enable me, to visit those localities and see really what the effect of God's Word—for it was nothing else, the effect of that book which you distribute—had been upon the minds of thousands of my Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. With this determination in my mind, in the month of September last I visited the western parts of Ireland, where these great events are taking place, so that whole sites of the country had come over out of the Church of Rome, and, through the medium of the Scriptures, had been led to join the Protestant Church. I went, therefore, in the first instance, to the west of Galway; from thence I proceeded to visit the various missionary stations, some under the Irish Church Missionary Society, some under the Irish Society, some under the Coast Society, some under the Reformation Society, and some under the Presbyterian Church Society, but all of them working together for the same object; all of them imbued with the same harmony, and no kind of attempt to meddle one with the other, except to give each other all the assistance they can in the great work in which they are all engaged. There was a feeling which I cannot attempt to describe among the ministers and people whom I visited. My Lord, I could not but say, after visiting several of those Roman Catholic counties, that the half was not told me. I could not attempt to impress upon the minds of those to whom I spoke on the subject the important work that was going on; for, having been so skeptical myself, I could not help thinking, that those who had not seen it must be equally skeptical with me. But I implored them, when I spoke to them of what I saw and heard, that they would go for themselves and see what was going on, and they would then be able to bear the testimony which I am enabled to bear before this vast assembly to-day.”

The noble lord had visited and examined schools both of children and adults, composed of converts from Rome.

“Nothing could be more satisfactory than their reasons, which they gave us, upon inquiry, why they left the Church of Rome. It is very remarkable, that all their arguments and answers were derived only from that blessed book which it is your object to disseminate. Go where you will among the schools—go where you will among the teachers—the cost of that book is not to be told. They will thank you for no other book—they will take no other book—they will read no other book—and I may say to any of my dear friends whom I am addressing, whose interest I know is great with respect to the work that is going on in Ireland, and who are anxious to send the Irish what they think will be likely to forward that work—I implore you not to send any other books.”

The converts are nicknamed “jumpers,” and some of them suffer savage treatment and cruel persecution from the Roman Catholics. A convert much desired the establishment of a school, but a place could not be obtained. He offered part of his own house, and the school was formed.

“In the course of a few months after this transaction, the poor man was visited by banditti at night—men with their faces blackened and with arms in their hands. He was drawn out of his bed; he was dreadfully beaten; two of his ribs were broken, and a great piece of his ear cut off. Having heard of this circumstance, I said nothing could make me believe it but seeing it. So I went to the man, and saw the place where his ear had been cut off; he showed me where his ribs had been broken, and he told me the whole story. The ruffians told him that if he did not immediately take away his kitchen from the use of his school, they would come back again, and he would fare worse. However, this man, notwithstanding this treatment, continued his kitchen for the use of the school, till the bishop built a school-house himself, which is now filled with children.”

In the same neighborhood, a laborious clergyman had three shots fired into his bedroom. The noble lord added the following truly horrible account of an attack upon a poor woman and her family, her offense being that she had listened to Scripture readers, and had received the truth:—

“She told me—for I went to see her myself—that they set fire to the straw on which the children were lying; but they soon afterwards put it out, fearing, as she supposed, that the light of the fire would discover who they were. But, however that might have been, she was pulled out of her house, dragged by the hair, and very unmercifully beaten. They wished her to promise that she would not go any more to the bishop's church, but so far from doing so, every Sunday from that period, up to the time that I visited her, she walked with two of her children four miles to attend the service. My lord, when I saw this poor woman sitting at the end of the school-room, I went up to her, ‘I am afraid you are suffering very much from the persecution that is going on, on account of your conscience.’ ‘Ah! yes, sir,’ said she, ‘I am suffering, and no one can tell what my sufferings are. I am afraid that I shall be murdered this winter, if there is not a police established within the neighborhood in which I live; for when they visited me they told me that if I did not give up going to the Protestant church I should be visited again, and it would be worse with me than it is now. ‘Ever since that period,’ she added, ‘up to the present day, I have never slept in my house at night—but when night falls I take my children out of my house, and we go to the back of the ditch, where we remain all night till the morning comes, when we return again to the house.’ She then added, ‘This I can do in the summer; but now the winter is coming, what am I to do?’ I really felt almost unable to answer. I said to her, ‘Well, my good woman, He in whom you trust, and for whose cause you are suffering these things, is able to protect you and to preserve you in the midst of the greatest foes.’ ‘Ah!’ said she, ‘sir, I know that, but God has often allowed many of his most devoted servants to be put to death, and I am not prepared to leave my children behind me.’ Really I could say no more to this poor woman; but I could not help thinking what a wonderful manifestation this was of that species of civil and religious liberty which the demagogues of Popery boast so much about.”

GETHSEMANE.

Lieut. Lynch, of the U. S. Exploring Expedition to the River Jordan and the Red Sea, in 1849, visited the garden of Gethsemane, about the middle of May. He says:

“The clover upon the ground was in bloom, and altogether the garden, in its aspects and associations, was better calculated than any place I know, to soothe a troubled spirit. Eight venerable trees, isolated from the smaller and less imposing ones which skirt the pass of the Mount of Olives, form a consecrated grove. High above, on either hand, towers a very lofty mountain, with the deep, yawning chasm of Jehosaphat between them. Crowning one of them is Jerusalem, a living city; on the slope of the other is the great Jewish cemetery, a city of the dead.

“Each tree in this grove, cankered and gnarled, and furrowed by age, yet beautiful and impressive in its decay, is a living monument of the affecting scenes that have taken place beneath and around it. The olive perpetuates itself, and from the root of the dying parent stem, the young tree springs into existence. These are accounted one thousand years old. Under those of the preceding growth, therefore, the Saviour was wont to rest; and one of the present may mark the very spot where he knelt and prayed and wept. No caviling doubt can find entrance here. The geographical boundaries are too distinct and clear for an instant's hesitation. Here, the Christian, forgetful of the present, and absorbed in the past, can resign himself to sad, yet soothing meditation. The few purple and crimson flowers, growing about the roots of the trees, will give ample food for contemplation—for they tell of the suffering and the ensanguined death of the Redeemer.”

ASSOCIATIONAL POWER.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

It is not "the Elder Greene affair" that inclines me to write; though I have not the least apprehension of danger in mentioning it, when it becomes necessary in the attempt to ascertain the true principles of conducting the business of our religious convocations, or Associations; and that is the object I had in view when I mentioned it in connection with your article of May 27th, and the action of the Association on the Richmond case. The action taken directly on that case, I think, was right, and ought to have been taken a year ago, when the subject was up. But between the actual course taken by the Association in that matter, and the principle involved in their refusal to adopt the proposed amendment to their constitution, I think there is serious contradiction or disagreement. Your article in question I understand to affirm the same doctrine that the Association did in rejecting the amendment in question. From this you will gather, that I understand that you and the Association affirm one principle, and at the same time act another. Let me show you how this is.

The Association at Berlin, a year ago, did exercise jurisdiction directly over the pastor of the Richmond Church, and withdrew the hand of fellowship from him. That act must have been an exercise of jurisdiction directly over the minister; for the church opposed it from first to last, and was not excluded with their pastor, but declared to be in standing. Now, if I can understand you and the Association, you and they hold, that the Association has no right to exercise any jurisdiction directly over the minister of any church. You say, "It is not competent for the Association to exercise jurisdiction directly over the ministers of any of the churches." This is a very mild form of stating this doctrine, held and otherwise variously expressed by you and the Association. But it is as clear as words can make it, that it declares the act of the Association, in excluding Elder Greene at Berlin last year, to be wrong and unjust, as an improper assumption of jurisdiction or power by the Association over the minister of that church. The Richmond Church and Elder Greene took the very same ground, from the beginning of the investigation of the case by the Council sent by the Association to take the matter in hand, and continued to protest against the action of the Association and its Council touching the subject from first to last. And when the Association had excluded their pastor, they resolved to withdraw from that body on account of the wrong which they held had been done them by the same. Accordingly, in their letter to the Association last month, they informed that body of their resolution, and of the reasons of their so doing, alledging the treatment they had been subjected to by the Association, in the case of their minister, as the principal thing they had to complain of. Now, as the thing complained of by the Richmond Church was not only affirmed to be wrong by you a year ago, but also settled and determined to be wrong by an act of the Association last month, before the letter of the Richmond Church was acted upon, why, I ask, did the Association drop the church as if it had been wrong, and the Association right all the while, when, according to the views of both, the fact was directly the reverse—the Association had been wrong and the church right from first to last? Suppose the church asked no favors of the Association; and suppose they had a perfect right to withdraw at any time, or for any cause, as they pleased, could that release the Association from obligation to the principle of justice to the church, or to itself? How, I ask, could the Association do any thing else, in justice to itself or the Richmond Church, than to rescind the act of last year's session, by which Elder Greene was excommunicated, when they had become convinced, and had declared by their own act, that it was wrong? If the Association had rescinded the act in question, and thus conformed its doings to its principles, the church would have been perfectly satisfied, without doubt, and been glad to remain in the Association. That they asked no favors of that body, in their letter, I think is not a correct representation. I think their letter signified unequivocally, that they wished the Association to relieve them from the effects of its oppressive acts, as they regarded them. But whether the church asked any favors of the Association or not, it could not affect the duty and obligation of the Association to the church, and its own principles, a single hair's breadth. And for the Association to drop the church under the circumstances, whether in compliance with or in opposition to the wishes of the church, looks like an attempt to cover one act of injustice by the perpetration of another of the same character. I do not say such was the case, but that they exposed themselves to such a charge, because their course has that appearance.

I do not believe the doctrine that a church has a right to withdraw from an Association into which it has been received as a member, under a constitution declaring the object to be the promotion of piety, without rendering an account to the Association why they do thus, or that such Association can meet the claims of Christian duty if it concedes to such a proposition, and allows a church to become dismembered from it, without looking into the case, and trying to remove the cause which produces a disposition to separate. I understand that the basis on which churches are associated is the same as that on which individuals are united in the church; and that, as by the act of association churches give, to each other countenance as such, in fellowship with themselves, and consequently receive and give countenance to their respective ministers as such, at large; therefore, I understand that whenever the conduct of a church or a minister in the Association becomes such as, in the opinion of any of those churches, is unworthy of their position, such churches or ministers (if complained of by a church in the Association to that body) must be amenable, or accountable, to that Association, in just that respect and character in which they are recognized by the body. If it be practicable to reach the case of a minister through the church, that probably would be the best way. But whether it be practicable to dispose of the matter in that way or not, I maintain that the nature of Christian solicitude for the good of the cause, the duty of Christian watch-care for each other's good, and the nature and avowed objects of the compact, admit of no construction of church rights, independence, exclusive, absolute, or supreme authority, which can prevent the Association from investigating, judging, and freeing itself from any churches, or ministers, separately or conjointly, when it finds that as such they walk unworthily. I mean to say, that the Association has that right absolutely, and that it is just as much invested with authority, in the nature of things, to determine as to what relations it will hold, and whether it will countenance any church or minister as holding the place and privileges belonging to such, in its body, or not, as the church, or any other organization, has to determine what shall enter into its composition.

And that this is the true view of this subject, after all the ultra grounds which have been taken, and so far theoretically adopted by individuals and the Association, I wish, as in proof the same, to call attention to the fact, that while those sentiments have been spread, not only those who did not adopt them, but those who did, and the Association which took the same position recently, have as a whole continued to go right on, first cutting a minister off, and next the church, just as if they had a right to do so. I believe they had. But what I complain of is, that numbers of brethren, latterly, and even the Association have in theory and words, publicly taken ground with the excluded parties, against themselves; thus, in a great measure, neutralizing the utility of a practically correct course by exhibiting an unaccountable inconsistency between their words and actions. LUCIUS CRANDALL.

Remarks.

We are in no wise concerned with the foregoing strictures upon the Association's manner of conducting its business, farther than to uphold the great gospel principle of the independency of every church in matters of discipline; and by independency we mean the right of the church to be exempt from any and every sort of interference with its discipline by Association, Conference, Convention, Synod, or any other organization whatever. We say 'any and every sort of interference;' meaning, however, that kind of interference which assumes to lay the church under obligation to obey. As for advice merely, we admit the right of an Association to give it. It is equally the right of any individual friend of Zion. But we maintain, also, the right of the church to receive or reject that advice, according as it may think best.

Whether, in this, we express the views of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, we shall not positively say; but if we are not mistaken, they are the views which many of our most worthy and influential brethren have always advocated. It is quite strongly impressed upon our mind, that such views have been substantially embodied in the written Constitutions of our several Associations and General Conference; and, so far as the Eastern Association is concerned, its Constitution declares expressly, that it "shall exercise no ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the churches of which it is composed, but shall recognize each one as having a gospel right to manage its own concerns in all matters of discipline, without being amenable to any other body." It also expressly declares, that the power of the Association to engage in missionary and tract operations, and in the cause of ministerial and general education, shall be only upon such plan as shall not interfere with the independence of the churches. (See Art 11th.) Indeed, if it is possible, by any form of words, to guaranty the independence of the churches, it is done by the Constitution of the Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association.

As to the consistency of the course pursued by the Association in the case of Elder Greene and the Richmond Church, we do not care to say much. It would not conflict with the purpose which the writer of these remarks has in view, to leave the discussion of that matter entirely with Bro. Crandall. The remarks, which have called forth his srictures, were not penned with any view of vindicating the manner in which the Association traversed that difficulty; and if investigation shall prove that [illegible] Association is obnoxious to the charge which he has brought against it, we hope that a rigid adherence to the principle implied in its refusal to adopt the proposed amendment of the first article of its Constitution, will secure it against any such charge hereafter. As the Constitution now stands, this principle is a cardinal one; and, but for the over-acted zeal, which succeeded, for a time, in prostrating it by means of a resolution declaring that "it is consistent with a just construction of our Constitution to hold that ministers belonging to the churches which compose this Association, are amenable to it for any conduct which involves their character as ministers," there would now be no just cause of complaint on the part of our correspondent.

The idea that "the basis on which churches are associated is the same as that on which individuals are united in the church," is one to which we must take a little exception. Individuals are united in church fellowship, in obedience to a requisition from the Lord Jesus Christ. The church is a divine institution, and though the believer's act of connecting himself with it is a voluntary act, it is not optional with him, whether to do it or not. He cannot refuse to do it, without sinning against Christ. For the same reason, he has no right to withdraw from the church, when once connected. But where is the requisition of Jesus Christ to organize an Association of churches? What claim has an Association to be called a divine institution? We should like to see the scriptural authority for such an organization. In our opinion, it is an organization of mere expediency: and if expediency is the basis on which churches are associated together, expediency will justify a church, or any number of churches, in withdrawing from the Association. We maintain, therefore, that the Richmond Church had a right to judge for itself, whether it was expedient to continue any longer in connection with the Eastern Association; and having judged it to be inexpedient, it had a perfect right to withdraw.

Out of this idea, that "the basis o[illegible]hich churches are associated is the sam[illegible] on which individuals are united in the church grows another, viz., that all th[illegible]churches in the denomination, taken together, compose but one great church, of which the Associations are only so many divisions for the sake of convenience. In view of this idea, our entire denomination will be spoken of as the Seventh-day Baptist Church, just as the entire body of Presbyterians is spoken of as the Presbyterian Church, or the entire body of Episcopalians as the Episcopal Church. But where is the central organization, in which our congregations have their embodied unity? Some will answer, that it is found in the General Conference. Suppose it to be so, what follows? Why, that the ministers in the denomination are ministers of the Conference, and not of the several churches to which they respectively belong, or at least ought to belong. Then follows the idea, as a matter of course, that the ministers are amenable to the Conference for their character as ministers. The Conference is supposed to possess full power to depose from the ministry any one who may be judged unworthy of the office. Indeed, we have heard it said, almost in so many words, that as a man's ordination to the ministry proceeds from the Conference, so the same body has the right to take the office from him. We confess, that it has greatly surprised us, to hear such doctrine broached among a people claiming to recognize, nevertheless, the independency of the churches. But we trust, that though it has been advocated in, it is not the doctrine of the denomination.

When Associations were formed, they were constituted upon the same general principles as the General Conference. It was very natural, therefore, that those who entertained such unscriptural doctrine respecting the ecclesiastical authority of the Conference, should ascribe a similar authority to the Associations. It was natural, that they should regard the ministers in the Association as ministers of the Association, and as amenable to it for their behavior. But for our own part, we repudiate the doctrine, in toto. Its premises and conclusions are unfounded. We do not yet believe, that it is the doctrine of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination.

No doubt, that "churches or ministers are accountable to the Association, in just that respect and character in which they are recognized by the body." But in what "respect and character" are they recognized? Not, certainly, as coming under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Association; for, in the Eastern Association, the thirteenth article of the Constitution expressly forbids it. They are recognized as merely coming under that suasive and advisory influence which may tend "to promote their piety, order, and increase." They are recognized as subjecting themselves to whatever beneficial influence the Association may exercise over them, without interfering with their discipline. But even this recognition extends only to churches, and not to ministers, as such, separate from the churches to which they respectively belong. Ministers are recognized in no other capacity than as delegates of the churches represented. Indeed, the word minister, elder, pastor, or bishop, does not once occur in the Constitution of the Eastern Association. Even the fourteenth article, which provides for the delivery of a discourse at each anniversary, does not declare whether the discourse shall be delivered by a minister, or by some other person.

We have never conceived of the Association as composed of two sets of members; one of ministers, holding their connection with it permanently, and ex officio; the other of delegates, appointed from year to year by the churches. If it were so, we suggest whether it would not be well to divide the body into an upper and lower house—a house of Bishops, and the Laity, a la Episcopacy.

> "The nature and avowed objects of the compact admit of no construction of church rights, independence, exclusive, absolute, or supreme authority, which can prevent the Association from investigating, judging, and freeing itself from any churches or ministers, separately or conjointly, when it finds that as such they walk unworthily."

"The nature and avowed objects of the compact" certainly appear in the Constitution, if any where; and whether that gives the Association a right to exercise jurisdiction directly over ministers, let the reader judge. That the Association has a right to free itsel of those churches "which, in faith and practice, do not harmonize with its object," (see Art. 1st. Const.) is admitted. We also admit, that every Community, which is in any degree an independent one, and not wholly subjected to the control of some extraneous power, must have power to enact by-laws for itself, and to expel such members as are guilty of a violation of them. This seems essential to its existence. But the question which demands our serious consideration, is whether churches have a right to subject themselves to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of an Association, Conference, or any other organization. Have they any right to surrender their independence? Does not their allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ, as the only Head of the Church, forbid it? Ought not each church to manage its discipline, in a sense of its responsibility directly to Christ, the same as if there was no other church in the world? Has not Christ invested it with a disciplinary authority over its ministers? And has it any right to surrender this authority to any other organization? We trow not. And we maintain, that whatever be the compact which the churches may choose, for the sake of expediency, to enter into, it should never be one which shall assume an ecclesias[illegible] interfe[illegible] with its discipline; otherwise, [illegible]eason against the King.

T. B. B.

[illegible]RAL ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Central Association held its seventeenth Anniversary with the First Church in Verona, on the third and fourth days of last week, June 8th and 9th. The delegation in attendance was well chosen, and was sufficiently numerous for all practical purposes. The deliberations, as a whole, were interesting, and we doubt not will prove profitable to the churches; though we think their interest was diminished by the want of such order in the transaction of business—such conformity to the maxim, "A time for every thing, and every thing in its time"—as would have been secured by having the business matured and arranged by a Committee. In another respect the interest of the occasion suffered, and that was for the want of an included Sabbath. The churches of this Association are so located, that one day after the meeting closes, is sufficient for most of the delegates to return home; and at the last anniversary it was agreed to hold the meeting this year in the midst of the week, so as to allow the delegates to reach home before the Sabbath, and save the churches from being left without their regular ministrations on the Sabbath. The consequence was, that the religious exercises of the Anniversary had to be cut short, and no time was found for the usual sermons on missions and tract operations, with the accompanying collections. The next anniversary is to be held later in the week, and include a Sabbath; the Association judging, that the loss of the churches in the absence of their ministers for one Sabbath, is less than that of the Association in the want of a Sabbath. Notwithstanding these draw-backs, the meeting was, as we have said, an interesting [illegible]nd profitable one.

The Introductory Discourse was preached [illegible]y Eld. Russell G. Burdick, of Lincklaen, [illegible]m John 15:12—"This is my command[illegible]ent, that ye love one another, as I have loved [illegible]ou." It was not our privilege to listen to the discourse, but we heard it spoken of as well suited to the occasion.

At the conclusion of the discourse, the Association was organized by the appointment of BENJAMIN MAXSON, of Hounsfield, as Moderator, and CHARLES POTTER and LUKE P. BABCOCK, Clerks.

The Letters from the Churches showed that revivals had been enjoyed by several of them—among which we remember Adams, 2d Brookfield, Lincklean, and De Ruyter. Several additions had also been made to the 1st and 3d Brookfield churches—not much more, however, than the loss by death and removals. Nearly all of the churches seem to have been more than usually afflicted by sickness and death. The churches at Adams and Hounsfield have been diminished by exclusions—the former having disowned 31 members, and the latter 20. A large part of these have united in forming what is called the Independent Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams Center—a body from which a letter was received, stating its complete organization, with Alexander Campbell as pastor, and Nathan [illegible]aders as deacon, and that arrangements [illegible] been made for the immediate erection of [illegible]eeting-house. Farther particulars relative [illegible] the condition of the churches may be [illegible]arned from the Report on the State of Re[illegible]gion, which is appended.

The Missionary Operations of this Association are limited to supplying the feeble churches within its bounds with preaching. Eld. Elias Burdick has spent considerable time, during the past year, in missionary labors in Otselic and Georgetown. His report to the Association stated that he had preached 81 sermons, made 160 family visits, administered the Lord's Supper four times, and that in the judgment of charity some forty conversions had taken place in connection with these efforts. Eld. Joshua Clarke has, under the instructions of the Association, visited the church at Newport, Herkimer Co., N. Y., twice during the year, spending nearly a week there each time. Eld. Enoch Barnes, also, by request of the Association at its last meeting, spent some time in visiting the church at Richland, which he found in a feeble condition, and the members of it so much scattered as to render it impossible to gather any but very small congregations.

The subject of Education was brought before the Association in the Report of the Standing Committee, which will be found below. That part of the Report which speaks of Ministerial Education, led to a lengthy and interesting discussion, in which J. R. Irish, G. B. Utter, A. B. Burdick, Wm. B. Maxson, N. V. Hull, John Maxson, and others, took part. The lack of ministers to supply the calls of our churches, is generally felt; and the reason for this lack it is important to inquire. Some of the speakers thought that it was mainly in consequence of the meager support afforded the ministry, in comparison with the qualifications and labors demanded. Others expressed [illegible]dea, that a want of sympathy on the part [illegible]e church generally, for those who endure [illegible]lf-denials and buffetings involved in a [illegible] discharge of the duties of the ministry was the prominent cause of the deficiency. Others still thought the trouble lay in the want of vital piety in the churches—a thing which had become so manifest that pious and zealous young men could see little or no encouragagment to engage in the work of the ministry. All seemed to feel that the existing state of things calls for humiliation and prayer before God, that among us religion may be revived, discord healed, brotherly love restored, and laborers brought into the vineyard of the Lord.

Another subject which occupied the attention of the Association, and led to remarks of an interesting and useful character, was that of Publications, as presented in the Report of the Committee, which we copy. The volume of Tracts on the Sabbath, recently issued by the American Sabbath Tract Society, was commended by several of the speakers, as a work happily adapted to the present state of the Sabbath controversy. The plan of the Society to place a copy of it in every Sabbath-keeping family, and in the library of every College and Theological Seminary in the United States, was very cordially seconded. The periodicals of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society seem also to enjoy the confidence and good wishes of the members of the Central Association, if one may judge of that matter from the remarks made in connection with the Report on Publications.

But we must close this hasty and imperfect sketch by giving a list of the officers for the ensuing year. They are as follows: Corresponding Secretary—Eli S. Bailey, Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y. Treasurer—Ephraim Maxson, West Edmeston, N. Y. Executive Board—Benj. Maxson, Charles Potter, Luke P. Babcock, James Summerbell, E. R. Maxson, and Isaac Saunders, all (with the exception of Luke P. Babcock) located for convenience in the vicinity of Adams, N. Y. Delegates—To the Western Association, Joshua Clarke; to the Eastern Association, Russel G. Burdick.

The Association adjourned to meet at Scott, Cortland Co., N. Y., on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in June, 1853—James Summerbell to preach the introductory discourse on that occasion; Joshua Clarke, alternate.

Report on the State of Religion.

The Committee on the State of Religion respectfully submit the following report:

We find, upon reviewing the letters from the churches composing this Association, nothing to dishearten or discourage, but much to arouse us to action, and encourage us thereto. As usual in the militant church, there have been many conflicts with the spirit and powers of the world, and some of the churches have been called to wade through the muddy waters of dissension and affliction; which, as a consequence, follows coldness and indifference to the cause of religion and vital piety. These afflictions we regard as the chastening rod of our Heavenly Father, and they should excite in all our churches a desire for the spirit of vital godliness, and unremitting endeavors to sustain among them such means of grace as secret, family, and social prayer, and conference and covenant meetings, whilst the monthly concert for missions would be an additional auxiliary, serving, on the one hand, to banish from us the spirit of the world, and on the other to advance the Redeemer's kingdom in the earth.

But we turn with delight from the sorrows to the joys of our beloved Zion. Following the night comes the morning. The songs of rejoicing and praise, as they arise from many of the churches of our Association, fall upon our ears, filling our hearts with gratitude to God, and animating our souls with courage. Many of the churches have enjoyed the unmistakable tokens of divine favor, which always follow increased faithfulness to their covenant obligations, uniting us to each other as members of one body, and to Christ the living head. Very generally, the churches enjoy peace and harmony; and we hope that an increased interest in the weekly prayer meetings, the Sabbath school, and the cause of missions, is manifesting itself among us. Several of the churches have enjoyed cheering seasons of revival. Sinners have been converted, and backsliders reclaimed.

The Committee would earnestly urge upon the churches the importance of sustaining the constant exercise of prayer, and the vigorous support of the prayer meeting, the Sabbath school enterprise, and the monthly concert for missions. If these are properly sustained, then other departments and interests of the church will flourish; and when the next Association shall convene, we may have occasion to report still more encouraging tokens of divine favor and prosperity.

JOSHUA CLARKE, Chairman.

Report on Education.

The Committee on Education have given to the subject referred to them such attention as the circumstances would allow. They are gratified to find evidence that the literary institutions with which we are most intimately connected, have during the past year enjoyed an amount of patronage equal to that of any former year. DeRuyter Institute has recently adopted a plan (the particulars of which may be learned through our denominational paper,) the effect of which, it is hoped, will be to remove some dissatisfaction which now exists among the early contributors for the erection of the Institute, and also to increase the number of persons availing themselves of the advantages of the institution. Alfred Academy has had as many students as it could accommodate, and the completion of a building now in progress of erection for a chapel, lecture-rooms, &c., will greatly add to its facilities, and doubtless to the number of its students. In regard to the other institutions in which we are specially interested, the information of the Committee is not as definite and full as they could desire, but so far as it goes it is to prove a growing interest in the subject of education.

But while the Committee rejoice in the evidences of progress in intellectual culture, they are sorry to have occasion to say, that they do not discover that interest which is desirable in the subject of education for the ministry, or that anxiety which is desirable on the part of those who are seeking an education, to make their education contribute to the upbuilding of the churches. On the contrary, it is feared, that the zeal of individuals and churches in this cause has declined within the past few years—a circumstance which is attributed, in part, to the want of success in the plans to promote ministerial education, and in part to the want of encouragement held out to young men by the churches. In view of this, the Committee would urge upon the churches the duty of prayer to God, that he would incline those who are cultivating their minds to devote their energies to religious purposes, and also the duty devolving upon the several churches to do what they can to encourage those who express a disposition to engage in the work of the ministry.

W. B. MAXSON, Chairman.

Report on Publications.

The Committee on Publications would suggest, that our denominational publications should be cherished by our churches, as a means of deepening and extending the interest in those truths which we hold dear.

The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial, our quarterly publication, is a work involving great labor, collecting and preserving many historical facts and incidents, which would, except for such patient and persevering labor, have been soon lost to us. Much credit is due to the brethren who have taken the work in hand, for preserving from oblivion these historical collections; and the Committee would recommend the work to every Seventh-day Baptist family as a valuable religious publication.

The Sabbath Recorder and The Sabbath School Visitor have heretofore been fully commended; and we entreat our brethren to remember, that the continuance and usefulness of these works depend on their readiness to sustain them.

The volume of Tracts on the Sabbath, recently published by the American Sabbath Tract Society, is also commended to the families of this Association, as affording a ready and satisfactory answer to nearly every question that arises on the subject of the Sabbath; and in the libraries of Sabbath-keeping families, it must be invaluable.

J. MAXSON, Chairman.

Corresponding Letter.

The Members of the Central Association to their sister Associations, greeting:—

Our Association assembled as appointed with the first church in Verona. We are grateful for the presence of delegates from the Eastern and Western Associations; and we have reciprocated your fraternal fellowship in this matter by appointing brother Russell G. Burdick our delegate to the Eastern Association, and brother Joshua Clarke to the Western Association.

In regard to our state, we point you to the statistics and the reports contained in our minutes. Death has been doing his work among us, as you will see, and in some case exclusions are reported. These are facts which call for humiliation on our part, and admonish us solemnly to inquire, How shall the vacancies be filled, and what responsibility rests on us individually in relation thereto? We are not without trials in our Association, and we ask for your sympathy and prayers, that the Lord will lead us into liberty and perfect union. We hope that with us you will rejoice as well as weep; for while we have been afflicted, we have been blessed, and God has cheered us by giving us converts to his love. Brethren, let us pray that we may so appreciate the favors of God, that he will multiply the seed sown, and hasten the time when we shall not be a small, obscure people, but, as God's witnesses, our testimony shall be universally received, and the triumphs of his truth become complete. JAMES R. IRISH, Committee.

DERUYTER INSTITUTE—CIRCULAR.

The Trustees of DeRuyter Institute, to the original stockholders, and to the friends and patrons of the school generally:—

DEAR FRIENDS,—In accepting an appointment under the re-charter of DeRuyter Institute, the Trustees felt that they were assuming a sacred trust. They were conscious that the Institute had been redeemed under the impression that the interests of the denomination demanded it, and that there was no similar school in America that could properly be called a Seventh-day Baptist school. With such convictions, they have endeavored so to conduct the school as to subserve the public interest, and especially the educational wants of the denomination, and at the same time that it should be a faithful witness for God and his truth, without pandering to popular sentiment so as to sanction or indorse a disregard of the Divine Law.

They have, however, been embarrassed in their work, by prejudices occasioned by disappointed expectations on the part of the original stockholders and contributors to the fund for the erection of the Institute. Unhappily for all concerned, the impression was prevalent that the stock would yield a liberal income, and many were induced to subscribe by the hope of available revenue; and having failed in this, they naturally lost their sympathy for the school; and when the sheriff sale cut them off from all pecuniary interest in the property, it is not to be wondered at that prejudices should arise. It should have been understood from the beginning, that public schools are aided by State funds for the public good, and not for private emolument; and that trustees can neither receive for individual interest, nor impart to stockholders, any dividends from the income of such schools; and that schools not sharing in such aid will be unlikely to compete with others so as to have a surplus revenue. The appropriate object of a Denominational School can as well be attained by the present organization, if understood and acquiesced in, as by a stock company. It is now separated from private interest and private control, only as it is guarded by a bond and mortgage, against being conducted by any other than Seventh-day Baptist Trustees and Teachers; and in case of a failure, falls back into the hands of the redemption contributors.

Though all legal claim was lost to the original contributors by the sheriff sale, the Trustees have felt it duty to do what they can, without endangering the finances of the Institute, to remunerate such contributors. But as they have no means of doing so, other than the tuition fees, and as they cannot have this while they retain their prejudices and withhold their pupils, the Trustees can only say, "Such as we have we give unto you." They therefore hereby proffer to each of the original stockholders and contributors who live ten miles or more from the Institute, and who PAID twenty-five dollars or more, a scholarship for five years from the first of July next, entitling the holder to the instruction of one student at a time, in all regular classes of the school, free of charge for every thing not reckoned as "extras" in the published circular of 1851; and to every such person who paid one hundred dollars or more, two such scholarships for five years or one for fifteen years; and to all such contributors, living within ten miles, similar scholarships for one half the usual prices of tuition; and to all the minor heirs of such contributors, similiar scholarships during good behavior. They also proffer to holders of the bond and mortgage similar scholarships for twenty-five years for each full share of the bond and mortgage, or one of ten years for a half share, do date from the time of their acceptance of the same, and to diminish the amount of their claim in proportion to the time, and the bond and mortgage to be null when the conditions of the scholarship have been fulfilled, otherwise to be of full force. They thus proffer what would cost another, for the $25 dollar subscription, $75,; and to each holder of a share in the mortgage, what would cost $375. Computing nothing for interest, they may thus avail themselves of three times the original investment, and at the same time aid in sustaining a school where God's law is not rendered void by authority.

We send this proffer abroad, hoping that those who have felt themselves wronged in their disappointment, will at once avail themselves of the opportunity of realizing what they originally anticipated, and forward to the Trustees the evidence of their payment; and if they have no scholars of their own, they may perhaps do the same amount of good by furnishing facilities for some worthy youth who would else be deprived of all such instruction.

All communications should be addressed POST PAID to the Trustees of DeRuyter Institute, DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y. It is desirable that they should be forwarded as early as the commencement of the next term, viz., the last Wednesday of August, (25th.)

Sunday Observance—The Scotch Church Assemblies.

GLASGOW, May 28, 1852.

In Paris, "on Sunday week, the Minister of War gave a grand farewell breakfast to the Arab Chiefs, and to a large number of generals and other officers who have served in Algeria." Such is one of the French Government's modes of Sunday sanctification. One week later, however, and we have the announcement of the Lyons journals, that the Prefect of the Rhone on Sunday last observed workmen engaged on the repair of the road of Charpeunes, and he has given orders that, conformably to the ministerial circulars, the works shall be suspended on Sundays and fete days. It is even said that Government intends to issue a decree against all labor, and to compel tradesmen to close their shops "on Sundays and religious fete days." Those by whom the President is induced to take these steps claim the same authority for the setting apart their fete days as for their enjoining the sanctification, and we see no reason to doubt that in France at present both will stand or fall together.

In this country a prize of £25 having been offered for the best Sunday poem, it has been awarded to a student of divinity. The General Assemblies, both of the Established Church of Scotland and of the Free Church, have this week been sitting in Edinburgh. In the Free Assembly, the Report of the Sunday Observance Committee intimated that little or nothing had been done in a concerted way, on this subject, since last Assembly a year ago. They complain of the state of the Post-Office, and of the countenance which private parties and public companies take in the same direction from the example so set. The Report, (which was approved of,) proposed the continuance of the Committee, without having any special action proposed. From a hint in the Times, the Scottish Guardian, one of the Free Church newspapers, dreads that the reconstruction of the Crystal Palace is to prove a fruitful source of Sunday desecration. The London Christian regards this as "inevitable." We think this anticipation well founded. When Government declined allowing it to remain on its old site, a party was authorized to offer for it £70,000, the sum at which by contract the Government could have claimed its retention. The principals in this offer, it now appears, were Directors of the London and Brighton Railway, who contemplate converting the Palace into a feeder of their funds. A park of 150 acres has been purchased at their Sydenham station, in the center of which the building (to the extent of 18 acres, is to be placed. The Park itself is to be planted with specimens of every tree which can be grown out of doors in England. The Palace itself is to be formed into a winter garden and museum of science and art. It is to be filled with choice plants and flowers, with statuary, machinery in operation, and specimens of manufactures; geological and mineralogical curiosities, sculptures and casts of the most celebrated works of antiquity. And as a branch of the Railway is to be run into it, and frequent trains at low fares to tempt the myriads of the metropolis to frequent it—we do anticipate that the result will be the most conspicuous display of what Sunday feeling even in this country is, when allowed freely to adopt its own form of expression.

In the Established Assembly, one minister has been deposed for lewdness and indecency toward women; and in the Free Assembly, another minister has been suspended, sine die, for undue use in the pulpit of other men's sermons, for appropriating to his own use church moneys, and for falsehood and prevarication arising out of these offenses. Both Assemblies have been discussing the subject of Education—the Establishment eager to have the sole control of its management; the Free Church, that it may obtain its own share of the management, and of the influence thereby acquired, proposing that it be divided among those believing the Bible and shorter catechism, and teaching accordingly. The question is of the greater interest at present, inasmuch as by Act of Parliament it is provided that the Parochial Schoolmasters' salary falls to be revised every 25 years, and this term expires next year.

J. A BEGG.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JUNE 7.

The SENATE did but little, except to receive petitions, most of which were for the passage of the Homestead Bill.

In the HOUSE, the bill giving ten millions of acres to the States jointly, for the support of indigent insane persons, was debated, but not voted upon. The resolution offered some time ago to adjourn upon the 2d of August, was so amended as to read 16th of August, and then laid over. Territorial bills were taken up, and a resolution passed providing for the survey of the boundary between Texas and the Territories. A report, adverse to the abolition of a hospital tax on seamen's wages, was submitted. Some right-of-way bills, granting lands for Railroad purposes, were passed, and the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, JUNE 8.

In the SENATE, a flood of petitions in favor of the Homestead Bill came in. Mr. Sumner gave notice of proposed reductions in ocean postage. The Senate then went into executive session upon the Indian Treaties of Minnesota.

In the HOUSE, there was a long struggle between California and New York as to the proposed branch mints. Nothing resulted, except waste of time.

FOURTH-DAY, JUNE 9.

In the SENATE, but little worthy of note was done. The House bill for the relief of William S. Payne, was taken up and passed, also the House joint resolution, changing the name of St. Peters, to Minnesota River. There was some talk about the war steamer for harbor defense, now building by Mr. Stevens, but no result. Executive session closed the day.

In the HOUSE, very little was effected. Messrs. Morehead and Orr made political speeches, and the House adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, JUNE 10.

In the SENATE, a large number of petitions and resolutions were presented. A resolution directing an inquiry as to the expediency of purchasing Catlin's collection of Indian Scenes, Portraits, &c., was taken up, and after considerable talk was laid on the table. Two or three resolutions of inquiry were passed, and the Senate went into executive session.

The HOUSE spent some time, to no purpose in discussing the bill granting right of way and donations of land to Florida and Alabama, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in those States. Then it took up the Indian Appropriation Bill, upon which two political speeches were made, occupying the time till the hour of adjournment.

SIXTH-DAY, JUNE 11.

In the SENATE, Robert M. Charlton, the new Senator from Georgia, appeared and was qualified. The Naval Pension bill was passed; also, the Invalid Pension bill. Several amendments were adopted to the bill giving farther remedies to patentees, but the bill itself was postponed. A bill was introduced, and ordered engrossed, changing the name of the Steamboat Brilliant to that of Mary Hunt, because she had been unlucky, and sailors would not go in her. Adjourned to Second-day.

In the HOUSE, the only subject discussed was that of public lands. Mr. Stevens, of Penn., made a speech against donations of public lands to the States for Railroad or other purposes. Mr. Rantoul, of Mass, also made some remarks; and the House adjourned without doing any thing.

SABBATHDAY, JUNE 12.

The HOUSE spent the morning hour on a bill granting lands to Florida for railroad purposes. Afterward it took up the Indian Appropriation Bill, upon which two political speeches were made.

California News.

The U. S. Mail steamer Illinois, with the California Mails to 11th May, five hundred and twenty-five passengers, and $1,500,000 in gold dust, arrived in New York last Sunday. The following summary of news we copy from the N. Y. Times:—

The sad accounts of Indian slaughter, received a few days since, are confirmed; but the forebodings of a fierce and bloody Indian war, as a consequence, have not yet been realized. The savages generally were quiet—as well they might be when white men had evinced such superiority in deeds of brutality and outrage.

The excitement relative to the Chinese population was on the increase. All through the mining regions meetings had been held, at which resolutions were passed ordering the immediate departure of the Celestials, and providing for the enforcement of the mandate. Going a little further, some of the meetings denied the rights of foreigners, of any nation, to participate in the profits of mining, and resolved an extension of the "notice to quit" to them also. Several collisions had occurred between the Chinamen and other miners, but without serious results. Influential Chinamen at San Francisco have sent out circulars to their countrymen at home, informing them of the hostility recently excited against their immigration, and advising them in consequence not to add to the number of those who are to be excluded from El Dorado.

The mining intelligence is good. Operations in quartz, especially, were being attended with great success. The difficulties with new machinery, and the failures of parties of experimentalists, which for a time dampened public confidence in the success of quartz mining, have all been overcome, and the universal testimony is, that the lasting wealth of California lies imbedded in her mountains of quartz. The yield from this source is constantly increasing; and while we have accounts of $140 per ton of rock, as the product of some of the veins, we have no evidences of dissatisfaction with the results of any of the numerous companies now in operation.

European News.

One week later news from Europe has been received, of which the following is the substance.

In Parliament, the Maynooth Endowme[illegible] Grant has been once more debated and [illegible]journed.

A Committee of the Commons has been [illegible]pointed to inquire into the causes of the frequent explosions in coal mines.

The Telegraph is now open between Galway and Dublin. A sub-marine line is to be laid down between Holyhead and Howth.

The Galway Packet says there is no truth in the statements that the Potato disease has re-appeared in Ireland.

Kossuth's mother and family had arrived in London, and were about to take passage to America.

The new Crystal Palace project was exciting the greatest interest. The building will be immensely improved in appearance, and greatly enlarged. The whole of the capital required, $2,500,000, had been subscribed, there being applications from the public for 200,000 shares, although only 100,000 could be issued.

A company, with a capital of £500,000 sterling, or $2,500,000, has just been started in London, entitled "The London and New York Screw Steamship Company," the object of which is to establish a line of British steamers (screw propellers) between the Thames and New York, touching at Cork, at the latter port securing the conveyance of Irish passengers and freight. These ships will prove formidable competitors to the American liners. It is thought that they will also call at Southampton. The parties connected with this extensive project are of a highly influential character.

Murray, the Englishman, sentenced to death by the Roman authorities, was confined in the Castle of Spoleto. His punishment would probably be commuted.

The South of Germany journals contain lamentable accounts of the famine in many districts. The Presidency of Ober Franklin suffers most, the weaving and other branches of employment being completely at a stand, whilst the price of provisions was enormous.

The British troops had taken Rangoon and Matabran, and captured 100 pieces of cannon. The British lost 150 men.

The Whaleship George Howland.

Letters received in New Bedford, from Capt. Samuel H. Cromwell, of the whaleship George Howland, of that port, confirm the accounts of the capture of the ship by pirates at Charles Island, as previously stated in the letter from Mr. Peacock, who, it will be recollected, effected his escape by secreting himself on board the ship, while Capt. Cromwell and a portion of the crew were retained upon the island. Capt. C. adds:—

"We were left under a guard at the hut until the return of our captors from the ship, about two hours. A consultation was then held on the outside of the building, respecting the manner in which we were to be disposed of. It was evident from their conversation that their original intention had been to murder us, and, indeed, one plan had been to dig a hole in the sand large enough to hold twenty-five bodies, and to bury us all together; but, thanks to an all-wise and overruling Providence, our lives were spared. After about an hour, spent in the most horrible uncertainty, we were somewhat relieved by the arrival of the Governor, who called aside the principal person of the gang, and had a short conversation with him. After this our bands were cut and we were set at liberty on a desert island.

"The Governor, Don Martin, and his man servant, were left with us, and were the only persons besides ourselves on the island. The robbers left us about fifteen pounds of bread and one gallon of molasses; they took from the Governor the greater part of his furniture and clothing.

"We were kindly received by the Governor at his house, and resided there while we were on the island. Here our food consisted almost entirely of meat, and frequently we had nothing but a piece of beef roasted on the coals. We were obliged to hunt the wild cattle for our food, and as we could only take them at night, and had no fire arms, the pursuit was very difficult and sometimes dangerous. We were nearly destitute of clothing too, being only provided with one suit of working dress.

"After about three weeks, passed in the most agonizing suspense, a sail was discovered approaching the island. It proved to be the ship Congaree, Capt. Maloy, who kindly administered to our wants, receiving us on board his ship, and supplying us with every comfort, who brought us in safety to Tombez, where the commander of the U. S. ship Portsmouth received us on board, and brought us to Guayaquil, where we found the ship Geo. Howland at anchor."

In another letter, dated at Guayaquil, May 2, Captain Cromwell states that they were confined at the island twenty-three days, and were subsequently twenty-four days in making the passage to Tombez, and six days thence in regaining the ship at Guayaquil. The ship had been stripped of all her whaling gear, tools, &c., all but two of her boats, and a large quantity of goods and provisions; and 16 of the crew had not been heard from. It was therefore impossible to continue the voyage, nor could she leave the port until after the liquidation of the claim by the officers of the Swedish frigate Eugenia, for salvage. Capt. Cromwell proposed to remain at Guayaquil, awaiting orders from her owners, which it will be recollected were dispatched hence by Capt. Benj. Clark, immediately after the reception of the intelligence of the arrival of the vessel at Guayaquil.

REVIVAL IN THE SECOND CHURCH OF ALFRED.—God in his great mercy has of late poured out his Spirit upon our Church, and upon many of the dear youth of our place. Twenty-three have joined the Church by baptism, and others are expected to go forward soon. May God continue to be with us.

J. KENYON.

SAILING OF MISSIONARIES.—Rev. Mr. Crane and wife, of Western New York, embarked at Boston for Smyrna on Second-day, May 31, in the bark Sultana, to join the Nestorian Mission.

HOSEA BALLOU DEAD.—Rev. Hosea Ballou, the oldest and best-known preacher of the Universalist faith in the United States, died at Boston June 7, after an illness of a week, [illegible] year, having been an active mis[illegible]cher for more than sixty years. [illegible]ode Island family, but born in [illegible]shire Co., N. H., on the 30th [illegible]71. His father was the Baptist clergyman in that town, and the son joined the Baptist Church there in his nineteenth year. He soon after became a Universalist, was excluded from the Baptist Church, and began to preach in the fall of 1791. He was first settled in Dana, Mass., then in Barnard, Vt., then in Portsmouth, N. H., then in Salem, Mass., whence he removed in 1817 to Boston, and became pastor of the School-st. Church, to which he has ministered for thirty-five years. On account of his age and infirmities, a colleague was settled by the Society several years since, leaving him most of his time at liberty to travel and preach, as he did up to a very few months ago. During the late anniversary week in Boston, he was repeatedly a speaker in the meetings of his denomination.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.—The following is an extract from a letter dated Hong Kong, March 28: "There have been no less than thirty-seven whalers from the Artic seas. It may interest you to know, that they almost all believe that Sir John Franklin is safe, and that he has got through the ice barrier into inner waters, where he will not be reached until a mild season arrives, which they say the present will be. Most of them have now departed. They say Franklin will not suffer for want of food. They give strange accounts of the Esquimaux vibrating from the Asiatic to the American continent and back again, carrying their boats, made of skins and whalebone, over the ice, and launching them when they meet with open water. They all confirm the fact that the whales found in Behring's Straits and in Baffin's Bay are the same species, proving the existence of a passage; for a whale of the Arctic species, they say, has never been seen to the south of 22 deg. of latitude, so that they cannot have doubled either of the Capes, (of Good Hope or Cape Horn,) and the whale is under the necessity of making his presence known by coming to the surface to blow.

A SWEE[illegible]G FIRE.—We learn by the Keesville Gaze[illegible], that the village of Franklin Falls, some 20 m[illegible]s west from Keesville, a lumbering estab[illegible]ent owned by James B. Dickinson, was[illegible]troyed by fire on Saturday last. Some twe[illegible] buildings, saw mills, a store and a large quantity of lumber were destroyed. The loss is estimated at $30,000—insurance $3,600. The fire was running in the drouth-stricken fields and forests, and a powerful wind brought a wave of fire with the speed of a race horse through the dry woods on the hills above the village, with such fury and magnitnde, that a mass of flame seemed to extend itself fifty or sixty rods in length, setting the whole village on fire at once, compelling the inhabitants to run for their lives, and leave all their goods and provisions to be destroyed in an hour.

TERRIBLE CALAMITY.—Four children of Thom. Finney, in Halifax, Lancaster county, took shelter under a tree during the severe storm on Thursday June 10. The tree was struck by lightning, and two of the children were instantly killed; Samuel Jackson Finney, 19 years, and James Stewart Finney, 11 years. The other two children were considerable injured, but it is believed both will recover. This storm was one of the severest which has been experienced in this vicinity for many years. Its effects were felt in all the surrounding counties, in the destruction of buildings and crops, and four deaths by lightning occurred during its brief continuance.

CAMPA[illegible] TRIBUNE.—The publishers of the New[illegible] Triubne proffer copies of their Weekly [illegible]n from June 17th, (when the Whig c[illegible]tes for President and Vice-President [illegible]ll be nominated at Baltimore,) to Nov. 25th [illegible]nsuing, (when they hope to announce the[illegible]election,) on the following terms:

1 copy for the term (22 weeks)	$0 75
5 copies to one address	2 50
11 copies do do	5 00
23 copies do do	10 00

Payment in all cases to accompany the order.

KILLED, on the 9th inst., at the marl beds in Salem Co., N. J., Mr. Otto Mires, a German, in the employ of Mr. Humel. He was laying a trunk in a narrow chasm some twenty feet below the surface, when the earth caved in upon him. J. C. W.

SUMMARY.

Thousands of fresh-water fish have been poisoned in the river Colne, at Colchester, Eng., an immense tank of gas-tar having been emptied into the river from the premises of the old gas-works. A great number of persons busily engaged themselves in capturing fish of several pounds in weight, which were floating intoxicated upon the water, and many were the singular expedients resorted to for that purpose. After feasting themselves to their heart's content upon the carcases of the finny delicacies, the gas-tar produced an effect upon those who partook of them similar to that it had upon the fish.

The most enormous profits have been realized by the assignees of Woodworth's planing-machine during the twenty-four years the patent has existed. It is stated that James G. Wilson has received, in sales, assignments, and tariffs, $2,131,752. John Gibson, of Albany, has received nearly as large a sum. Charles Gould, of Albany, has also received a very large sum. Gibson, it is further stated, is in the receipt of $1 for every thousand feet planed in one hundred mills, each of which turn off 10,000 feet each day.

The vessel dispatched by Mr. P. T. Barnum to secure, on the coast of Africa, a variety of wild beasts, birds, etc., for his Museum here, has been very successful, and has obtained for him a great number of very valuable curi[illegible]. An ostrich of great size is now on[illegible] here across the ocean. A whole[illegible]akes of singular kinds, ourang outang[illegible]eys, etc., also accompany it. The co[illegible]n is daily expected.

On Wednesday afternoon a fire broke out in the shed used for storing wood on the Fitchburg Railroad in Charlestown, near the Bridge. The fire communicated to the engine house, which was injured to the amount of $700 or $800. Some 200 cords of wood were destroyed. The property was all insured.

The following prices were obtained for paintings belonging to D. Huntington, Esq., of New York, by the auction at his residence, conducted by Messrs. Leeds & Co: A small landscape by Durand, $325; "The Tribute Money," by Huntington, $350; "The Cross in the Wilderness," by T. Cole, $410; "White Plume," by Huntington, $185; "Velvet Hat," by the same, $150; "Lake Scene," by the same, $155. Also, several others, by various artists, from $25 up to $100. Line engravings brought from $10 to $35 each.

The St. John, N. B., papers of June 12, contain the particulars of a melancholy diaster which happened on Tuesday June 8, in the Bay of Fundy. As Rev. Edward D. Very, (pastor of the Baptist Church in the parish of Portland,) Prof. Chipman, and four students, named Rand, Phalen, Grant, and King, belonging to Acadia College, were proceeding in a boat to Cape Blomidon, (near Windsor, Nova Scotia,) a gale upset the boat, and all were drowned. One of the two boatmen also perished.

There is no doubt that the Cholera has appeared in the West, mainly along the course of the Mississippi. In Cincinnati seven or eight deaths have occurred, and there were 36 Cholera deaths in New Orleans during the week ending the 22d May. In La Salle, 60 deaths are reported, mostly among the laborers upon the Railroad. It has not yet assumed the form of a malignant epidemic, and we trust soon to hear of its disappearance.

A new method of making yeast is to take a large teacupful of split and dried peas, put them in a pint of boiling water, cover them closely to exclude the air, and place them by the side of the fire for twenty-four hours, when it should have a fine froth on the top. A table-spoonful of the liquid will raise one pound of flour.

The annual commencement of Brown University will occur on the 14th of July. On Tuesday, the 13th, at 11 A. M., Rev. G. W. Bethune, D. D., of Brooklyn, N. Y., will deliver the oration before the Rhode Island Alpha of the Phi Beta Kappa Society. The annual address before the Society of Missionary Inquiry will be delivered on Tuesday evening by Rev. Dr. Kirk, of Boston.

By order of the Postmaster-General, the United States Mail Steamers, with the great California and Oregon Mails, are to be dispatched on the 5th and 20th of each month, direct for Aspinwall, instead of the 9th and 24th, as heretofore. When these dates occur on Sunday, the sailing to be postponed until the following Monday.

An escaped convict, named Mulloy, from Charlestown State Prison, was seen, Saturday, on Long Wharf, Boston. Chase was given by the officers, when he jumped into the water, and took refuge under the dock, where he remained for three hours, refusing to surrender. He was finally shot and wounded, when he was retaken.

A dispatch received at the Pennsylvania Railroad office, says that three brothers have been arrested near Beatty's Station, 40 miles from Pittsburgh, for mail robberies to the extent of $15,000, in drafts, which were found upon them. The mails of the 4th and 9th inst., are both reported to have been robbed.

The Chicago Journal states that Mr. McCormick has sent out five hundred and eighty-one Reapers and Mowing machines from that city, the present season. One was sent to Germany, one to Alabama, one hundred to "the Jerseys," and one to El-Dorado.

Thomas Francis Meagher has peremptorily declined the grand ovation with which New York City, through her Municipal Authorities and her Civic Societies, has been anxious to attest her sympathy with his patriotic aspirations, efforts, sacrifices and sufferings.

Of $6,300 acknowledged by the Treasurer of the A. H. M. S., in the June number of the Home Missionary, more than one half was contributed by Massachusetts; and of the receipts of the past year by the parent board, more than one quarter were from the same source.

A duel was fought, on the 2d inst., at Fort Wells, Florida, between Col. Grouard and Major Jones, of Hopkins. They fought with bowie knives, Major Jones was killed. Subsequently, Col. Grouard went to St. Augustine and surrendered himself to the officers of justice.

On Friday evening, May 21, the bark Fairmount, Philadelphia, off the Florida Coast, was run into and sunk by another ship. All of her crew and passengers, (over a dozen in number,) are said to have been lost.

The Mineral Point (Wisconsin) Tribune of the 6th ult. says considerable excitement has been manifested in that village by the discovery of some small pieces of gold, valued at from two to five dollars each, and a lead of the same material.

The ship Helena, Capt. Cave, sailed from N. Y. May 9, for Port Philip, with 122 passengers for the gold-diggings of Australia. She is the first passenger vessel which has left the United States for the gold regions of Australia.

The Western papers speak in glowing terms of the prospect of a great wheat harvest next fall, and the papers in the rural districts of our own State concur in the opinion that the crop this year will be as large as was ever known before.

The Licking County Branch of the State Bank of Ohio failed Wednesday, June 2. The stock is considered sunk, and claims not already secured, are considered lost. The circulation, it is thought, will be redeemed.

Canker worms are infesting the plum trees in the neighborhood of Salem, Mass., to a great extent, while the apple trees, which have heretofore suffered msst from them, are but little molested.

The friends of home missions in New Hampshire, besides contributing more than $4,700 to aid the feeble churches in the State, have raised $3,403 the past year for the cause of home missions at the West.

The Free Soil National Convention, to nominate candidates for President and Vice President, will be held at Cleveland on the first Wednesday in August.

The Syracuse salt makers have agreed to establish the fixed price of fine salt at one dollar per barrel, and to admit of no change. It has generally varied from 75 cents to $1.50.

Notice.

THE Executive Board of the American Sabbath Tract Society have employed Bro. E. P. Larkin to visit the churches in behalf of the Society. Bro. L. will act as agent for the Society's publications. It is hoped that every family will take this opportunity to procure for its library a bound volume of our Tracts on the Sabbath, and a copy of Carlow's Defense of the Sabbath.

The Western Association.

THE Seventh-day Baptist Western Association will hold its Sixteenth Annual Meeting with the 1st Church in Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., commencing Fifth-day, June 24th. N. V. Hull is appointed to preach the opening discourse; Leman Andrus, alternate.

M. train. All baggage at the risk of the owners, until delivered into the actual possession of the agents of the Company, and checks or receipts given therefor.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

"Note the Bright Hours Only."

A lesson in itself sublime,
A lesson worth enshrining,
Is this—"I take no heed of time,
Save when the sun is shining."
These motto-words a dial bore,
And wisdom never teaches
To human hearts a better lore
Than this short sentence teaches.
As life is sometimes bright and fair,
And sometimes dark and lonely,
Let us forget its pain and care,
And note its bright hours only.

The is no grove on earth's broad chart
But has some bird to cheer it;
So hope sings on, in every heart,
Although we may not hear it;
And if to-day the heavy wing
Of sorrow is oppressing,
Perchance to-morrows's sun will bring
The weary heart a blessing.
For life is sometimes bright and fair,
And sometimes dark and lonely;
Then let's forget its toil and care,
And note its bright hours only.

We bid the joyous moments haste,
And then forget their glitter—
We take the cup of life, and taste
No portion but the bitter;
But we should teach our hearts to deem
Its sweetest drops the strongest;
And pleasant hours should ever seem
To linger round us longest.
As life is sometimes bright and fair,
And sometimes dark and lonely,
Let us forget its toil and care,
And note its bright hours only.

Though darkest shadows of the night
Are just before the morning,
Then let us wait the coming light,
All boding phantoms scorning;
And while we're passing on the tide
Of Time's fast ebbing river,
Let's pluck the blossoms by its side,
And bless the gracious Giver.
As life is sometimes bright and fair,
And sometimes dark and lonely,
We should forget its pain and care,
And note its bright hours only.

Corn Culture—Premium Crops.

Large crops of corn are grown only on naturally fertile soils, or on those artificially enriched by the plentiful application of manures. "The very structure and size of the plants—their habits and rapid growth—would tell us such is the fact, if costly experience had not long since convinced all observing corn growers of this truth. Unless one's soil is really rich in organic as well as inorganic manures—in the elements of which to form the grain—to sustain the stalk in its wholeness, and enable it to elaborate and perfect its seed, disappointment must necessarily follow every attempt to grow large, or even comparatively profitable crops of corn." If this be true, and we believe every candid farmer will admit it, it is then the duty and interest of every one who desires to raise corn, to make the accumulation of manure a chief principle in his system of farming.

We have again and again referred our readers to the subject of making, saving, and applying manures, as the great means of drawing profitable returns from their farms in the shape of large crops—and we propose in our present article, to give the mode of preparation and culture pursued by those most successful in growing corn—condensing it from the statements of those who have taken premiums at our State and County Fairs on this crop.

In 1850, the State Ag. Society awarded the first premium to P. Crispel, Jr., of Ulster Co., on two acres of corn, yielding a fraction over one hundred bushels per acre, and affording a profit of $53,27 per acre. The condition of the soil on which this crop was raised, and the method of its cultivation, is given as follows: It was a meadow lot which had not been plowed since 1837, and been mowed every year since that time. It was manured with about fifteen loads of manure (from horse stable, and dry manure from the barn yard,) to the acre; the grass, which was mostly clover, (the Timothy having been taken out by the grub worm two years before,) was permitted to grow without being pastured until the 28th of May, when it was plowed in with the manure. The plowing was about eight inches deep, with a lapped furrow neatly turned over. It was harrowed down and marked for planting on the 29th, and planted on the 30th day of May. It was marked about two feet eight inches distant both ways; planted in hills. The corn came up in about five days after planting, and before cultivating, there was about two hundred bushels of leached ashes put on, sown broadcast over the land. The number of kernels dropped in each hill was three to four. When the corn was large enough to be seen through the rows, it was worked with a cultivator both ways, which cleared out the land without any hoeing, and when the corn got about a foot high it was plowed and then hoed and thinned out. The variety of corn planted was the small eight-rowed yellow—a little less than half a bushel planted on the two acres. This statement, with farther particulars, may be found by reference to page 142 of the Society's Transactions for 1850.

At the same time, the second premium was awarded to Robert Eels, of Oneida Co., on two acres which yielded 84 1-2 bushels per acre, and gave a profit of $30 79 per acre. His statement of soil and cultivation is substantially as follows:—The soil is a gravelly loam, in good condition; with a previous crop of hay for six successive years, without manure. The land was plowed early in April, soon after the frost was out, (and it froze up again after plowing;) it was plowed eight inches deep, twelve wide, furrows lapped. The land was harrowed and cultivated previous to planting, marked one way, three feet four inches apart, except three-fourths of an acre, which was furrowed with a plow, deep as possible without tearing up the turf. Hills two feet six inches apart, five to seven kernels to each hill, the number of stalks left, four. The corn was planted the 15th, 16th, and 17th of May, and appeared above ground in six days. The variety is the twelve and sixteen-rowed Dutton corn. There was eight loads of hog manure used on the three-fourths of an acre furrowed with the plow—put in the hills; no other manure used. Hoed twice, cultivated twice in each row, before hoeing.

Mr. E. M. Bradley, of East Bloomfield, Ontario Co., who took the second premium for farm management in 1850, has been very successful in raising corn, as in every thing else, so we will give a condensed statement of his method, which we find on pp. 193-4 of the Transactions for 1850. His crop is from seventy to one hundred bushels per acre. Corn is planted upon highly manured greensward, plowed six or eight inches deep, thoroughly harrowed, marked in straight lines, three feet apart each way. Five kernels are planted in each hill, care being taken that they are not all put together, but separated a few inches apart, and covered with nothing but mellow dirt, one and a half inches deep. The usual time of planting is about the 10th of May. When the corn first appears, a table-spoonful of common wood ashes is put upon each hill. When the corn is about two inches high, it is cultivated both ways of the field, and hoed, care being taken that the grass is perfectly cut up, and the dirt loosened about the stalks of corn. When the first hoeing is completed, a tea-spoonful of plaster is put upon each hill. In about two weeks from the first hoeing, and before it needs it, it is cultivated and hoed again. In two or three weeks more it is cultivated and hoed the third and last time, and plastered as after the first hoeing.

All these statements go to show the necessity of high manuring and thorough culture in the production of the corn crop. Our agricultural friends will see how premium crops are raised, and how profitable farming is carried on when, as in these cases, from $30 to $50 is realized as clear profit from a single acre. Pope Pius Ninth.

A German letter from Rome speaks of the holy Father as very much broken down by his disappointed hopes and his grief at the ingratitude he has experienced, and says that he has subsided into a kind of sorrowful resignation to that which has occurred and to what must yet happen—withal he is becoming corpulent, and appears to have relinquished all further hopes of benefitting his country. Yet his old sweetness of character still reveals itself upon opportunity. He was lately making one of his visits to the Hospital del Consolazione in Rome, and as he entered the room in which the mattresses were mended and made, he stopped suddenly, and looking one of the workmen intently in the face for some time, exclaimed: "Why! that is my Simon Magus!" "Yes, holy Father," responded the man, "your poor Simon Magus." "Is your mother still living?" demanded the Pope. "Holy Father, she is dead." "And how do you prosper?" "Holiness, I have a wife and six children." The Pope drew two gold pieces from his purse, handed them to the workman, and blessed him as he passed on. It appeared that the Pope, when he was Don Giovanni Maria Mastai, had been the teacher of the man in some charitable institution, and being especially interested in him, had given him from some fancy, the sobriquet Simon Magus.

In the first year or two after his ascent to the papal throne, we remember well how his immense popularity was increased by his evident desire of diminishing as much as possible the distance between his subjects and himself In St. Peter's once, a woman pressed through the guards and was driven back; but the Pope, hearing the tumult and demanding an explanation, summoned the frightened woman to him, and asked her what she wanted. "Nothing, holy Father," said she, as she fell upon her knees, "but to offer you these flowers, in memory of my gratitude for my husband, released from prison by your mercey," The Pope took the flowers, raised the woman, gave her his blessing, and ordered the guard to conduct her safely from his presence. The flowers were placed upon the high altar under the dome, and they remained until they withered. But it appears that he does not always allow himself the opportunity of benevolence. Recently a young woman, who had a prayer to prefer for a lover, condemned to twenty years' imprisonment, ascertained that the Pope was in the habit of driving upon a certain road at a particular hour of the day, and, as usual, alighted for a short promenade. This was the instant she intended to throw herself at his feet and intercede for his clemency. But she found a guard stationed upon the road to prevent any passage, and crossing the fields to get beyond the papal cortege, she encountered the same difficulty. She then attempted to break in at the side of the cavalcade, and was told that the cavalry would ride over her if she advanced another step. [N. Y. Trib.

Liberia.

The African Repository for May presents in all its articles an aspect of Colonization unusually encouraging. The number opens with a succinct sketch of the history of Liberia from 1816, when a meeting was held at Washington to consider the expediency and practicability of ameliorating the condition of the free people of color in the United States, by providing a colonial retreat on this continent or in Africa. The next year Rev. Messrs. Mills and Burgess, under a commission from the Society, which was regularly formed 1st January, 1817, sailed to explore the western coast of Africa. The report of Mr. Burgess—Mr. Mills dying on the homeward voyage—being favorable to the project of a settlement, the Society was encouraged to proceed in its design; and in February, 1820, the first company under the auspices of the American Colonization Society left New York for Africa in the ship Elizabeth. It consisted of 86 colored emigrants, accompanied by three white men—Rev. Samuel Bacon, Mr. John P. Bankson, and Dr. Samuel Crozer. Proceeding by way of Sierra Leone to the Island of Sherbro—a very unhealthy situation—and deprived of comforts, all the white men died, with a quarter of the emigrants, within a few months.

After the fall of this vanguard in the invading army of benevolence, another company was sent out the next year; but they were not destined long to carry out their experiments in peace. On the arrival of Mr. Ashmun, hostilities were commenced against the little band by the native tribes. These were repulsed, and after an administration of nearly six years, the self-sacrificing and indefatigable Ashmun returned to his native country, worn out and broken down, to die almost immediately on landing. Since that period, the colony, with occasional checks and clouds, has gradually increased in prosperity. Rev. Lott Cary followed Mr. Ashmun in the administration of affairs. Dying soon after by an accidental explosion of gunpowder, he was succeeded by Dr. R. Randall, accompanied by Dr. Joseph Mechlin, Jr., as Physician and Surgeon. Dr. Randall lived but four short months, and Dr. Mechlin took his post. On his returning to the United States, Rev. J. B. Finney assumed the duties of the responsible station, whose successor was Rev. Ezekiel Skinner, M. D.

In 1834, the colony of "Maryland in Liberia" was commenced under the superintendence of Dr. James Hall. In the early part of the next year, a new settlement was commenced at Bassa Cove, under the auspices of the Pennsylvania Society. This was attacked by a native chief, who massacred about twenty of them, the rest escaping to St. John's River, opposite Edina, where there is now a flourishing commercial town. In 1836, the settlement of Marshall was commenced; but we cannot particularize further. We must hasten to say that in 1838, all these societies, except the Maryland, were consolidated under one government, to be called the Commonwealth of Liberia, of which Thomas Buchanan, Esq., was appointed Governor. To his [illegible] able services the Commonwealth [illegible] owed much, though they were [illegible] his death in about two years [illegible] administration forms an era in [illegible] ment.

We have now arrived at the epoch of the establishment of the Republic of Liberia by a Convention of Delegates assembled at Monrovia in July, 1847. They formed a Constitution, which was adopted with a Declaration of Independence. In October of that year, Gov. Roberts, who had presided over the colony ever since the death of Gov. Buchanan, was elected President for two years, and has been continued ever since in an office, which he has filled with much credit and ability.

Liberia is now an independent nation, not only by her own declaration, but by the acknowledgment of Great Britain, France, and Prussia. And she is constantly enlarging her dominions. The political jurisdiction of the Republic extends from the mouth of the Snebar River, on the north, to the northern boundary of "Maryland in Liberia"—a distance of about five hundred miles; which, with that Colony, makes an extent of territory on the seaboard of about six hundred miles, embracing a beautiful tract of country, covered with the verdure of a perpetual spring, and presenting an inviting field for commercial enterprise and agricultural industry.

The Persevering Wife.

In the town of ——, in the winter of 1842 and 43, quite a great work of the Lord was being carried on through the instrumentality of a few pious individuals, in a private house. We had the privilege of being present one evening, and are very sure it was the same evening the subject of this incident experienced religion. Toward the close of the meeting, its order was changed from prayer to that of speaking. One after another improved the time, both male and female. Very soon the subject of this narrative rose, with much feeling, and a heavenly countenance beaming with light, and said, "I thank God for a persevering wife," (who but the evening before met with a change, but had been some week or more very serious.) "Last Sabbath morning she rose early, soon comp[illegible]d all the necessary work of the family, a[illegible] much earlier than common was ready for [illegible]urch, and asked me if I would be kind en[illegible] to take her across the pond in the [illegible] (a large tide-water mill-pond, some two [illegible] farther around than across it,) for 'I purpose to go to the Methodist meeting to-day; it's quite a distance the nearest way I can go, it's very bad walking, looks very much like rain, and I wish to go early to have sufficient time to pick my way and reach there before it begins to storm,' stating all the most weighty objections herself, and answering them at the same time with a firm, persevering countenance. However, I objected to her request notwithstanding.

"Well," she replied, "then I must go around the pond," and started.

"Here! if you will go, come, get into the boat."

She returned, took a seat, I rowed with a great degree of irritation of feelings, but in profound silence; we reached the other side, and found the tide had flowed on the meadows so much more than usually that it was impossible to reach the dry land by several rods. I inquired, with some considerable spirit, "What are you going to do now?"

"Why, I suppose I shall have to wade, if there is no other way to get on shore."

I began to turn the boat toward home again. "Stop! if you can't get any nearer the shore, let me get out."

"What! into the water? you will get your death of cold."

"Well, then, you carry me to the shore; you have boots on, you will [illegible]et your feet."

"I don't believe I shall try it[illegible]"

"Well, stop then, and land me [illegible]near dry land as you can, and I will get out some way. If you take me home I sha[illegible]have to go around."

"Then you are bent on going?"

"Yes, if I can possibly get there."

I found it was of no use. I turned the boat about in a rage, run it as far on the meadow as I could, jumped out into the water, caught her in my arms, and started for shore, saying, "I believe you would go to hell if you should get your head set." I set her on the shore and returned home. After my fit of passion had passed, I began to reflect, and the more I thought upon the scenes of the morning and my past life, the more uneasy and restless I felt. I made up my mind to go too in the afternoon or evening.

In the afternoon of that day I think he went; however, in the evening he and his wife were both forward for prayers, and were converted.

Many others have as much reason to thank God for persevering wives as this man, and many more would, doubtless, had their wives persevered in seeking their soul's salvation years ago. The above narrative we have briefly communicated in hopes it may encourage some others to persevere, pressing through all difficulties, trusting in the Lord. "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." [Adv. and Jour.

Currants and Gooseberries.

Not one in a hundred understands the simple process of cultivating either currants or gooseberries, although it has been detailed in all the horticultural books with which the world abounds. Thousands of persons, with every appliance for success, are still content to live without a plentiful supply of these delicious, healthy, and cheap luxuries, merely because they have not thought of the matter. They have a few stinted bushes set in the grass, with three-fourths of the stock dead, and then wonder why they do not bear in abundance.

There is not a more beautiful shrub growing than the currant, properly [illegible]ated—and the same may be said of t[illegible]berry. Cultivators who pay any atten[illegible] subject, never allow the root to [illegible] one stock, or, as the English say, "[illegible] them stand on one leg"—thus forming a beautiful miniature tree.

To do this, you must take sprouts of last year's growth, and cut out all the eyes, or buds in the wood, leaving only two or three at the top; then push them about half the length of the cutting into mellow ground, where they will root, and run up a single stock, forming a beautiful symmetrical head. If you wish it higher, cut the eyes out again the second year. I have one six feet high. This places your fruit out of the way of hens, and prevents the gooseberry from mildewing, which often happens when the fruit lies on or [illegible] the ground, and is shaded by a super[illegible]dance of leaves and sprouts. It changes [illegible] unsightly bush, which cumbers and disfigures your garden, into an ornamental dwarf tree. The fruit is larger, and ripens better, and will last on the bushes, by growing in prefection, until late in the fall.

The mass of people suppose that the roots make out from the lower buds. It is not so; they start from between the bark and wood at the place where it is cut from the parent root. [Vermont Chronicle.

"I am One Hundred Years Old To-Day."

From the Burlington (N. J.) Gazette.

The attention of many of our citizens has doubtless been arrested by the appearance of an old colored man, who might be seen sitting in front of his residence, in East Union-st., upon mild clear days, respecftully raising his hat to those who might be passing by. His attenuated frame, his silvered head, his feeble movements, combine to prove that he is very aged; and yet comparatively few are aware that he is among the survivors of the gallant army who fought for the liberties of our country "in the days which tried men's souls."

On Monday last we stopped to speak to him, and asked him how old he was. He asked the day of the month, and, upon being told that it was the 24th of May, replied, with trembling lips, "I am very old—I am a hundred years old to-day."

His name is Oliver Cromwell, and he says that he was born at the Black Horse, (now Columbus,) in this county, in the family of John Hutchin. He enlisted in a company commanded by Capt. Lowery, attached to the 2d New Jersey Regiment, under the command of Col. Israel Shreve. He was at the battles of Trenton, Princeton, Brandywine, Monmouth and Yorktown, at which latter place, he told us, he saw the last man killed. Although his faculties are failing, yet he relates many interesting reminiscences of the Revolution. He was with the army at the neglect of the Delaware on the memorable crossing of the 25th of December, 1776, and relates the story of the battles on the succeeding days with enthusiasm. He gives the details of the march from Trenton to Princeton, and told us, with much humor, that they "knocked the British about lively" at the latter place. He was also at the battle of Springfield, and says that he saw the house burning in which Mrs. Caldwell was shot, at Connecticut Farms.

The Rothschild Lottery.

The authorities of Posen (says the London Times' correspondent) have enough to do to answer the strange applications that are sometimes made to them by the Polish and German peasantry. The idea that has got abroad among them of the vast grants of land Kossuth has received from the "King of America," does not stand alone; another impression that has taken root in their minds is much more extraordinary; for some time past the officials have received numbers of applications for shares in a "Rothschild Lottery," of which they of course know nothing; but on inquiry, it was found the peasants had been persuaded that the "great Rothschild" has been sentenced to be beheaded! But from his intimate relations with the European monarchs he has been allowed to procure a substitute (if he can) by lottery! For this purpose a sum of many millions is devoted, all the tickets to be prizes of 3000 thalers each, except one; that fatal number is a blank, and whoever draws it is to be decapitated instead of the celebrated banker! Notwithstanding the risk, the applicants for shares have been numerous, and the officials are scarcely believed when they explain to the deluded people that the lottery is a fiction. The origin of the absurd report cannot be traced, but it has given the authorities a good deal of trouble. The journals lament that any part of the population should be in such a state of ignorance as to render belief in such a story possible.

The Mystery Explained.

Much learning has been expended, says the Western Watchman, in endeavors to account, philosophically, for the "spiritual rappings," said to be heard so frequently when the mediums are present. Among all the explanations, none seem to be so lucid as the following, from the pen of that very learned gentleman, Darius Dump, Esq. To our mind it is "clear as mud." It was first revealed to the learned world through the columns of that distinguished journal, the "Carpet Bag," Vol. 1, No. 34.

"The only true and legitimate manner of accounting for the taps, is the physiological defects in the membranous system. The obtuseness of the abdominal abdicator causes the cartilaginous compressor to coagulate into the diaphragm, and depresses the duodenum into the flandango. Now, if the taps were caused by the vogation of the electricity from the extremities, the tympanum would also dissolve into spiritual sinctum, and the olfactory ossificator would ferment and become identical with the pigmentum. Now, as this is not the case, in order to produce the taps, the spinal rotundum must be elevated down to the spiritual spero. But, as I said before, the inferior ligaments must not substend over the digitorum sufficiently to disorganize the stericloetum.
DARIUS DUMP."

The Tears of Oysters.

Glancing round this anatomical workshop, (the oyster,) we find, amongst other things, some preparations showing the nature of pearls. Examine them, and we find that there are dark and dingy pearls, just as there are handsome and ugly men; the dark pearl being found on the dark shell of the fish, the white brilliant one upon the smooth inside shell. Going further in the search, we find that the smooth, glittering lining, upon which the fish moves, is known as the nacre, and that it is produced by a portion of the animal called the mantle; and, for explanation's sake, we may add that gourmands practically know the mantle as the beard of the oyster. When living in its glossy house, should any foreign substance find its way through the shell to disturb the smoothness so essential to its ease, the fish coats the offending substance with nacre, and a pearl is thus formed. The pearl is, in fact, a little globe of the smooth, glossy substance yielded by the oyster's beard; yielded ordinarily to smooth the narrow home to which his nature binds him, but yielded in round drops, real pearly tears, if he is hurt. When a beauty glides among a throng of her admirers, her hair clustering with pearls, she little thinks that her ornaments are products of pain and diseased action, endured by the most unpoetical of shell-fish. VARIETY.

A candidate for the office of Secretary of the Board of Trustees for the Public Schools in Louisville, Kentucky, states very frankly, in his address to the Board soliciting the appointment, that "it is through no patriotic desire on his part to be subservient to the public interests, that he is induced to be a candidate," for, says he, "so far as I am individually concerned, truth and honesty oblige me to say, that the salary is the only consideration that makes the office desirable." He states that the salary is $900; and that the office is a sinecure to any man at $300; and therefore he is ready to discharge its duties to the best of his ability!

A correspondent of the Cooperstown Journal notices the finding of the body of a person in the Lake at that place, presumed to be a female, though the fact is not stated. In a pocket was found a phial in which was a very well written paper, setting forth the causes of the suicide, and among them remorse for a long series of petty scandals and backbitings, indulged in at first for the excitement of the thing, and finally for a morbid desire to lacerate the feelings of others.

Lately, as a gentleman was examining a desk, which had stood in an out-building for a long time, he found a small bag, which he thought a shot bag, but, on taking it up, the bottom came out, and to his great surprise, out rolled five hundred gold pieces. After counting them, he said he was very sorry that he had not found them twenty years sooner, that he might have had the interest of them also during that period.

The Exeter (N. H.) News-Letter believes that there are more hubs for wheels manufactured in that town in a year than any other town in New England, and these all by two manufacturers, who have turned out within the last three months over eighty thousand. These are all made of elm. The blocks are cut off at the proper length, and turned out by help of lathes.

The wheat crop throughout the Western States is spoken of as looking extremely fine the present season. The winter, although more than usually free from snow, has been favorable. Regular rains have kept the earth moist, and the growing crop wears a green and vigorous appearance.

The Hartford Times never saw the apple trees in that region more fully in blossom than they are at this time. The indications for an abundance of fruit are unusually good. The peach trees, however, should be excepted, the late hard winter having quite or nearly killed a good portion of them.

Late English papers mention the recent death of Mrs. Sara Coleridge, daughter of S. T. Coleridge, and wife of his nephew, the late Henry Nelson Coleridge, by whom the task of editing Coleridge's works was undertaken and prosecuted until his death, when he was succeeded in it by Mrs. C.

Whenever you get a black eye by a fall, or from running against the bed-post, apply a cloth wrung out of very warm water, and renew it till the pain ceases. The heated moisture liquefies the blood, and sends it back to the proper channels. Use warm or hot, never cold water, to apply to the bruise.

A religion that does not constrain a man to pay his just debts, when he has the ability to do it, is worth nothing. That he can escape his liabilities through some defect of human law, will never justify him at the bar of conscience and God, for defrauding others of their due.

The only money used in the back part of Oregon, consists of live stock—a hog paying for a dollar, a sheep fifty cents, turkeys twenty-five cents, and young dogs a shilling each. If Smith owes Jones $4 12 1-2, he sends him five hogs, and receives for change one sheep, one turkey, and one pup.

It is mentioned in Robert's life of Hannah More, that in 1783, Hannah More sat next to Dr. Johnson, at a dinner party at the Bishop of Chester's house. She says, "I urged him to take a little wine." He replied, "I can't drink a little, child, therefore I never touch it. Abstinence is as easy to me as temperance would be difficult."

An Indian chieftain, during the early settlement of New England, invited a minister to settle as a missionary among his tribe, and to induce him to do so, the Sagamore said, "You shall be to us as one who stands by a running water, filling many vessels."

As the Spanish proverb says—"He who would bring home the wealth of the Indies, must carry the wealth of the Indies with him," so it is in traveling; a man must carry knowledge with him if he would bring home knowledge.

It appears from Quincy's History of Boston, that the first fire engine used there was imported from England in 1678. Two more were imported in 1702. In early times, every inhabitant of the town was required to have a hogshead of water standing near his door, with the head open, under a penalty of five shillings.

The chief art of learning, as Locke has observed, is to attempt but little at a time. The wildest excursions of the mind are made by short flights, frequently repeated; the most lofty fabrics of science are formed by the continual accumulation of single propositions.

We are not to suppose that the oak wants stability because its light and changeable leaves dance to the music of the breeze; nor are we to conclude that a man wants solidity and strength of mind because he may exhibit an occasional playfulness and levity.

The number of letters passing through the post-offices of Great Britain and Ireland in the year 1851, was upwards of 360 millions—almost a million a day—and the increase on the preceding year 13½ millions, being nearly 4 per cent. on the preceding year.

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

No Change of the Sabbath on Account of the Resurrection of Christ, or His subsequent Appearances to His Disciples. [Continued.

"And after eight days, again His disciples were within, and Thomas with them; then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, Peace be unto you. Then saith He to Thomas, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side; and be not faithless, but believing.' And Thomas answered and said unto Him, My Lord and my God. Jesus saith unto him, Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed; blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." John xx. 26—29.

This text also is reckoned as unquestionably among the number of proofs of a change of the Sabbath. Intimation is given of this change, it is affirmed, by our Lord's again appearing to His disciples; and here we have one of His alledged appearances on the first day of the week, although this is not even said in the text. Our First-day friends are not indeed consistent in their mode of calculation. Nor is there a word about the Sabbath in the text. Even Mr. Gresswell, one of the most intelligent of those authors who regard this as an appearance on the first day of the week, says concerning an expression precisely similar, both in the original and in the translation, only differing in regard to the number of days, "and after six days," (Matt. xvii. 1, Mark ix. 2,) that "this may and perhaps must be understood of six whole days and part of a seventh." The application of this canon would, in the case before us, surely require that we should say that it may and perhaps must be understood of eight whole days and part of a ninth—and, thus adopting his own principle of interpretation, what would become of the favorite notion of our Lord's appearing on the first day of the week being here found at all? He and others justify this view of the Evangelist's statement, by observing that the same period which Matthew and Mark call "after six days," already quoted, Luke states to have been "about eight days after." (Luke ix. 28.) But there is manifestly a difference between these expressions. "After eight days," seems to express completeness; while "about eight days after," is really indefinite. It is not implied, in this last case, that the eight days are necessarily complete.

The proper comparison of texts in this case is that of Matthew and Mark, above cited, with that of John. In the one we have "after six days," and in the other "after eight days," so that there is here a real parallelism. And if the one text "may and perhaps must be understood of six whole days, and part of a seventh," so the other "may and perhaps must" mean eight whole days, and part of a ninth, rather than only seven days, or an exact week; so that our Lord's appearance to His disciples would on this occasion be on a different day of the week from that of His previous appearance. There is a precision in the expression which does not admit of its being rendered vaguely, as indefinitely expressing only about eight days. It is pointed and plain, "after" that number. And we have a much safer guide in comparing similar statements of the word of God in cases where their meaning is determined. In our Lord's own prediction of His resurrection, "after three days," we have seen, was equivalent to on "the third day;" so that we believe a week only to have intervened.

But whatever may be the number indicated by the expression "after eight days," this at least is evident, that absolutely nothing is said of the reason of Christ's appearance on this occasion having been either that it was the first day of the week, or that it was a new Sabbath. From it, therefore, neither they nor we would be entitled to take encouragement to disregard the Sabbath sanctified and blessed by the Lord, which he has called us to "remember."

"After these things, Jesus showed Himself again to the disciples at the sea of Tiberias; and on this wise showed He Himself. There were together Simon Peter, and Thomas called Didymus, and Nathaniel of Cana in Galilee, and the sons of Zebedee, and two other of His disciples. Simon Peter saith unto them, I go a fishing. They say unto him, We also go with thee. They went forth, and entered into a ship immediately; and that night they caught nothing. But when the morning was now come, Jesus stood on the shore; but the disciples knew not that it was Jesus. Then Jesus saith unto them, Children, have ye any meat? They answered Him, No. And He said unto them, Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find. They cast, therefore; and now they were not able to draw it, for the multitude of fishes. Therefore, that disciple whom Jesus loved, saith unto Peter, It is the Lord. Now, when Simon Peter heard that it was the Lord, he girt his fisher's coat about him, (for he was naked,) and did cast himself into the sea. And the other disciples came in a little ship, (for they were not far from land, but as it were two hundred cubits,) dragging the net with fishes. As soon then as they were come to land, they saw a fire of coals there, and fish laid thereon, and bread. Jesus saith unto them, Bring of the fish which ye have now caught. Simon Peter went up and drew the net to land, full of great fishes, an hundred and fifty and three; and for all there were so many, yet was not the net broken. Jesus saith unto them, Come and dine. And none of the disciples durst ask Him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord. Jesus then cometh, and taketh bread, and giveth them, and fish likewise. This is now the third time that Jesus showed Himself to His disciples after that He was risen from the dead." John xxi. 1—14.

The Evangelist, thus careful to inform us that "this is now the third time" of Christ's appearing to His disciples after His resurrection, seems to supply us with a note of testimony as to the light in which we are to view these appearances which had preceded it. Such an allusion to this as "the third" would surely imply that these different appearances were similar in character, and for a similar purpose; and, therefore, so far from the circumstance of Christ's showing himself being in any way regarded as evidence of the day being thereby recognized as now sanctified, we have the disciples occupied fishing in the sea of Tiberias, and Christ himself expressly enjoining the prosecution of this their ordinary calling; yea, working a miracle of such a nature as required a more than ordinary effort of muscular strength to secure the fish thus supplied. If Christ's appearances were all on the first day of the week, then this third time that Jesus shewed Himself, neither could have been regarded by the disciples as a sacred day, nor was the lesson even now taught them, that henceforth it was to be so observed. No rebuke for its neglect is administered; nor is the practical instruction of the Saviour fitted to impress them with the idea that this day had now become the blessed Sabbath. It cannot but be acknowledged, from the manner in which these disciples were engaged at their ordinary calling, that they at least had not yet learned that, after the resurrection of Christ, they were to abstain from work upon the first day of the week, if this was the first day; and, on the other hand, if this fishing was not on the first day, then are we furnished with evidence, clear and distinct, that the appearances of Christ were extended at least to other days, also, and therefore that His appearances did nothing to prove that any day on which they were made was thereby stamped as a hallowed day. If, of three days on which the Saviour comes unto His disciples, one of these was that on which Simon Peter and Thomas and Nathanael, and the two sons of Zebedee, and other two disciples, were both night and morning engaged in their occupation as fishermen—and Christ reproved them not, but rather encouraged them in this—certainly it destroys, in regard to the other two appearance-days all reason to believe in their having been sanctified as Sabbath days.

But if the mere fact of Christ's appearing to His disciples on any day, or if the actions He performed thereon, are to be regarded as proof of His intention as to its character or after use, surely there is no one more unequivocally marked, than this on which the disciples were so found at their employment. On this occasion a double miracle was performed—first, in the unsuccessful fishermen now having received an extraordinary draught; and, secondly, in the preservation in the circumstances of the net they used, which, when brought to land, was full of great fishes, containing an hundred and fifty-three, "and for all there were so many, yet was not the net broken." John xxi. 11. And in His afterward taking of their bread and fish, and asking them to come and dine, our Lord used a familiarity of love that specially commends the occasion to our remembrance.

What the other days were on which the Saviour specially "appeared" after His resurrection, previous to His ascension, we are not informed. Yet, with all our ignorance of this, and even though it were granted that His second appearing, eight days after the first, had really been on the Sunday, if we add "the third time that Jesus shewed himself unto His disciples" while they were engaged at their ordinary avocation, to that in which, "while He blessed them, He was parted from them, and carried up into heaven," manifestly triumphant, forty days after His resurrection, and therefore if the resurrection really was on the first day of the week must have been the fifth day or Thursday, (which day of His last appearance even the Episcopal church of England, consecrating Sunday though it does, is pleased to call "Ascension Thursday,") it will be found, that we have account of His appearing as often on other days as is even alledged to have taken place on the first day of the week. And besides all this, we have it on unquestionable evidence, that He appeared not only on the particular days named, and in the manner already declared, but that, unto the apostles whom He had chosen, He also "shewed Himself alive after His passion, by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days." Acts i. 2, 3. When the Evangelist thus speaks of Christ's continued abode on earth, between His resurrection and ascension, he does not then fix His appearings in any way to the first day of the week—there is nothing in his narrative of the peculiarity on which many have expatiated; the record is, "He shewed Himself alive by many infallible proofs, being seen of them," not merely on the first day of the week, but "forty days."

Paul informs us, however, that "He was seen of above five hundred brethren at once." 1 Cor. xv. 6. Here, then, is a most important instance in the history of Christ's appearances —the most public of all—but by our being left without the slightest intimation of the particular day on which this occurred, the spirit of God gives us to understand, that such appearances were not designed to mark a changed Sabbath. Those most disposed to build up this theory do not pretend even to guess on which day of the week the "five hundred brethren" were favored with this interview.*

And yet it has been asked, as if a strong or even triumphant argument could thence be derived, Why should Christ "appear on the first day of the week, twice together at least, but that He might by this intimate, if not establish, the day for sacred assemblies, blessing it with His own presence, and manifest by this His practice, to all Christians, that His presence and blessing should be chiefly expected on that day?" Cawdrey and Palmer's Sabbatum Redivivum, part 2d, p. 487. That by Christ's appearances to His disciples on a particular day, even if the day were proved indubitably, any given number of times, we should be entitled to conclude that it was designed thereafter to be observed as the Sabbath, extruding the real Sabbath from its place, without His intimating this to have been His design, we absolutely deny; but that because He appeared "twice together" on that day, supposing that to be the first day, (and, that it were not true that of one of these "we may and perhaps must" understand a different day of the week,) either intimates or establishes a change of the Sabbath of the Lord, is to act, in a most important case, upon authority which, we venture to say, few would be contented to rely in any matter seen to affect their worldly interests. That the truth prefigured and foretold of His Resurrection should be early as well as fully authenticated, our Lord's appearances were important—and that He should take the earliest opportunity of calming the agitated minds of His loved disciples, by showing Himself to them, both in the morning and the evening of the very day of His resurrection, to the females who came to the tomb to do honor to His memory, and to His apostles and other disciples met together, and in wonder at the tidings they had heard of the grave having yielded up its prize, is perfectly in conformity with all the love and tenderness He had previously displayed; but that, when so met, He stated any thing about a change of the Sabbath in consequence of that event, we do not read; and that this was not the reason why they had met on this occasion, is sufficiently obvious, as they were not aware that He would meet them at all. Thus the weight of this argument is made to depend on the circumstance that one of the other occasions on which Christ appeared to His disciples was, or at least has been supposed to have been, on the first day of the week—although Christ Himself said not a word of such a reason for His appearing, even on that occasion—and neither has the Evangelist by whom it is recorded. And is it on such dubious proofs of Christ's intention, that the faith of His people is designed to be rested? All these appearances were the "many infallible proofs of His resurrection."

Far are we from denying that, on the first day of the week, the souls of those who truly wait upon the Lord, "in the Apostles' doctrine, and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayer," have been greatly blessed. We should belie our own experience, were we to say otherwise. But what Christian will not join us in going farther, and acknowledge that on every other day of the week, when he has truly sought the Lord, whether in private or when met with brethren in the name of Christ, that there Christ has been in the midst of them, to bless them, and to do them good? But does this at all affect the question as to which day of the week has been sanctified as that upon which the special unrevoked blessing of God rests, as set apart for Himself?

* Barnes, in his Notes on Matthew, enumerates thirteen appearances of Christ after His Resurrection; of these, is there certainty that a single one of them was upon the first day of the week?

PLANTED TREES.

In the inspired records, when good men are spoken of in connection with the church, they are described as trees planted by the right hand of God, as planted in the house of the Lord, as being rooted in Christ, and as bringing forth fruit in old age. Is not one prominent idea suggested by these phrases, that of stability and continuance on one spot? Would trees be fruitful, nay, would they live long, if they were constantly being removed from one spot to another, and often placed in different soils? We have seen plants and shrubs removed by children in their play, but no one expected them to live under such management.

But what is the line of conduct pursed by many Christians in the present age? How many do we know who have belonged to some half-dozen churches, or if they have remained on the same spot, have had, perhaps, a dozen different gardners to water them, and to guard them from the dangers to which they were exposed. But who ever knew these Christians to be either strong or fruitful? How easily are they blown about, and even uprooted like sickly shrubs, when they ought to have resembled sturdy oaks, bidding defiance to every wind that blows, and taking firmer root with each successive storm. We shall have few eminently strong and holy Christians, till the members of our churches become "steadfast and immoveable."

The well-rooted tree only can withstand the hurricane, and the long settled pastor or Christian in a church can most fully accomplish the objects to be answered by their being planted in the garden of the Lord, and bear the most fruit and the best, even to old age. We invite our Christian friends to consult the history of our churches, and to make their own observations on passing occurrences, and then to say who are the most fruitful and happy Christians, the immoveable ones or the changeable. [Watchman and Reflector.

SILENT LOVE.

"An illiterate female," said Dr. Chalmers, "in humble life, applied for admission to the sacrament; but, at the customary examination, could not frame one articulate reply to a single question that was put to her. It was in vain to ask her of the offices or mediation of Christ, or of the purposes of his death. Not one word could be drawn out of her; and yet there was a certain air of intelligent seriousness, and the manifestations of right and appropriate feeling—a heart and a tenderness, indicated, not by one syllable of utterance, but by the natural signs of emotion which fitly responded to the topics of the clergyman, whether she was spoken to of the sin that condemned her, or of the Saviour who atoned for her. Still, as she could make no distinct reply to any of his questions, he refused to enroll her as a communicant; when she, on retiring, called out, in the fullness of her heart, 'I cannot speak for him, but I could die for him!' The minister, overpowered, handed to her a sacramental token; and with good reason, although not a reason fell in utterance from her."

THE ANSWERED PRAYER.

MY will not THINE be done.

BY MRS. A. M. EDMOND.

"O spare my child, a mother cried,
"O spare my darling child!"
His dying couch she sat beside,
Her eye with sorrow wild.
She cannot yield her treasure now—
Her tear of anguish falls;
O, wherefore, mother, weepest thou?
'T is God thy loved one calls.

"Nay, for he must not, cannot die,
O, great and holy One;
Look down in mercy from on high,
And spare my only son.
Try thou my love, tempt thou my faith
With aught that fills life's cup,
But O, I cannot yield to death
My living idol up.

"Bid me with all beside to part,
That makes my earthly bliss;
But this, the jewel of my heart,
I cannot give thee this."
Down from the mansions of the blest,
To her inferior home,
Bright angels from the Father's breast,
On wings of healing come.

Unseen by mortal eye they breathe
Upon the sufferer fair,
And lo! what living beauties wreathe
The marble features there.
The blue eyes open, the young breast heaves,
With motion soft and slow,
Death's icy chill the forehead leaves,
And life's warm currents flow.

"He lives! he lives!" the mother cries,
"My treasure back is given"—
She hath forgot her prayers and sighs
Have won her babe from heaven.
The child, that else a cherub bright
Had soared to regions fair,
Is back returned to mortal sight,
In answer to her prayer.

Years roll; the boy, to manhood grown,
From paths of virtue strays,
And ends in shame and guilt alone,
The remnant of his days.
The mourning mother heavenward passed
From earth when life was done,
But in her home of bliss at last,
Found not her only son. [Mother's Jour.

TWO-THIRDS HIS VALUE.

"Do you know of a man worth six hundred dollars a year, and whom the good people of —— can get for four hundred?"

"Yes, there is brother H., the very man, fully worth six hundred, and I think you can get him for four."

Such was the question which my friend put to me, and such was the answer I gave him. He went in pursuit of the minister, and I went to commune with my conscience. I knew that brother H. had been settled a few years, a most faithful and valuable minister—that he had been dismissed on account of poor health, greatly to the regret of his flock—that he had a family, and must go to work somewhere as soon as possible. I knew, by mentioning him in these circumstances, I had virtually given my sanction to the bargain. Had I done right? I put it in another shape.

Suppose a man comes to me and says, "I am in want of a good ox; one that will mate mine, one that will draw well, one that won't fret under the yoke, one that will do much work on little fodder. In short, sir, I want an ox worth one hundred dollars. Do you know of some poor man who has such an ox, and which I can get for sixty-six dollars?"

"Yes, sir, I know just the man and the ox. He is kind, well-broken, of a good disposition, a great worker; and as the man has lost his mate, and as he is poor, and can't afford to keep this ox on hand, I think you can get him for sixty-six dollars."

I put it in another shape. Suppose an incorporated company should come to me, by their agent, and say—

"Sir, we want to put a factory in motion, and we want a stream to turn the wheel. Do you know of a stream that has the necessary power, which never dries up, which never runs low, and which will do all that we want —a water power that is worth a thousand dollars, but which some poor man would sell for two-thirds of that amount?"

"Yes, sir, I have a brother who has been unfortunate, and had his mill burned, and has a family on his hands, and he must do something. I think his necessities are such, that he will be glad to sell for less than two-thirds of what everybody knows his water power is worth."

I turned over the question once more, and said to myself, Suppose Esquire Cook comes to you and says—

"Neighbor E., you know my family is getting larger and more respectable, and though we have hitherto walked, yet I think it high time that we have something in the shape of a carriage. Do you know of some one who has a carriage worth about a hundred and fifty dollars—not less—which I can buy for one hundred?"

"O, yes, sir, there is my poor friend who has a large family, and who has got a carriage that he might carry them, old grandmother and all, to meeting on the Sabbath; but, unfortunately, he lost his horses last winter, and can't buy more, and I think he would sell his carriage for two-thirds its value."

Now, on thinking it over and over again, it came to pass that there was a dialogue between me and my conscience, and it was in this wise:

Conscience. Have you done just right in sending your friend after Mr. H., as you have just done?

Myself. Why not? They want a minister, and he wants to be settled. He is an excellent man, and will do good, I doubt not.

Conscience. Do you really think his services worth six hundred dollars?

Myself. Indeed, I verily do. Would I say so if I didn't?

Conscience. You doubtless understand that your friend believes you think him justified in getting a man for two-thirds of his value. And you doubtless understand that he will tell Mr. H. that you mentioned his name, and therefore that you are aiding to cheapen his services down to two-thirds their value!

Myself. Now, my good friend, Conscience, you are too hard upon me. Isn't it better that a minister should settle on four hundred dollars than starve?

Conscience. Would you help a man to take advantage of another and obtain an ox in this way?

Myself. No, indeed! But what could I have done?

Conscience. Done? Why, told your friend that though his people might obtain that good man for two-thirds his value, because of his necessities, yet it is wrong, and you cannot aid in doing it. You say you would not have done so in cheapening an ox. You would have said, "This ox is worth one hundred dollars, and you ought to give that for it, and not take advantage of the situation of the owner." Why did you not say so in this case?

Myself. Well, to speak plainly, I didn't think of him, I only acted for and thought of the people who wanted a good minister. But, dear Conscience, your mill always grinds too hard. You don't suppose that every minister in the world is to receive just what he is worth, do you?

Conscience. No, but I ought not to expect that you will aid and abet in selling a brother for two-thirds of his value.

Myself. O, dear! just let me off this time, and I will try never to do so again.

So conscience went to look after something else, and I sat down to muse. So my thoughts came along in their succession. I am not sure that conscience was not somewhere in the neighborhood, for they had a kind of chastened appearance, as if they had been to school to that old gentleman, and listened to his teachings.

"So, then"—thus ran my musings—"so, then, brother H. will go there and be settled. He will be expected to live in a house of such a character that they won't be ashamed of their minister's house, or his furniture and general style of living, and all for four hundred dollars a year. His parish is a farming one, and scattered, and he must keep a horse; and then he must educate his children; it's all they can ever have for him, and all for four hundred dollars a year. Then he must be given to hospitality, ready to entertain all strangers, or else he is not the bishop of the New Testament. He must be first and foremost in all charities, and show himself a pattern to his people, and all for four hundred a year. He will want books and papers, and thus keep up with the times and with the world—and how can he do it all on four hundred dollars?

"Well, where's the comfort in all this? Why, if the good brother can't live on it, he has talents, and education, and skill enough, he can leave the ministry and go into some other business. Just as the good people of Virginia are said once to have concluded to debar ministers of the gospel from the right to go to the ballot-box, and wrote to Witherspoon, to ask that wise man what he thought of it; he replied, with great gravity, that he thought it right, and that ministers would not complain, for if they wanted to vote, all they had to do, was to commit some crime, and be deposed from the ministry, and then they could go to the ballot-box! So, if ministers don't choose to starve, they can leave the ministry, and go into some other business."

After all, neither the dialogue with the conscience, nor the after musings, have done much to upbuild self-complacency; but perhaps I have allowed myself to be unnecessarily depressed, and perhaps it is right to help a people to get a good minister as cheap as possible—and if you think so, do just drop me a line, and say you have no manner of doubt of it. It will be popular, too; who can tell? [John Todd.

THE PRAYER ROOM.

A merchant of New York invited a clergyman to visit a store which he had fitted up with every convenience for his own use. After surveying the premises, the clergyman said to him, "There is yet one room wanting." "What is that?" inquired the merchant, "I cannot think of any thing else that I need." "A prayer-room," replied the clergyman, "a closet to which you can retire to pray when you have a little leisure, and especially when you are tempted to overreach a customer, or to do any wrong in your business transactions." "You are right," said the merchant, "the room shall be made;" and he has since testified that he has found it a most delightful place.

It is said of Robert Hall, that when he became heated in a controversy he would suddenly leave the room, and after a few moments return and calmly resume the discussion. It was understood that he had retired to pray against the natural infirmity of his temper. Would that every Christian merchant had his prayer-room at hand, to which he might flee when beset with covetousness, worldliness, or any business temptations, and be alone with Him that seeth in secret. How may acts, disreputable to the Christian name, would thus be avoided; how many after repentings spared. Why may not this improvement be generally introduced into the stores of Christians! The room should be strictly private, and its very design may be secret except as it should become known by its fruits. [Independent.

THE THIRTY YEARS' PRAYER.

At the weekly prayer meeting in ——, an aged, wealthy, and influential man entered, who, during a long life, had been seemingly indifferent to his spiritual welfare; and, to the surprise of all present, he rose under deep emotion, and asked the prayers of God's people for his own conversion. The next week he was again among them, apparently a penitent at the foot of the cross.

As the intelligence of his hopeful conversion spread the next day in the congregation, it reached an infirm and aged Christian, who had for years been confined to his house, and was daily waiting his summons to depart. On hearing it, he insisted on being carried to see the wealthy man, and would intrust his message to no one. After a long interview, he returned home rejoicing.

The cause of the infirm man's interest in this visit was perhaps known only to himself and his venerable pastor. Thirty years ago, as he was burning coal on the mountain-side, two of his neighbors visited his little shantee, found him engaged in reading his Bible and in prayer, and joined him in his devotions. Ere they separated, they agreed to meet again the next week on the mountain to pray, as did the Saviour; and from week to week they met in this quiet retreat, which proved indeed a Bethel. One evening they spoke of their wealthy neighbor, mourning that he was living for the world only, when he was so much needed in the church of Christ; and they at last entered into a written, secret covenant with each other, before God, not to cease praying for his conversion, until he should be brought in, or die, or they should all be called to their final account.

Years of prayer passed on, during which their faith failed not; one of the supplicants was at length called home; then another; and the old coal-burner, though left alone, yet persevered. Thirty years had passed when the above news reached him, his visit was made, and he came out of the house of his wealthy neighbor, saying, "Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." ANECDOTE OF MR. GUTHRIE.

Mr. Guthrie, an ancient Scotch divine, and author of "The Trial of a Saving Interest in Christ," was one evening traveling home very late. Having lost his way in a moor, he laid the reins on the neck of his horse, and committed himself to the direction of Providence. After long traveling over fields and ditches, the horse brought him to a farmer's house, into which he went, and requested permission to sit by the fire till morning, which was granted. A Popish priest was administering extreme unction to the mistress of the house, who was dying. Mr. Guthrie said nothing till the priest had retired; then he went forward to the dying woman, and asked her if she enjoyed peace in the prospect of death, in consequence of what the priest had said and done to her. She answered that she did not; on which he spoke to her of salvation through the atoning blood of the Redeemer. She understood and believed the message of mercy, as it fell from his lips, and she died actually triumphing in Jesus Christ her Saviour. After witnessing this astonishing scene, Mr. Guthrie mounted his horse, and rode home to Fenwick. On his arrival, he told Mrs. Guthrie that he had seen a great wonder during the night, "I came," said he, "to a farm-house, where I found a woman in a state of nature; I saw her in a state of grace; and left her in a state of glory."

I'M TOO BUSY.

A merchant sat at his office desk; various letters were spread before him; his whole being was absorbed in the intricacies of his business. A zealous friend of mankind entered the office.

"Mr. ——, I want to interest you a little in a new effort for a benevolent cause," said the good man.

The merchant cut him off by replying:

"Sir, you must excuse me, but really I'm too busy at present to do anything."

"When shall I call again, sir?"

"I cannot tell. I'm very busy. I'm busy every day. Excuse me, sir. I wish you good morning." Then bowing the intruder out of the office, he resumed the study of his papers. The merchant had frequently repulsed the friends of humanity in this manner. No matter what was their object, he was always too busy to listen to their claims. He had even told his minister that he was too busy for any thing but to make money.

But one morning a disagreeable stranger stepped very softly to his side, laying a cold, moist hand upon his brow, and saying, "Go home with me." The merchant laid down his pen; his head grew dizzy; his stomach felt faint and sick; he left the counting room, went home, and retired to his bed chamber. His new, unwelcome visitor had followed him, and now took his place by the bedside, whispering ever and anon, "You must go with me." A cold chill settled on the merchant's heart, dim spectres of ships, notes and lands fluttered before his excited mind. Still his pulse beat slower; his heart heaved heavily, thick films gathered over his eyes, his tongue refused to speak. Then the merchant knew that the name of his visitor was Death!

All other claimants on his attention, except the friends of Mammon, had always found a quick dismissal in the magic phrase "I'm too busy." Humanity, Mercy, Religion, had alike begged his influence, means, and attention in vain. But when Death came, the excuse was powerless; he was compelled to have leisure to die. Let us beware how we make ourselves too busy to secure life's great end. When the excuse rises to our lips, and we are about to say we are too busy to do good, let us remember we cannot be too busy to die.

JONAH IN THE WHALE.—In the cavity of the whale, a safe and practicable asylum is afforded—not, indeed, in the stomach, but in another cavity of the whale; the throat is large, and is provided with a bay or intestines, so considerable in size, that whales frequently take into it two of their young ones when weak, especially during a tempest. In this vessel are two vents, which serve for inspiration and respiration; and here, in all probability, Jonah was preserved, not, indeed, without a miracle, but with that economy of miracle so frequently exemplified in the Scriptures.

EXPENDITURE FOR COLPORTAGE.—During its last fical year, the American Tract Society expended for Colportage (including salaries of Superintendents, expenses of Depositaries, Freight, &c.) $79,073 82. The amount of time employed in actual service was equal to the labors of one man for 264 years; 552,538 families were visited, and 625,739 volumes were circulated, including 137,115 bestowed, gratuitously. The average cost of a year's labor was $299 10.

"DENOMINATIONAL SINS."

Prophets who faithfully expose the corruptions of a people, and lift the warning voice, are not apt to be welcome messengers. We knew this, when we penned our remarks upon "Denominational Sins," and it does not surprise us to find such confirmation of it as is afforded in the subjoined communication. The writer speaks of what he witnessed "near sixty years ago." We judge, therefore, that he is an old man; and though "the hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness," we cannot help expressing our profound regret, that his gray hairs have been enlisted in the work of apologizing for those who neglect to pray in their families. An old man, more than threescore years of age, standing forth as an opposer of those reformatory measures which aim at the resuscitation of our people from spiritual death! Could he not have found better work? Could he not have employed his trembling hand in writing something more suitable to one who must so soon answer to God for the example he has set before his younger brethren, and the influence he has exerted upon them?

We call him an opposer. For what does his communication amount to besides an attempt to make family prayer appear ridiculous? What else is the meaning of his reference to the Narraganset Indians and the New Lights? And why is he so conveniently ignorant of the import of the term "concert," as applied to prayer? He seems to think the term misapplied, when used with reference to any thing but musical sounds. He knows what a concert of music is, but does not know what is meant by a concert of prayer, and asks to be enlightened. To the Dictionary, then; Noah Webster, we presume, is good authority. The first definition which he gives, is "agreement of two or more in a design or plan; union formed by mutual communication of opinions and views; accordance in a scheme; harmony; as, the allies were frustrated for want of concert in their operations; [illegible] the pope acted in concert." Now, if Dr. Webster is to be depended on, we presume that the phrase "concert of prayer" expresses just what our Saviour intended when He said, "If two of you shall AGREE on earth as touching any thing they shall ask," &c.

Our correspondent manifests some sensitiveness, because we have exposed the faults of our people to the world. We are glad that he is not past all feeling on this point; it betokens some misgivings, on his part, that the practice under review is wrong, notwithstanding his labored attempt to extenuate it. But what shall we do? Go on a wearied pilgrimage over the entire denomination, and talk personally with every brother who may be guilty? We will undertake such a mission, if our correspondent will furnish the funds to bear us out in it; and, God giving grace for the duty, we verily believe that a more useful mission could not be attempted. This, our brother probably thinks, would be the "gospel-wise" course. But what reason is there for censuring us on this ground? We have particularized no individuals; we have called no names; and from all that we ever wrote, no one could have dreamed that we had allusion to "J. S." Nothing but his own communication gives any one reason to think, that he is one of the guilty.

But how shall we cover up this matter? Charity covereth a multitude of sins, we know; but how are we to keep the world from knowing, that our brethren neglect family prayer? Some of them have men of the world constantly in their employ. Their tables supply them with food through the day, and their beds furnish them with lodging at night. But these men of the world know, that the head of the family goes to rest at night, without calling his household together for worship; for they are witnesses of the fact. They know, that he never summons them in the morning; for they see him, in all his movements from sunrise till dark. They know, that he neglects to invoke God's blessing at meal-time; for they sit always at the same table with him. Thus the master of the house proclaims his own sin.

Again, we have had this question up for discussion at our Associations. The spiritual among us have there mourned over the evil; they have boldly announced the fact, that it does exist among us, to a deplorable extent; they have expressed themselves in terms of as unmeasured severity as any that ever we employed; and all this, too, in the hearing of worldly people who were present. And then, to make it still more public, their resolutions on the subject were recorded, printed in the minutes, and published to the world. Was it "gospel-wise" to do so?

Alas! we cannot keep this matter secret. As well may we undertake to "hide the wind, and the ointment of the right-hand, which betrayeth itself." Prov. 27: 16. Out it will come; and, brethren, far better is it, that your smiting should come from the hand of him who is with you, and prays for your welfare, than from those who are ready to say, Aha! aha! Great God Almighty, put far off the day when our denominational Zion shall be made the reproach of the foolish.

We said, "We speak what we know, when we testify, that there are families among us, whose heads are in good standing as church members, in which no prayer is offered in the morning, none in the evening, and not even a blessing asked at meal times." But our correspondent labors to establish an infinitely remote probability, that we have been "deceived, or imposed upon," because "it is not to be supposed that we could be present, or an eye-witness, in every case," &c. But he shall not take off the edge of our reproof in this way. Our traveling in the denomination has been pretty extensive. Within the bounds of the three largest of our Associations, there are but few churches that we have not visited, and we have lodged in a great many different houses. And we do know, that in a very great number of instances, when bed-time approached, our host has attempted to show us to our chamber, without giving the least token that it was his custom to convene the family for worship. And when we have inquired, "Is it not your custom to have family worship?" the frank reply has been, "No, sir." Again, when we have first proposed to the master of the house to unite in prayer before retiring, the reply has been, "Well, if you wish to do so, we shall make no objection," or something of like nature; indicating, most unmistakably, that the exercise was never attended to by himself. And in frequent instances, where we have attempted to introduce it, the manner in which it has been met showed that father and mother, children and servants, were entirely unaccustomed to any such proceeding. We can assure our correspondent, therefore, that we are not such an incompetent witness as he would fain make our readers believe.

We do not know whether the paper was established for the purpose of publishing our denominational sins, or not. We do not care. But we do know, that if it winks at known abominations, and daubs with untempered mortar, and prophesies smooth things for the gratification of those who will not endure sound doctrine, the curse of Heaven will rest upon it, and upon all who uphold it. We lift up our voice, again, repeating what we have said, "that our people are grossly and criminally negligent of family prayer." T. B. B.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

In your editorial of June 2d, under the head of "Denominational Sins," the following paragraph appears:—

> "We must add, that our people are grossly and criminally negligent of family prayer. We are ashamed to place it on record, knowing the opinion that will consequently be formed of us by all the pious, and perhaps the impious, of the land. But it is what God has always known. We speak what we know, when we testify, that there are families among us whose heads are in good standing as church members, in which no prayer is offered in the morning, none in the evening, and not even a blessing is asked at meal-time."

Now I think this a rather uncharitable, sweeping denunciation. But suppose it is a reality, and that you suppose some of the brethren are guilty of a criminal act; is it gospel-wise for you to publish it to the world in the most public manner within your reach? or ought you not first to submit yourself to the gospel rule? especially as the paper was not established for the purpose of publishing our "denominational sins." I think no one would be likely to be brought to repentance and godly sorrow by that mode of procedure.

Now I am disposed to be a little more charitable. You say we know there is no prayer in the morning, none in the evening, &c. Now, I think it is probable you have been deceived, or in some way imposed upon, as it is not to be supposed that you could be present or an eye-witness in every case, and then it is so difficult to decide when prayer is made, and when not, that I would not like to be a judge in the case, believing that none but God can decide the question.

Perhaps you hold to the opinion, that prayer, to be acceptable, must be vocal and public; but it would seem rather improbable, when the positive, unconditional precept of our Saviour stands so fairly and openly opposed to it. "But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." You have not noticed this injunction as having a bearing on the case, any further than to show that it has been superseded by Matt. 18: 19—"If two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing they shall ask," &c. To this you reply, "We infer, therefore, the importance of father and mother uniting together in supplicating the divine blessing upon their family; and if two of the family may unite together in this exercise, so may three or four, and finally the entire household." And you may as well add, the whole church and congregation. A very easy way of disposing of one of Christ's most positive precepts.

Perhaps I do not understand the term concert in the sense in which you use it. A concert of music I understand, but a concert of prayer I do not. I confess my ignorance, and ask to be enlightened. If I were required to form a concert of prayer, I think I should incline to adopt the custom or to take my model from the Narraganset Indians after they became religious. At the close of their meetings, all those who were disposed to join in the concert (if a concert it could be called) would range themselves together by the side of the house, generally numbering from half a dozen to a dozen, and commence praying vocally, with much uniformity of voice, not confined to the same words. I confess I have been very much edified by their exercises. But how would that practice be received in a New York audience? I have seen something a little similar among the New Lights, near 60 years ago. I suppose I have seen twenty or more on their feet at once, in a crowded room, praying at the top of their voices; no order in beginning or ending—each one commenced when the Spirit moved, and ended in the same manner, or when the Spirit left him. Far behind the Indian, thought I to myself. At other times, I have attended the Friends' meetings; one of them happened to be a silent one; but I never heard a prayer in one of them. Should I call them criminal, because they had no concert?

As to the opinion that will be formed of us by others, and your fears of the consequences, I think your course in publishing their faults or crimes will not abate the evil. If we can obtain the blessing and approbation of our Father which seeth in secret, we need not fear their words, nor their malice. My belief is, that no religious body of persons has any authority to say how long or how often a person shall pray, or whether in public or in private or "at meal-times," any more than a political body has a right to say whether I shall work on the seventh day of the week or not, provided I do not disturb my neighbor. Did the first Sabbatarians stop to inquire what the public or their brethren would think of them for violating their holy Sabbath? It was no doubt painful to differ and separate from them, but having the fear of God before their eyes, and his law for their guide and direction, I believe their course was onward, setting at nought the jeers and opinions of other people.

I have no doubt that our Saviour, when he instituted private prayer, had some important evil in view; and the frequent reference to hypocrites praying in the streets and synagogues that they may be seen of men, and the terrible woes pronounced upon them, leaves no doubt in my mind what it was, and to whom it was directed; but whether we have any similar characters at the present day, is not for me to say, but I should hesitate to answer in the negative; but of one thing I think we may be certain, that there will be no hypocrisy displayed in the closet, after the door is shut. BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Telegraph—Maynooth Grant—Scotch Church Assemblies—Protestantism in Tuscany.

GLASGOW, June 4, 1852.

This week Ireland has been connected with England by submarine telegraph—the cable, of 68 miles length, having been extended from Howth to Holyhead. In a few days it is intended to sink another wire from Portpatrick to Donaghadee, thus connecting directly Scotland with Ireland also. Other two lines, it is said, are further projected. Will these connections Christianize or civilize Ireland, while her priesthood, the slaves of Rome, remain the same? In the House of Commons, which resumed business last night, after the Whitsuntide holidays, one of its most important transactions was the voting £1570. 6. 2. for the encouragement of horse racing in Ireland. How far will this go to redeem the morality of that unhappy land? Her priesthood are deprecating emigration, since the publication of Mullen's letter as to those who settle in America leaving Popery when they leave their native land. By the way, in referring to him, in a former communication, as having written from New York, I ought to have mentioned Mullen as only being temporarily in America, having been sent to the United States by Primate Cullen, to seek funds for the Irish Roman Catholic University. Eight hundred and forty-three Petitions, with 309,565 signatures, have been presented to the House of Commons for the repeal of the Maynooth Popish College Grant. The discussion on this subject is to be resumed in the House on Tuesday, first. In the two Ecclesiastical Assemblies, which have finished their session in Edinburgh, petitions against the continuance of the Grant were adopted. Indeed, while many fear the political difficulties standing in the way of its repeal, we believe there are few Protestants who do not regard that College as a curse to the country.

Since last I wrote, the Assembly of the Established Church have deposed another of their ministers, Mr. McLean, of Campbelton, for intemperance, falsehood, and fraud; and the Free Church Assembly have suspended another of their ministers, Mr. Jonathan R. Anderson, of Glasgow, remitting the case to his Presbytery to serve him with a libel for calumniating brother ministers and elders, and equivocation and contumacy in the proceedings to which this gave rise. He is one of the high Calvinistic preachers, and seems to be correctly described, in reference to his conduct, as also practically antinomian.

The Free Church Assembly had a lengthened discussion on a proposed modification of the plan of the Sustentation Fund, as the collection made for the maintenance of their ministers is termed. My cousin, Dr. Begg of Edinburgh, has been the most strenuous opponent of the proposed alteration, on the ground that it would authorize and require their Committee to tax each congregation according to their estimate of what they could afford to pay. A majority of the Presbyteries have approved the proposed alteration, but the Assembly have agreed to postpone farther action upon it for a year, while they have also modified in some degree the measure itself. Another prominent matter at this Assembly has been their receiving into union a majority of the ministers of the original Secession Church. This is the denomination with which Dr. McCrie, the biographer of John Knox, was in connection, and of which a son of his is at present an influential minister. The majority which determined on proposing the union was no more than a majority, thirty-one having opposed the proposal, while only thirty-two carried the motion. The minority, whose congregations are the most numerous, regard the union as a departure from their principles—as the Free Church does not hold the binding obligation of the Covenants sworn by their Presbsterian forefathers, which the other Church has hitherto professed. The uniting party are, however, permitted to maintain and avow this descending obligation.

The Protestant movement in Tuscany continues, notwithstanding the fierce persecution with which it is opposed. The Scriptures continue to be read and prized, but twenty of the convests are in prison or in exile. In Sweden, also, religious affairs are becoming more embroiled. The Consistories are exhibiting the melancholy spectacle of hundreds of free citizens cited before them for conscience sake. From Berlin, on the other hand, it is stated that a conflict has arisen between the new Regent of Baden and the Romish Archbishop—the latter having interfered with the State arrangements for the funeral of the late Duke, which gave great offense.

The Times of yesterday publishes some farther correspondence relative to the ships on the iceberg seen from the Renovation in April last year. The impression is gaining ground, that they were the ships of Sir John Franklin—although no clue is thereby given to the fate of those who formerly were in them. Seven years have passed away since they left this country; and it seems to grow less probable that any of them ever will return. J. A. BEGG.

THE CHURCH A DIVINE INSTITUTION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

In the fourth paragraph of the remarks of Bro. Brown upon Bro. Crandall's article, headed "Associational Power," we read:

"Individuals are united in church fellowship, in obedience to a requisition from the Lord Jesus Christ. The church is a divine institution, and though the believer's act of connecting himself with it is a voluntary act, it is not optional with him whether to do it or not. He cannot refuse to do it without sinning against Christ."

I wish to inquire in what respect the church is a divine institution, and whether all of the various organizations which are called churches are this divine institution, or which of them is the true divine institution, or whether that body of all true believers in all ages is the divine institution? I ask for information; for it is a subject which has troubled me much. I am seeking truth for truth's sake. Will Bro. Brown give his views? S. S. G.

Reply.

The term church sometimes denotes the whole company of the redeemed. In this sense it is used in Eph. 5: 23, 25, 27. Col. 1: 18, 24. Eph. 1: 22, and 3: 10. Matt. 16: 18.

The term is more commonly applied, however, to a company of believers meeting regularly for the worship of God in one place, and observing the ordinances of the gospel. For this use of the term, see 1 Cor. 14: 23, Rom. 16: 5, 1 Cor. 1: 2, Col. 4: 15, Philemon 2, Acts 2: 47, 1 Cor. 11: 20 and 14: 23.

These things being premised, our reply is as follows:—

The church is a divine institution in the same sense as the family is a divine institution. For though every family is not governed and regulated in accordance with the principles taught in the word of God, any more than every church is, nevertheless the family compact, as such, is of divine appointment. Or, in the same sense as government is a divine institution. For though every form of government is not according to the divine model, and the administrations of some of them seem to be little better than exercises of oppression, it is undeniable, that the great principle of subordination to ruling authorities is of divine appointment. Rom. 13: 1, &c. So any company of believers meeting together statedly for the worship of God, and for the observance of Christ's ordinances, is a church of divine institution.

But a society thus meeting together may not be in a state of order. It may not be organized in strict accordance with the divine pattern. It may not be governed, nor its ordinances administered, in agreement with the model furnished in the New Testament. Of "the various organizations which are called churches," we suppose most to be in this state of disorder, to a greater or less extent. The organization which, in our opinion, is conformed to the inspired pattern, is—

1. An independent or congregational church; one which manages its own discipline, without being amenable to any other judicatory on earth.

2. It is a church composed of those who have been immersed in water, on profession of their faith in Jesus Christ.

3. It often shows forth the Lord's death, in the celebration of the Supper.

4. It is a Sabbath, and not a Sunday-keeping church.

5. Its officers are are bishops and deacons. The union of several different congregations under one visible head, whether called Pope, Patriarch, Bishop, or by any other name, is not taught in the New Testament.

6. It is a missionary church, aiming to extend the knowledge of the gospel to every creature, according to the commission, Matt. 28: 19, Mark 16 15. T. B. B.

EAST NEW JERSEY BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.—The yearly convocation of the Baptist churches in East New Jersey, by their delegates, took place this year at Piscataway, on the 1st and 2d insts. The Association embraces 35 churches, and its anniversary meetings are largely attended, and generally seasons of much social and spiritual enjoyment. Rev. Josiah Hatt, of Hoboken, was the preacher of the annual sermon, whose theme was the divine energy of the Gospel; Rom. 1: 16, "It is the power of God unto salvation," &c., being his text. In addition to delegates, each church sends up its annual epistle, containing a review of its history, and full statistics. These letters, the present year, discover a healthy and prosperous condition of the churches. The number of baptisms reported was 202, in part the result of gentle refreshings enjoyed on several of the hills of Zion. An increased liberality and Christian enterprise were also apparent, four new churches having been organized within its limits, and the contributions to benevolent objects very generally increased. A sermon was also preached by Rev. William Rollinson, missionary elect to California, from Ps. 50: 2; and several addresses upon the importance of new endeavors in the supply of an able ministry, were listened to with marked interest, after which over two hundred dollars were collected to promote the objects of the New Jersey Baptist Education Society.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN WISCONSIN.

WALWORTH, Wisconsin, June 9, 1852.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I have long known that the people called "Seventh-day Baptists" have been laboring, since the formation of the several state Governments, under some legal oppressions that other religious denominations were not subject to. At an early period in life I was impressed by my parents with a belief that all religions should be equally protected, or rather, that they should be equally permitted by law. Subsequent observation and reflection have confirmed me in the belief that the peculiar genius of our State Constitutions originally contemplated a perfect and equal religious freedom in the United States; yet I have observed, that from some cause or other that desirable and equal state of religious freedom does not really and practically exist. Without attempting at this time to point to all the cases where the laws formed under the several State Constitutions infringe upon equal religious liberty, I will mention only one, viz. that class of Christians before mentioned are in all the States, except Wisconsin, liable (for debt) to have their lands and tenements, goods and chattels, sold on execution on the seventh day of the week, commonly called Saturday, which is the day they observe as a Sabbath; while other Christians, who observe the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, are not at all liable to the same legal inconvenience; that is, they are not liable to have their property sold on execution on the day they observe as a Sabbath.

I am aware that, by the courtesy of creditors and officers, the circumstance of being "sold out on execution on Saturday," does not very often occur to the Seventh-day Baptists, and that consequently some persons among them, unacquainted with the existing laws on that subject in the several States, infer that the individuals of that denomination have an equality of legal religious rights with their neighbors who observe the first day of the week as a Sabbath; yet the circumstance does sometimes actually occur, and has occurred to one of my neighbors in this State; and the exemption is entirely by courtsey, and not by law.

I am aware, too, that the sale of a man's property on execution on the day he chooses to observe as a Sabbath, does not hinder him from adopting any system of religious belief and practice; yet, after all, it is calculated to disturb that religious equanimity of mind that is proper for a reflecting and rational man to feel and enjoy during his devotional exercises on the day which he believes to be a Sabbath day.

In some of the older States, the Seventh-day Baptists have for two hundred years past sought at the hands of the Legislatures, and without redress, for that equality of legal religious privileges to which they are properly entitled, and which all persons in these United States, observing the first day of the week as a Sabbath, have by the laws secured to them. Having long known and considered these facts, I took occasion, as a member of the Wisconsin Legislature, to introduce last winter the following bill, which passed both Houses, and became a law of the State of Wisconsin:—

The people of the State of Wisconsin, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

Section 1. That whenever an execution or other final process shall be issued against the goods and chattels, or lands and tenements, of any person who habitually observes the seventh day of the week instead of the first as a day of rest, the officer to whom such process shall be directed shall not levy upon or sell any property of such person on the seventh day of the week, commonly called Saturday: Provided, the said person shall file with or deliver to such officer an affidavit in writing, setting forth the fact, that he or she (as the case may be) habitually keeps and observes the seventh day of the week instead of the first as a day of rest, at any time before such sale, as the case may be; and such sale may, at the time appointed therefor, be adjourned to any day within the life of the execution, or such execution may be renewed, as in other cases.

Section 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved, March 11th, 1852.

Now, sirs, I think that the mere fact of preventing the forced sale of a man's property on the day he observes as a Sabbath, is the smallest merit this law has. The fact that it secures to a respectable Christian denomination of people certain individual rights for which they have long sought in vain, in this and in other and older States, will be pleasing to every liberal-minded man, and will be creditable to the Christian liberality of the Legislature of this State.

Very truly your friend, LEWIS N. WOOD.

SABBATH-SCHOOL ANNIVERSARY.—We learn from the Literary Echo, (Westerly, R. I.,) that the Temperance Valley and Potter Hill Sabbath-Schools held their first anniversary meeting at the meeting-house of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, on the 5th inst. The services were commenced with prayer by Elder D. Coon. After the singing of a hymn, Elder L. Crandall delivered a discourse on the object and benefits of Sabbath-schools, duties and responsibilities of teachers, proper age for children to attend Sabbath-schools, &c. Elder H. Clark then made a few remarks on the advantages, privileges and responsibilities of scholars, and the duty of parents in this connection. He was followed by Elder D. Coon, in a comparison of the privileges enjoyed by children of the present day with those of former times, and a few words of encouragement to scholars. Reports of the present condition of the schools were then read, from which the schools seem to be in a flourishing condition, and the friends of Sabbath-schools are thus encouraged to go on in their endeavors to impart religious instruction to the rising generation.

BEQUESTS TO OUR SOCIETIES.—A friend asks us to state "in what way the different institutions of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination should be described in a will, to have it proper and legal." We hope it will not be long before our Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies will be regularly incorporated, and known in law, so that it will only be necessary correctly to mention their names to enable them to recover bequests like individuals. Until that is done—(and we hope no one having a good purpose in his heart will wait for it)—the following form, adopted by the Tract Society, will probably answer all purposes:—

"I bequeath to my executors the sum of ——— dollars, in trust, to pay over the same, in ——— months after my decease, to the person who, when the same shall be payable, shall act as Treasurer of the 'American Sabbath Tract Society, organized in Plainfield, N. J., 1843,' to be applied to the charitable uses and purposes of the said Society, and under its direction."

Using the above form, our Missionary Society should be descibed as "The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society, organized at Plainfield, N. J., in 1843," and our Publishing Society as "The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society, organized at New York in 1849."

MISSIONARIES RETURNED FROM SHANGHAE.—The ship Adelaide, from Shanghae, arrived at New York last week, bringing Dr. and Mrs. Bridgman, with a Chinese pupil; Dr. Boone's wife and two children, and a Chinese nurse; Rev. Mr. Taylor's wife, two children, and nurse; and a little son of Mr. Syle. Dr. Bridgman, we understand, intends to be back to his station in a year from the time of leaving it.

By the Adelaide we received letters from brethren Carpenter and Wardner, dated Feb. 2d, at which time they and their families were well.

A SUNDAY QUESTION.—The Common Council of Williamsburgh recently passed an ordinance which forbade the opening of butchers' shops on Sunday mornings for the sale of meat. Mayor Berry vetoed it. The Board rejected the veto on the ground that more than ten days had transpired after its passage previous to the veto. The difference between the Mayor and Aldermen is whether the Sundays shall be counted in the ten days. That is emphatically a Sunday question.

ONE OF THE DARK PLACES OF THE EARTH.—Mr. Hunt, a Wesleyan missionary among the Fejees, who are cannibals of the worst description, states that 500 persons had been eaten in five years, within 15 miles of his residence. Some of them eat raw human flesh, and chew it as sailors do tobacco. They sometimes eat their best friends. When parents grow old, they are killed by their children. Sometimes they are buried alive or thrown to the sharks. Women, on the death of their husbands, are killed.

METHODIST SUNDAY SCHOOLS.—The Pastoral Address of the General Conference states that there are connected with the Churches of the Conference 93,561 teachers, and 473,311 scholars in the Sunday School. In the libraries, 1,260,558 volumes. In the last five years, there has been an increase of 32,741 teachers and 152,681 scholars. The number of conversions in these schools is estimated to be not less than 47,000.

RETURNING OF MISSIONARIES.—On the 11th inst., the brig Lowder, arrived at New York from Sierra Leone, which port she left on the 6th of May. Among her passengers were Rev. J. L. Wilson and lady, belonging to the missions of the American Board at Gaboon, and Rev. J. W. Roberts and lady of the Methodist Episcopal Mission at Liberia.

RETURNING MISSIONARY.—The Morning Star says that the Free-Will Baptist Missionary to India, Mr. Bachelor, and his family, have arrived safely in England. They had an unusually long passage, and suffered considerable from sickness. They were to leave for America as soon as the state of their health would permit.

WHAT A REVIVAL IN COLLEGE DOES.—At the revival in Princeton College, in 1815, there were thirteen converts. M'Ilvaine, Bishop of Ohio; Jones, Bishop of Virginia; M'Lean and Hodge, professors of Princeton; and Armstrong, late Secretary of the American Board, were among the number.

THE MAINE LAW IN MINNESOTA.—At St. Paul, Minnesota, a short time ago, four thousand dollars worth of liquor was seized, under the operation of the Liquor Law. The owner was fined $20, and the liquor declared forfeited. An appeal was taken, however, and bonds given to prosecute it.

TEMPERANCE POLITICS.—At the meeting of the N. Y. State Temperance Society, last week, there was a spirited discussion upon proposed political action, and a determination was evinced to secure the election of a Legislature who will enact the Maine Law.

THEOLOGICAL GRADUATES.—The fifteenth annual Commencement of the Union Theological Seminary in the City of New York, was held on Fourth-day of last week, when twenty-one students were graduated.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.—A private letter states that Gen. Urquiza, who succeeds Rosas as Governor of Buenos Ayres, has authorized the reading of the Bible in schools, and made liberal appropriations for their support.

In the Connecticut House of Assembly, on the 17th inst., the Maine Liquor Law was lost by a vote of 114 to 105.

"We part on this green Islet, Love."—Our table is graced with a piece of music adapted to Mrs. Sarah B. Judson's farewell to her husband, "We part on this green Islet, Love;" composed by Rev. L. Crandall; ar[illegible] for the piano forte by H. Craven Grif[illegible] dicated to Md'lle A. M. Crandall, pi[illegible] Alfred Academy; published by Gould & Berry, 297 Broadway, N. Y. Our educa[illegible] in semibreves and demisemiquavers is not extensive, and our opinion of the merits of this music, formed from glancing at the sheets alone, would not probably be worth much; but we are assured by competent authorities—what we should expect from its authorship—that it is of a very high order. The lines to which it is adapted we never read without admiring the heroic spirit they breathe, and lamenting its rarity. Our readers will thank us, we know, for copying them, though they have been a thousand times printed.

We part on this green islet, love,
Thou for the eastern main,
I for the setting sun, love—
Oh! when to meet again?

My heart is sad for thee, love;
For long thy way will be,
And oft thy tears will fall, love,
For thy children and for me.

Yet my spirit clings to thine, love,
Thy soul remains with me,
And oft will hold communion sweet
O'er the dark and distant sea.

And who can paint our mutual joy,
When, all our wanderings o'er,
We both shall clasp our infants three,
At home, on Burmah's shore.

But higher shall our raptures glow,
On yon celestial plain,
When th' loved and parted here below
Meet ne'er to part again.

Then gird thine armor on, love,
Nor faint thou by the way,
Till Boodh shall fall, and Burmah's sons
Shall own Messiah's sway.

New York State Teachers' Association.—The seventh annual meeting of the New York State Teachers' Association will be held in the village of Elmira, Chemung County, commencing on the first Wednesday in August next, at 10 o'clock, A. M., and continuing at least two days. Elmira being situated on the New York and Erie Railroad, in the central southern portion of the State, and being but a few hours ride from the two extreme cities, New York on the east and Buffalo on the west, it is expected on this account that there will be a larger number in attendance than there has been for several years past.

Reports and addresses on various subjects specially interesting to those who are engaged in teaching, are announced. Miss Elizabeth Howard, of Tioga County, is expected to read an essay: subject—"The state of education on the island of Hayti." Among the general subjects for discussion are mentioned, "The Albany University," "Randall's Amendments to our School System," "Operation of the present School Law," "The subject of establishing a State Board of Examiners, with Auxiliary County Boards."

Finances of Connecticut.—From the annual report of the Controller of Connecticut we learn that the receipts into the Treasury the past year amounted to $145,854 63, and the expenditures, exclusive of the debt paid, to $109,847 53. During the year, the judicial expenses were diminished $17,507. There was in the Treasury, at the close of the fiscal year, March 31, 1852, a balance of $31,843 33. The Hartford Courier, in noticing the Report with just pride remarks:—

"A few particulars are suggested by the Report. In the first place, we are gratified at the prosperous condition of our little Republic. We owe nothing. We have a School Fund of more than two millions of dollars, and a reserved fund of $406,000. We can boast of being a community that annually pays out for the education of the children of the State more than we receive in taxes, more, in fact, than the whole amount of our Treasury receipts. Where is the community, the State, the nation, that can equal ours?"

To Members of 2d Alfred Church.—At the annual meeting of the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred, N. Y., held June 13, 1852, it was, on motion,

Resolved, That all non-resident members of this church who do not communicate with us, by writing or otherwise, indicating a desire to retain their membership in the church, within one year from this date, are hereby dismissed, as having gone out from among us.

By order of the Church,
C. D. Langworthy, Clerk.

Movements of Kossuth.—Gov. Kossuth is now in New York, where, at the request of numerous friends, he delivered an address on the evening of the 21st inst. Tickets were sold at one dollar each, the proceeds to be applied for the benefit of his mother and sisters, who are expected soon to reach New York. Kossuth has dismissed a large part of his attendants, and is now stopping at a boarding house in Sixteenth-street. The N. Y. Tribune says that the total amount of "material aid" secured in America is about $90,000.

The Whig National Convention to nominate candidates for President and Vice President of the United States, assembled at Baltimore on Third-day of last week. Up to Sabbath afternoon, forty-six ballots were taken, the average of which was 133 votes for Scott, 129 for Fillmore, and 30 for Webster. At this stage of affairs, the Convention adjourned over Sunday. On Monday morning several unsuccessful ballots were taken, but the fifty-third showed 158 votes for Scott, 112 for Fillmore, 21 for Webster. So Gen. Winfield Scott was declared the Whig candidate for the Presidency. William A. Graham, of North Carolina, for the Vice-Presidency.

Governor Boutwell, of Massachusetts, recently nominated Seth J. Thomas, Esq., of Charlestown, to the office of Prison Inspector, and the Council rejected the nomination. Mr. Thomas was counsel for the owner of the slave, Sims, who was reclaimed as a fugitive slave by his master in Georgia.

SECOND-DAY, JUNE 14.

In the Senate, a large number of petitions were presented, including a batch in favor of the Homestead Bill. The resolution providing for the selection of a Committee of three to inquire into the expediency of purchasing Catlin's Indian collection, was taken up and adopted. The Patentee Bill was then taken up, but the members dropped out, one by one, until "no quorum" was left, and adjournment became necessary.

In the House, nothing of interest was done, political speeches being the order of the day. Mr. Gentry, of Tennessee, spoke in opposition to the nomination of Gen. Scott, and replied to a previous speech of Mr. Stanley. The latter gentleman replied, and the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, JUNE 15.

The Senate had a short session, but did nothing worth recording. Adjourned until Sabbath-day, so as to let the members attend the Whig Convention at Baltimore to nominate a President.

The House voted, soon after opening, to adjourn until Sixth-day.

[Both Houses having adjourned to give those who desired a chance to go to Baltimore, there was no session on Fourth-day or Fifth-day.]

[On Sixth-day, the House met, and, without commencing business, adjourned over to Second-day. The Senate did not meet.]

European News.

The steamship Europa, with Liverpool dates to June 5, arrived at New York June 16th. We give the substance of her news, which is not important.

The submarine telegraph from Holyhead to Ireland is all laid down successfully, though the submerged wire is 70 miles long, and 18 hours were occupied in putting it under the water. A rival line is about to be put down across from the Scottish shore. It looks as if the next step must be a line across from Ireland to Newfoundland, and so on till it connects with our present line to Halifax.

In France, public opinion appears to be in favor of a reduction of the army, and the non-appointment of a Minister of Police. A rumor is revived, for the third or fourth time, that the Orleans confiscations are about to be compromised. A tax is to be imposed upon horses and dogs. Convicts continue to be shipped off to Cayenne.

Seyd-Pasha, hereditary Prince of Egypt, and eldest surviving son of Mehemet Ali, has arrived at Marseilles, on board a French ship-of-war. The ostensible cause of his visit is to recruit his health at the mineral springs at Mont d'Or.

The Roman Police are using every means to prevent the introduction of foreign newspapers into the Papal States. English journals are charged letter postage by weight.

The fate of Edward Murray excites much interest among the British residents at Rome, as well as in England. Great efforts have been made to procure his release. His wife and mother, accompanied by an infant child, threw themselves at the Pope's feet on the way to the church, and presented a petition for pardon. The Pope took the petition, but, as yet, has returned no answer.

An accident happened to the railway train that conveyed the Emperor of Russia and suite to Warsaw on 27th May. The train ran off the track, and two carriages were smashed, but none of the passengers were injured.

A Congressman in a Fracas.

Hon. F. B. McMullen, of Virginia, who was a passenger from New York to Philadelphia in the train which started at 5½ o'clock June 15th, became involved in a difficulty on the route, the particulars of which are about as follows:—

At New Brunswick, Mr. McMullen got out of the cars, during the halt of the train, to take some refreshment, leaving his umbrella in his seat. When he returned, he found his place occupied by Mr. R. M. Titsworth, of Plainfield, New Jersey, and his lady. Mr T., it seems, seeing the seat vacant, had taken it, without intending to intrude.

Mr. McMullen informed him that he had his place, and that he wanted it. Mr. Titsworth, understanding him to ask for his umbrella, handed it to him. Mr. McM. told him it was the seat, and not the umbrella, he described, and insisted upon the place being immediately vacated, saying as some objection was made by Mr. T., that he was determined to have it, and that if he could not get it by fair means, he would resort to a forcible ejectment.

At this juncture the lady interfered, and persuaded Mr. Titsworth to vacate the seat, which was done. Mr. Titsworth took occasion, however, to tell the inexorable M. C., in the plainest and most peremptory terms, that he was no gentleman to behave in the manner he had done, particularly as there was a lady in the case.

Mr. McMullen, it appears, in the excitement, either had not noticed the lady, or at any rate it had not occurred to him that she was under the protection of Mr. Titsworth. His reply was that he would hold Mr. T. responsible for the language he used, and he said to him that if he (Mr. T.) had only intimated to him (Mr. McM.) that he wished the seat for the lady, it would have been cheerfully resigned.

Nothing further happened until the passengers took the boat at Tacony for Philadelphia. After thay had steamed about half way down the river, and were running close to the Pennsylvania shore, Mr. McMullen, smarting under the imputation of being no gentleman, encountered Mr. Titsworth on the deck, near the Captains's office, and insisted upon his taking back the opprobrious epithets in which he had indulged at his (Mr. McM.'s) expense.

This Mr. T. refused to do, and reiterated the offensive words. Whereupon, Mr. McMullen assaulted him with a cane, having a heavy horn handle, striking him over the head, and breaking the stick. He was going to repeat the blows, but the bystanders interfered and prevented him.

Lieut. Walter A. Watkins, of the Police, chanced to be aboard the steamer—the Trenton—and took Mr. McMullen into custody. The honorable gentleman, as soon as the boat reached the city, was brought before Alderman Ogle, and after an examination, was ordered to enter into a recognizance in the sum of $1,000 to appear at the Court of Quarter Sessions to answer the charge of committing an aggravated assault and battery.

Among the witnesses recognized before the magistrate, besides the complainant, were Hon. Thomas B. Florence, M. C., and Rev. A. D. Gillette, and Mr. Isaac S. Dunham. Mr. Gillette witnessed the occurrence in the cars, and thought Mr. McMullen decidedly to blame.

Railroad Accident in Michigan.

It is our painful task, says the Coldwater (Mich.) Sentinel of June 12, to record a serious accident on the Southern road, which occurred through the agency of some demon in human shape, and resulted in the loss of two lives, the placing of hundreds of others in jeopardy, and a great destruction of property.

After the passage of the down trains, Friday evening, some villain prepared to run off the express passenger train due soon after, by unlocking or breaking the lock to the switch of a gravel side track. The side track was a short one, terminating in front of a heavy bank. The train arrived from the east in the night, at a speed of about thirty-five miles an hour, and the first notice of danger was given by the concussion of the train. The speed was such that the locomotive was driven into the bank clear up to the smoke pipe. One fireman was thrown through the window, his life being saved. The engineer, Harvey Spalding, and the other fireman, were caught between the tank and fire box. Three of the try-cocks were broken off, and the steam came out, literally scalding and burning the unfortunate victims to death. They lived about two hours in the greatest agony, all efforts to relieve them from their position availing nothing.

Next to the tender was the baggage car, containing the baggage master and about 250 trunks. The car was broken into a hundred fragments, and trunks and contents scattered in every direction, not a trunk, as we are informed, being left whole. The baggage man was seriously, though not dangerously, injured.

An emigrant car was next, loaded with men, women and children. The car was thrown over and broken into pieces, but fortunately not a single passenger of the two hundred and seventy-five was hurt.

Suspicion at once rested upon certain persons who had threatened revenge upon the Railroad Company for fancied injuries, two of whom were arrested and held to bail.

SUMMARY.

The trains on the Hudson River and Central New York Line of Railroads are so arranged that passengers leave New York at 6 A. M.; Albany, 10½; Utica, 2 P. M.; Syracuse, 3¼; Rochester about 6 o'clock, arriving at Buffalo before 9 in the evening. At that hour boats leave for Cleveland, Detroit and Chicago; so that one may breakfast in New York, dine in Utica, sup between Buffalo and Erie, take breakfast the next morning in Cleveland, dine at noon in Detroit, and reach Chicago in time for an early supper. The distance thus traveled in less than 48 hours is more than a thousand miles.

The Picayune has advices from Honduras of a highly important character. The inhabitants of Ruatan, as also five other islands dependent on Honduras Bay, had refused to acknowledge British authority, and claimed the protection of Honduras, which had been accorded them. The superintendent had given orders to have the Government buildings at Ruatan sold, which was done at a great sacrifice. Everything was in a state of confusion and disorder, and the most serious consequences were apprehended.

In the town of Bertie, in Canada, near Waterloo, says the Buffalo Commercial, there resides a man named Silas Carter, who was formerly a coachman in the employ of Gen. Washington. His age is 96 years, and he is in the perfect enjoyment of his health and all his faculties. He settled in Canada in the year 1800, has been residing there ever since, and occasionally visits Buffalo. He was in Buffalo a few days since, selling a load of oats, and was to all appearance as hale and hearty as any one.

The Buffalo Commercial says that some real Gypsies are encamped in the woods near Delaware-st. They are distinguished by that wild freedom which characterizes these people, and their tents and primitive style of living are studies for the curious. Their sunburnt skins and hardy frames tell of exposure to the free air of semi-barbarism. They are accompanied by horses, dogs and foxes, all of which imitate the unrestrained freedom of their masters, and uncurbed and unchained, lie down together.

The New York State Agricultural Society has appointed a trial of Agricultural Implements, (to be made under the superintendence and award of its officers,) from the 20th to the 25th of July next, at Geneva, N. Y. The people of that place are making extensive arrangements for the accommodation of all who may attend, (in and out of the State,) and it will, no doubt, be an interesting occasion for the farmers.

Rochester is destined to be the center of a greater number of converging Railroads than any other inland town. She has already the "Rochester and Syracuse," "the Buffalo and Rochester," the new Railroad through Palmyra, Lyons, &c., and the "Rochester, Lockport and Niagara Falls." Soon the "Genesee Valley Railroad" will be added, together with a Railroad to Charlotte, and a branch of the Canandaigua and Niagara Falls Road.

The ship Tennessee, bound from New Orleans for Havre, returned to New Orleans in distress. It appears that on the 21st of May, in lat. 24 30, lon. 80 50, at 8 o'clock in the evening, she came in contact with the bark Fairmount, Capt. Whitney, of Philadelphia. The latter sank within a few moments, and the first mate, J. F. Long, and one seaman, were the only persons on her saved! The Captain, a passenger, (Mrs. Marshall,) and eight seamen, were lost.

The Chicago Journal says, that there is no cholera in that city, nor in La Salle, and that the telegraphic report that 60 laborers had died on the railroad at the latter place is without foundation. The physicians of La Salle have made a report since the publication of that dispatch, in which they say that there is not a single case known.

The St. Louis papers state that passengers now go through from that city to N. York, via Chicago, in four days, at a cost of $25; and adds that they can now go from St. Louis to New York via Cincinnati in four days and a half, and for $21 50.

The St. Louis Union warns the public against the notes of a new banking concern at Quincy, Illinois—the Farmers' and Merchants' Exchange Company. It states that a person in St. Louis forwarded by a messenger some $400 for redemption, and that the messenger was informed that the Bank was then out of funds, but probably would get together the amount presented in a week or so.

Great suffering is reported to exist in the eastern part of Crawford and in Warren Counties, Pa., from the want of provisions for man and beast, the long and severe winter having exhausted almost everything. So general is the destitution in that lumber region, that the operations of many of the lumbermen have been arrested before half completing theio stocks.

THE Executive Board of the American Sabbath Tract Society have employed Bro. E. P. Larkin to visit the churches in behalf of the Society. Bro. L. will act as agent for the Society's publications. It is hoped that every family will take this opportunity to procure for its library a bound volume of our Tracts on the Sabbath, and a copy of Carlow's Defense of the Sabbath.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

To Boston via Norwich and Worcester.

THE first-class Sound steamers CONNECTICUT and KNICKERBOCKER leave Pier 18, N. R., foot of Courtland-st., New York, forming the great United States and British Mail Line for Boston, Montreal, Quebec, Lowell, and Nashua, via Norwich and Worcester. Fare to New London $2; to Worcester $3; to Boston $4; to Bellows' Falls, Vt., $5; to Burlington $7; to Rowse's Point $8. Through tickets to Montreal $9 50.

The pier from which this line starts is the most contiguous of any occupied by the Sound Lines, to the Astor House, Irving House, Howard Hotel, Rathbun's Hotel, and the numerous Hotels in Courtland-st. and its vicinity. The passage affords a fine view of the Hudson and East Rivers, and the Route being Inland, avoids the uncomfortable passage round Point Judith, and through Fisher's Island Sound. Passengers can if they prefer, arrive in Boston at an early hour, by the Steamboat Train, or have the privilege of remaining and breakfasting on board the Steamers and take the early train from Norwich to Boston; thus making the hour of arrival equally accommodated to pleasure and business travel.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses, Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

The Empire of Japan.

From the National Intelligencer.

The kingdom of Japan, called by the natives Niphon, was founded about six hundred and sixty-five years before Christ, by Simmu. From him to Sinzakin there appears to have been sixty-one Emperors. After this period, in the year 1142, a change took place. From this time a double chronology commences, including the reigns of the Dearios and Cubos. The Dearios were military officers, and at one period completely usurped the power of the Emperors; but a general by the name of Jeretime being crowned, succeeded in depriving the Dearios of all military power. At the present time the kingdom of Japan is governed by an Emperor with full military powers, a Deario with full civil powers, and a Cubo, or prime minister, who has authority over certain cities, their Parliament, &c.

The kingdom of Japan consists of three large and thirty or forty smaller islands, situated off the coast of China. The largest of these islands is Niphon, the next Jesso. On the island of Bungo, south-west of Tonsa, is the city of Nangaschi, and near that city is the little artificial island Disna, on which a Dutch factory is built.

Jeddo, or Yeddo, the capital of the empire, is situated in the midst of the fine plain, in the province of Musace, it is built in the form of a crescent, and intersected in almost every street by canals, their banks being planted with rows of beautiful trees. The city is not surrounded, as most Eastern cities are, by a wall, but has a strong castle to defend it. The river Tongag waters it, and supples the castle ditch, and, being divided into five streams, has a bridge over each. The public buildings are on a magnificent scale. The imperial palace is formed by three cinctures, or circular piles of buildings, and inclosing many streets, courts, apartments, pavilions, guard-houses, gates, draw-bridges, gardens, canals, &c. In it reside the Emperor and his family, the royal domestics, tributary princes and their retinues, the Minister of State, many other officers of Government, and a strong garrison. The walls of this magnificent palace are built of freestone, without cement, and the stones prodigiously large. The whole pile was originally covered with gilt tiles, which gave it a very grand and beautiful appearance. Many of the stately apartments are formed and altered at pleasure, by movable screens. The principal apartments are the Hall of Attendance, the Council Chamber, Hall of a Thousand Mats, &c.

The city is under the rule of two Governors, who rule a year each.

The next largest city in Meaco. It is also a royal city, and is situated on a lake near the middle of the Island of Niphon, and surrounded by mountains, which give a remarkable and delightful prospect to the whole; the circumjacent country between the city and the mountains is covered with temples, sepulchers, &c., &c., and is embellished with a variety of orchards, groves, cascades, and purling streams. Three considerable rivers water this fertile plain, and unite their streams in the center of the city, where a magnificent stone bridge facilitates the communication between the different parts of the city. A strong castle defends the town; it is six hundred yards in length, has a tower in the center, and is surrounded by two ditches, the one dry, the other full of water. This splendid city is twenty miles long and nine wide, within the suburbs, which are as well populated as the city. The number of the inhabitants of the city proper is supposed to be 529,000. The universities, colleges, temples, &c., are almost incredible in number and magnificence. It contains twelve capital or principal streets, in the center of which are the royal palaces, superbly built of marble, and adorned with gardens, orchards, pavilions, terraces, groves, &c.

The next principal town is Ozeaco. It is deemed the chief seaport, is very populous, and has an army of 80,000 men always ready at the disposal and command of the Emperor. It is near fifteen miles in circumference.

The city of Nangascke is the Japanese naval depot; but as they have not yet found any use for a navy, their vessels are only in the rough material, and stored away for emergencies.

The kokansa or prison is here. The name means, in the Japanese, hell; it has one hundred dungeons and cages. The history of these few cities give a fair outline of the whole empire. Their private dwellings are small but neat, and ornamented with small gardens; in this they excel, as they are the very best of horticulturists. A few feet of ground are turned to the best advantage, as the Japanese understand perfectly the art of dwarfing plants, trees, fruits, and flowers. They use neither tables, bedsteads, nor chairs; but sit, eat, and sleep, like most Eastern nations, on mats.

Almost the first accomplishment learned by Japanese is the art and grace of suicide; the child in the cradle stabs itself with its finger or stick, and falls back imitative of death; the lover cuts out his intestines before his obdurate mistress, and the latter pours out her heart's blood in the face of her faithless lover; the criminal executes himself; and, in fact, the whole nation, from early youth, revels in the luxury of suicide.

Their trade is, at present, under great restrictions, as they only trade with the Chinese and Dutch. The latter have always fostered, cherished, and increased the prejudices of the Japanese against all other nations, particularly the French, English, and Portuguese.

The mechanics and manufacturers in Japan excel in their different branches, and are even far superior to the Chinese. Their silks and cottons are excellent, and their Japan ware and porcelain unequaled. Their exports are raw and manufactured silks, iron, steel, artificial metals, furs, teas, finer than the Chinese. Japan ware, gold, silver, copper, gums, medicinal herbs, roots, diamonds, pearls, coral, shells, ambergris, &c., Whatever goods the Japanese want, they pay for in gold and silver.

The Japanese worship the principal two gods, Xaca and Amida. At Maceo there is a stately temple, built to one of these gods; it is of freestone, as large as St. Paul's, with an arched roof, supported by heavy pillars, in which stands an idol of copper, which reaches as high as the roof; and, according to a description given by Sir Thomas Herbert, his chair is seventy feet high and eighty feet long; the head is big enough to hold fifteen men, and the thumb forty inches in circumference. There is another statute called after another god, made of copper, twenty-two feet high, in a sitting posture. This shows that the Japanese understand the art of working in bronze, and they are far ahead of Oriental nations in this particular. They allow polygamy, and they often strangle their female children, but never males. The nobility extract the two front teeth, and supply them with two of gold.

The principal rivers are the Ujingava and Askegava—the former so rapid and wide that a bridge cannot be built over it; the latter remarkable for its depth and perpetual fluctuations. The chief lake, called Citz, is 100 miles long and 21 wide. A large valley exists in the interior, filled with carbonic gas, and called the Valley of the Upas. It is covered with the skeletons of numerous wild and tame beasts and birds. The Emperor, it is said, often sent criminals to the valley to bring away a precious gem of inestimable value, and the bones of men also whiten its deadly sides.

Acidulated lakes and thermal springs are common throughout several of the islands.

Their great sources of opulence are their mines of gold and silver, but they have no antimony, calamine, sal ammoniac, borax, or cinnebar, (quicksilver.) These articles are in demand, and bring a high price. Birds and every kind of duck and poultry are plenty; camphor trees are abundant, and the cedars are the finest in the world. Few countries open so fair a field as the islands of Japan for botanical and geological research. It is not neccessary here to enter into a detailed statistical account of the commerce of Japan. A direct trade to that empire would increase the commerce of this country about $200,000,000 annually, if not more.

It has always been in contemplation with this country to make an effort to open a direct trade with Japan. Commodore Porter, as far back as 1815, addressed a letter to Mr. Monroe on the subject. It was intended to fit out a frigate and two sloops of war and place them under his command, but subsequent events prevented the consummation of this design, but it has been revived from time to time, without being carried out. But a few years ago the undesigned drew the attention of Hon. J. Y. Mason to the subject by the recommendation of a steam line to China, with a view of incidental commercial intercourse, and finally direct trade with Japan.

It would require but small efforts to accomplish commercial intercourse with so shrewd a people as the Japanese, who are alive to commercial feelings. A steam line direct from New York to the Isthmus being already in existence, it is an easy matter to continue it to the Gallipagoes, which islands abound in coal; thence to the Marguesas, and on to Shanghae or Jeddo. W. D. Porter.

New York and Erie Railroad.

The arrangements for the accommodation of travelers by the Erie Railroad, for the present season, are very complete, and offer unusual facilities to tourists and pleasure travelers, as well as to those whose business requires rapid transit. Six trains leave the City daily; the first at 6½ o'clock in the morning, running express to Dunkirk, and there connecting, without delay, with safe and swift steamers for Cleveland, and for Toledo, the termination of the Michigan Southern Railroad. By the Cleveland Line, passengers are taken through by railroad from Cleveland to Cincinnati in thirty-eight hours from New York, and that, too, without loss of sleep. By the Toledo Line, passengers reach Chicago in about forty-two hours, over the Michigan Southern Railroad. Trains leave Dunkirk for Erie, Pa., several times a day, so that those who prefer traveling by land can take the cars. Pleasure travelers taking this train, and wishing to stop over night, will find excellent hotels at Binghamton, Owego, Elmira, and Corning, and can resume their journey in either of the two trains which pass through those places next morning. Persons going to Niagara Falls, or to Buffalo, can stay over night at either of the three first named places, and go on next morning, thus avoiding night travel.

The second train leaves at eight o'clock, and stops at all the stations, and affords better opportunities for viewing the magnificient scenery with which the road abounds than the express trains. Passengers by this train can remain over night at the same places as above, and resume their journey in the same way.

A boat leaves at half-past three, taking passengers for Rockland and Orange Counties, by way of Piermont, the other trains running through New Jersey. This route affords a pleasant sail up the North River, at an hour when the river scenery is viewed at great advantage.

The second way train, for all places east of the Delaware River, leaves at 4¾ o'clock, and affords persons wishing to spend the night in the country an opportunity to do so without loss of business time, and return to the city early next forenoon.

The night express train leaves at 6 o'clock, and connects at Dunkirk with a line of safe and elegant steamers, one of which leaves immediately on the arrival of the train, for Detroit direct, arriving there in about thirty-six hours from New York, and connecting without delay with a train on the Michigan Central Railroad, for Chicago, passing over the whole route from Detroit by daylight. By this train passengers are conveyed to Chanandaigua, Rochester, Buffalo and Niagara Falls, leaving the main line at Elmira—the trains at that place always awaiting the arrival of the trains from New York. Another line of boats leaves Dunkirk, on the arrival of this train, for all the principal ports on Lake Erie—Erie, Cleveland, Sandusky, etc.

The sixth train is the Emigrant and Accommodation Train, which leaves by steamboat via Piermont at 6 o'clock, taking emigrants and second class passengers for all points west.

The trains on the branch roads, which leave the main line at Chester, Great Bend, Owego, Elmira, Corning, and Hornellsville, all run in connection with the principal trains of the Erie Road, and afford great facilities for reaching all portions of the southern part of this State and northern Pennsylvania, as as well the western part of New York. Excellent steamboats ply on the two beautiful twin lakes, Seneca and Cayuga, both of which are reached in a short day's ride, all the way in the cars.

The arrangements for travel eastward are equally good as those westward.

In a few weeks, the completion of the Buffalo and New York City Railroad, (from Hornellsville to Buffalo,) will form, in connection with the Erie Road, by some fifty miles, the shortest route between New York and Buffalo, and before many months, it is expected the passage between the two cities will be made by daylight! Two other branch lines, one terminating at Buffalo and the other at Niagara Falls, are progressing rapidly, and will be finished early next season.

"Keep Your Heart as Light as You Can."

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

We have always enough to bare—
  We have always a something to do—
We have never to seek for care
  When we have the world to get through—
But what, though Adversity test
  The courage and vigor of man,
They get through misfortune the best
  Who keep the heart as light as they can.

If we shake not the load from the mind,
  Our energy's sure to be gone;
We must wrestle with Care—or we'll find
  Two are less easy than one!
To sit in disconsolate mood
  Is a poor and profitless plan;
The true heart is never subdued,
  If we keep it as light as we can.

There's nothing that Sorrow can yield,
  Excepting a harvest of of pain:
Far better to seek Fortune's field,
  And till it and plough it again!
The weight that Exertion can move—
  The gloom that Decision can span,
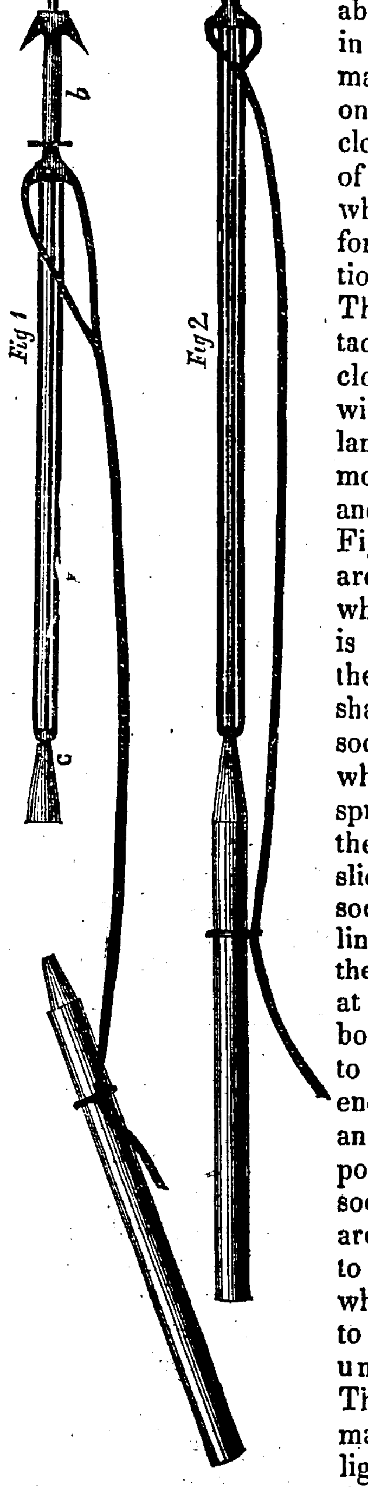
The manhood within us but prove!
  Then keep the heart as light as you can.

From the Farmer and Mechanic.

Stillman's Improved Harpoon.

The want of success which has attended the whale fishery for some time past, has made any improvement in the mode of capturing the animal, a very great desideratum. Guns, torpedoes, and various infernal machines, have from time to time been invented for killing the whale, and it has even been proposed to apply a submarine blast, and fire him off by the aid of a galvanic battery, like the Pot Rock; but Jack has a natural aversion to being "hoist with his own petard," as were the late unfortunate operators at Hell Gate. The expert whaler loves to throw the weapon whose action he can understand and control, and from whose re-action he has nothing to fear. The greatest objection to the use of the ordinary harpoon is, that in making fast to the whale it does not generally inflict sufficient injury, and spurs him to flight and resistance, until the men are worn out, and night often shuts down before an opportunity is offered to enter the lance and capture the prize; it then becomes necessary to "cut away." This is especially the case with the species known as the "Sulphur Bottoms," and "Fin Backs," the former of which is said to be one of the largest and most valuable species of whales, but so difficult of capture, that the pursuit is generally abandoned with the loss of line and the day.

The design of the instrument here delineated, is to make the whale kill himself by his own efforts to escape. It was patented April 6th, 1852, by Dr. J. D. B. Stillman, of New York, and the idea suggested itself to him while on a voyage through the whaling grounds of the Pacific some time since. It is very simple, and is so manifestly adapted to the purpose intended, that the wonder is that it has not been thought of before.



The instrument consists of two parts, a lance with a shaft, a, of the ordinary length, or longer if desirable; and a strong socket, b, about a foot or more in length, which is made to slide freely on the shaft, and fit closely to the head of the lance, in which position it forms a prolongation of the head. The flukes are attached to the socket close to its junction with the head of the lance; they are movable on pivots, and when shut, as in Fig. 2, and as they are designed to be when the harpoon is to be thrown, they lock into the shaft and hold the socket firm, but when they are spread, as in Fig. 1, the lance is free to slide through the socket. A small line passes through the end of the shaft at c, and passing on both sides parallel to the shaft, each end is rove through an eye on corresponding sides of the socket at d d; they are then made fast to the whale line, which is supposed to be equal to their united strength. This line is then made fast to a short light pole by a becket upon it. This pole is for convenience in throwing, and to take up the slack of the line already referred to. When this harpoon is thrown into the body of the whale deep enough to hold, and traction is made upon the line, the flukes will spread, preventing them from being withdrawn; and liberating the shaft in the socket, the head is forced inward; the line then being slack, the pole immediately unships, and all force on the lance shaft in a lateral direction is prevented, and all traction subsequently applied on the line is spent indirectly on the outer extremity of the shaft, until it is entirely buried into the body of the whale. Should the lance be arrested by bone, it may be broken or bent; in either case the essential parts of the harpoon, the socket and flukes attached, are more reliable in their hold than the common harpoon; that is bent as soon as traction begins on the line, and is liable to be wrenched out by the gyrations of the animal, while in this instrument the socket is not larger than is necessary to enter past the blubber, and being of a hollow cylindrical form, it can not be bent, nor is there any purchase to wrench it out. It is claimed that this instrument can be used with as great facility as any instrument now in use, and that the lance must inflict such serious injury upon the whale by the loss of blood, as to shorten the conflict and increase the number of captives. If the instrument is entered any where in the "bilge," it seems impossible that the whale should not dispatch itself at once, unless it should conclude to surrender without attempting suicide by flight.

New Musical Instrument.—Mr. Freberhuyser, a musician of Albany, has invented a new musical instrument, the material used for the construction being sea shells. The exterior of the shell is not disturbed, and retains all its rough attractions. The mouth-piece is fitted to a screw tube, adjusted at the head of the shell. Along the sides the key-holes are arranged at proper intervals, and the edges carefully lined. A valve, lined with velvet, hinged at one corner, covers the mouth of the shell, and is compressed or opened as the character of the music requires. At the opposite and extreme corner of the mouth, the vent is left for the egress of the surplus air. The instrument, therefore, with the valves and keys closed, is air tight, and the variations in the size and natural organization of the shell furnish the change in the tone of the instrument. The music is said to be powerful and agreeable.

The Startled Landlord.

Some critic has remarked of the Illiad of Homer, that it is a picture rather than a poem, that is, the scenes there appear to stand out before the eye, and the impression left upon the reader is, that he has beheld those scenes, rather than heard them described. Such was the preaching of Nelson. When he addressed an assembly, you were a spectator rather than a hearer. You saw the facts and scenes with which he wished to impress the mind. This characteristic also entered largely into his conversation. He had a peculiar power of throwing before the mind a vivid picture of that which he wished you to understand and feel. I will mention an example. Many of the plain country people, remote from large cities, have heard strange stories of dissecting rooms, how dead bodies are dug up and brought from their graves into these places, and then cut to pieces by the doctors as ruthlessly as the butcher carves up his pork and his beef. Rumors of what is done in these dark dens have found their way into remote country districts, and have been rehearsed in circles of awe-stricken hearers, while the hair of their heads stood up, and their eyes seemed ready to start from their sockets.

About the year 1830, Dr. Nelson spent a night at a public house among the mountains of Virginia. The landlord was a strong-built, jovial, merry-hearted man, who evidently was in the habit of using freely what the New England people call rum. Early in the morning Nelson was up, making arrangements for proceeding on his journey. The landlord, polite and attentive, was bestirring himself for the accommodation of his guest.

"Come, stranger," said he, setting out a bottle of spirits, "help yourself to a morning dram."

"I don't drink spirits."

"Let me, however, recommend a little of this. The morning is chilly, and this is good as an anti-fogmatic."

"Excuse me," said Nelson, "I know it to be injurious, and I would advise you to quit it."

"Well," said the landlord, with a horizontal shake of the head, and a self-satisfied strut across the room, "if it is a poison, it is a very slow one. I've been trying it a great while, and I always find that a little does a man good."

"Sir," said Nelson, turning and looking him full in the face, "sir, let me tell you, that I'm a doctor; and I've cut open dead people. I've seen what frightful havoc this liquid fire that you are drinking makes on the inside of a man. You think that you are now in firm health; but I can tell by your looks, that the work of destruction within you is far advanced. Could you have a view of your entrails at this moment, you would see them all dappled, streaked, and discolored by this deadly poison which you are drinking. Yes, you would now see great bloody knots there, dark and gory, as big as the end of my thumb."

Scarcely did Daniel's interpretation of the hand-writing on the palace wall produce a more visible change in the countenance of the Babylonian king, than was made in the looks of our stout, jocular, but now startled landlord, by this account of the frightful inscriptions of King Alcohol on his inner man. In a moment his haughty airs were dropped, his proud strut abandoned; even his round, joyous face seemed to lengthen, and his short, chubby neck looked, for the time, surprisingly slim.

Nelson mounted his horse and resumed his journey. Whether his remarks produced on the landlord any thing beyond a mere temporary effect, he had never afterwards an opportunity to learn. [N. Y. Evangelist.

Strawberries just before Fruiting.

We have repeatedly urged the importance and shown the advantages of irrigation; but where this cannot be adopted in practice, mulching is a good substitute. The following mode of treatment is described by J. Cuthill in Hovey's Magazine, as practiced by Joseph Myatt, the celebrated strawberry raiser, and by himself. "Having no water near him, Mr. Myatt depends entirely upon the immense quantity and the quality of his manure for keeping the ground moist, together with a good coat of straw; but where manure is scarce, perhaps my plan, which I have practiced for many years, would be the best. I always mulch between the rows with fresh straw, mixed with horse droppings, laying it on at least an inch in thickness, just when the plants are coming into flower; and if the weather is dry, I water frequently, but not over the flowers, until all the fruit is set. By the time the latter is ripe, the strength of the manure is washed down among the roots, where they most want it, leaving the straw clean and sweet."

Spent tan has been extensively recommended and considerably used for mulching strawberries. But N. Longworth, of Cincinnati, who never adopts anything hastily, says, "Tan I have discarded. It soon rots, and renders the fruit dirty. In its green state it injures the flavor of the fruit. I prefer the old covering, from which the plant takes its name, cut straw." [Albany Cultivator.

Curious Movement.—On Friday (says the Cincinnati Gazette) we met with a gentleman from Western Virginia, making purchases of Dry Goods and Groceries for a store, the connections with which are worth noting. A colony of sixty persons, gathered from Northampton, Mass., Brooklyn and Auburn, New York, all firm believers in what is termed the Spiritual Philosophy, (annouuced by A. J. Davis, et al.,) have purchased 9,000 acres of land, in a splendid location, about forty miles from the head of steamboat navigation on the Kanawha, and fifty miles from Charleston, Va., upon which they have settled. They do not have a community of property, but each man is steward of his own substance—"maintaining Unity of Faith in the Bonds of Peace." In general they receive all their spiritual and temporal advice from the spirit world, although they do not consider directions from this source infallible, but submit every "communication" to the test of reason. On the property purchased, are mills, a tavern stand, post-office, and store, and it is for the latter that our informant was purchasing supplies. Among the emigrants is Rev. T. L. Harris, of New York, who is to edit a weekly paper, soon to be established by the Society.

The War in Burmah.

The fall of Rangoon and Martaban, before the British troops, was announced in our last. The following particulars will doubtless interest some of our readers:—

Martaban was stormed on the 5th of April with comparative ease, the troops having landed under fire from the ships, and advanced rapidly in conjunction with the artillery on the works of the enemy. A conflict of four or five hours' duration ensued, and the place was taken. The Burmese garrison was about 3,000 strong.

After driving the enemy from Martaban, the troops re-embarked and proceeded to join the force on the Rangoon River. On Easter Sunday, April 11, the entire squadron proceeded up the river, not intending to commence operations on that day, but coming within range of the batteries, they opened fire, and action became unavoidable. The steamers threw their broadsides on the face of the Burmese works on both sides of the river, and after a heavy cannonade and shelling silenced them. The outer batteries were then stormed and occupied by sailors and marines from the ships. The Burmese, this day, (Sunday,) also suffered a heavy loss by the explosion of their powder magazine, which was struck by a shell and blew up.

Monday, the 12th April, was occupied in landing the main body of the troops, and in capturing a stockade a short distance inshore. The Burmese fought gallantly, and the loss on both sides was considerable.

Tuesday, the 13th, the heavy guns were landed.

On Wednesday morning, the 14th, the entire force broke ground and pressed on toward the enemy's stronghold—the Great Pagoda stockade. The fighting here was pretty severe for some hours. At noon a general assault was made by all arms on an angle of the stockade, which was carried, and the enemy gave way at all points. An open gate here permitted the troops to rush in and occupy the place, and all the fighting was over by 2 o'clock P. M. During the engagement, the heat was so excessive that several officers and men died from that cause alone.

The British had not more than 150 men put hors du combat, and captured about a like number of guns. The enemy's loss in killed and wounded was great. It is said that two lacs of rupees were found in the city. The troops are now occupying Rangoon.

The cholera has broken out among the British since the capture of the city.

It is said that the Governor-General has claimed from the Burmese monarch the sum of £250,000 sterling for the expenses of the war up to the 31st March, with a notification that he will be charged £10,000 sterling per day until he accepts the terms dictated by the British. The present strength of the expedition is 6,000 regular land forces of all arms, 15 armed steamships, 4 or 5 transports, a line-of-battle ship, a 44 gun frigate, and a brig of war. More extensive operations will probably be undertaken after the rainy season.

Statistics of Gold and Silver.

A series of tables is published in the London Times, from which appears that the produce of gold in the world rose from £114,674 in 1846, to £365,950 in 1850. In those years the increase was at the rate of 219 per cent., while silver only increased from £1,979,084 in 1846 to £2,663,386 in 1850, or 34½ (34,5) per cent. The former metal was in 1850, therefore, apparently increasing at the rate of 44 (48.8) per cent. per annum, and the latter at 7 (6.9) per cent. The greater part of the increase in silver is in Mexico, which is doubtless owing to a variety of circumstances, such as restored tranquility, richer mines, and greater skill. It would not, therefore, be safe to count upon such an increase every year, but we are certainly not exaggerating in saying that silver is now regularly increasing throughout the world.

The author thus summarises the relative productions of the two precious metals:

"Notwithstanding the great increase in the produce of gold, relative to silver, it is a curious fact that the price of silver has not risen; on the contrary, it has fallen in value. In the course of the week ending April 17, 1852, $580,000 worth of silver was sold at 5s. an oz., British standard, which is only equivalent to 64s. 9d. per lb. Troy for pure silver. At that rate 1 lb. of pure gold is worth 15¾ (15.74) pounds of pure silver. In January, 1851, gold was only 15¼ (15.3) times more valuable than silver.

"The following is the estimated produce of the precious metals, in tuns, in 1801, 1846, 1850, 1851, and the probable amount of 1852:

Year.	Gold. Tuns.	Silver. Tuns.
1801,	19	855, or 1 lb of gold to 45 lb of silver.
1846,	42	727, or 1 lb of gold to 17 lb of silver.
1850,	134	979, or 1 lb of gold to 7 lb of silver.
1851,	180	1,002, or 1 lb of gold to 5 lb of silver.
1852,	242	1,027, or 1 lb of gold to 4 lb of silver.

"Although the 242 tuns is an increase of no less than twelve times the quantity produced at the beginning of this century—a quantity of the glittering treasure that is fraught with the mightiest consequences to society—yet, as respects bulk, it sinks into perfect insignificance, for if it were melted into bars, a closet 9 feet high, 3 long, and 8 broad, would hold it all. It would require 21,713 times as much space to hold all the iron that is now smelted in Great Britain."

A Singular Growth.—The editor of the N. Y. Tribune has been shown a portion of a Maple Tree, 210 years old, (by the rings,) in the wood of which a large Wolf Trap is thoroughly imbedded to the depth of five or six inches, having at least one hundred years' growth over a part of it, while a part of it is entirely exposed. The tree was alive and standing, and the Trap about twenty-five feet from the ground. There is no room for doubt that the wood has actually grown over and imbedded the Trap, which evidently had a panther's foot in it when it was lodged there. The most remarkable feature of the business is the perfect preservation of the Trap, which is but slightly oxydized. It was found by a timber-cutter in Woodhouse, Talbot District, Canada West.

CONTINUING OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

Outpouring of the Spirit on the Day of Pentecost.

Connected with and dependent upon the argument attempted to be drawn from Christ's resurrection, is another, advanced with the same design, from a supposition that the remarkable outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the disciples of Christ, after His ascension, took place on that day. We do not undervalue the testimony to the Saviour's glory implied in this the fulfillment of "the promise of the Father." But the argument thus founded on it would obviously be untenable, even if the evidence of the alledged fact were complete. There is, however, no warrant even for the allegation. The idea of Pentecost's having been upon the first day of the week is, confessedly, based upon the assumption of our Lord's ressurrection having taken place upon that day; and the evidence even of this we have found to be defective, and might therefore postpone consideration of the argument itself until the foundation on which it rests were strengthened by its friends. As, however, it is constantly appealed to by many of those who advocate a change of the Sabbath, as confirmatory of their views, we shall farther examine the Scripture testimony in regard to the event. It is thus recorded in the Book of Acts:—

"When the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind; and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance." Acts ii. 1—4.

This is the entire statement to which reference is so often made as an auxiliary proof that the Sabbath has been changed from the seventh to the first day of the week. The first and most obvious reply to this assertion is, that in this text there is nothing said of the Holy Spirit's descent having been upon or with reference to the character of any particular day of the week. The intimation is simply that it was upon "the day of Pentecost." If any honor is put upon the day by the important event which now took place upon it, that honor is not stated or implied to arise from its being either the first or the seventh day. It must belong to it merely as "the day of Pentecost"—which, it is here stated, had fully come.

This Feast, at the conclusion of harvest, when the offering of the second first-fruits was presented, was emblematical of the harvest at the end of the age, when the angel-reapers shall gather Jehovah's wheat into His garner—when the righteous shall shine forth in the kingdom of their Father. It was, therefore, also called "the Feast of harvest;" while, again, it is likewise termed "the Feast of weeks." This last title it received because of its being observed seven weeks after the offering of Passover first-fruits; and, counting the same period by days, it is also called "Pentecost," from the Greek word signifying the fiftieth, being observed on "the fiftieth day," when the seven weeks referred to were completed. We have already endeavored to show that the day of first-fruits was the 16th of the month Nisan, or third day of unleavened bread, and that, consequently, the day of Pentecost, the fiftieth from it, would fall in different years on different days of the week—as the Passover, on which both first-fruits and Pentecost were dependent, being on the 14th day of that month, must have fallen on different days of the week in different years.

The view thus taken does indeed presuppose that "the Sabbath" which, in the Passover institution immediately succeeds the day on which the lamb was slain, and immediately precedes the first-fruits, was a Festival Sabbath, rather than the weekly rest. But this seems, from the connection in which it stands, to be the true meaning. The chapter containing the full account of all three, in their relation to each other, commences in these words: "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, Concerning the Feasts of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, even these are my Feasts. Six days shall work be done; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of rest, an holy convocation; ye shall do no work therein; it is the Sabbath of the Lord, in all your dwellings." Lev. xxiii. 1—3. Here, then, of all "the Feasts of the Lord" proclaimed to be to Israel "holy convocations," stands first "the seventh day," the weekly Sabbath. In these respects, however, it stands not alone; it is followed by other "Feasts of the Lord, even holy convocations." Immediately after the verses just quoted, is the institution of the three annual Feasts, and the great day of Atonement—which is thus introduced. "These are the Feasts of the Lord, even holy convocations, which ye shall proclaim in their seasons." Ver. 4. And of these additional Feasts of the Lord, even "holy convocations," the Passover, in all its parts, is the first mentioned: "In the 14th day of the first month at even is the Lord's Passover. And on the 15th day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread unto the Lord; seven days ye must eat unleavened bread. In the first day ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work therein. But ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord seven days; in the seventh day is an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work therein." Ver. 5—8. Thus, then, besides the weekly Sabbath, to be "an holy convocation," there were other "Feasts of the Lord" in which "no servile work" was to be done—and two of these sabbatic rests thus were in connection with the Passover solemnity. In Section II. of this Inquiry we pointed to other of these Festival Sabbaths, the very appointments of which help us to understand this text. Thus in ver. 24, 25, of this same chapter, it is enjoined, "In the seventh month, in the first day of the month, shall ye have a Sabbath, a memorial of blowing of trumpets, an holy convocation. Ye shall do no servile work therein." So the day of Atonement, "on the tenth day of the same month," was "an holy convocation," "a Sabbath of rest," in which "no manner of work" was to be done. Ver. 27—32. Again, at the Feast of Tabernacles, which began upon the fifteenth day of the seventh month, "On the first day shall be a Sabbath, and on the eighth day shall be a Sabbath." Ver. 33—44. And while establishing such days as Sabbaths, they are expressly said to be "beside the Sabbaths of the Lord." Lev. xxiii. 38. And these weekly Sabbaths are specified first.

We have been thus particular with the view of showing how little foundation there is for the supposition that the outpouring of the Holy Spirit intimates or was intended to intimate a change of the Sabbath. For if we have proved that the fifteenth day of the month Nisan, the first of the two Passover Sabbaths, was followed on the sixteenth by the offering of first-fruits, we shall see that Pentecost also would be a Sabbath on whatever day of the week it fell. And in regard to the first and seventh days of Passover being really Festival Sabbaths, though not in the first instance expressly so named, there is no room for doubt; while it is worthy of note, that few of the advocates for a change of the weekly Sabbath express a doubt of this, or that the day of the offering of first-fruits was the sixteenth of the month. Indeed, the most eminent commentators expressly admit both, with a full view of the fact that the calculation as to Pentecost wholly depends upon this. Among these we may name Calmet, Cruden, Pearson, Michaelis, Feetwood, Poole, Boothroyd, Elsley, Burkit, Buck, Parkhurst, Jennings, Adam Clarke, and Kitto's Biblical Cyclopedia. In the words of Elsley (Acts ii. 1,) "On the 14th of the month Nisan they ate the Paschal lamb; the 15th day was the first day of the passover week, a holy feast equal to a Sabbath; on the 16th day of Nisan, or second day of the passover, Lev. xxiii. 10, 11, the sheaf, as the first-fruits of the barley harvest, was made a wave-offering before the Lord. From this second day of the Passover fifty days were counted to the Pentecost (hence the name,) Lev. xxiii. 15, when an offering of meal or flour, as the first-fruits of their general harvest, was made."

With such admissions as to the day on which the calculation for Pentecost depends, there should be little difficulty in dealing with any argument founded upon the idea of that day being necessarily on the first day of the week. And yet not less remarkable is the number who assume this as true. So much, indeed is this the case, as to render it worth noting, that Barnes (on Acts) candidly admits "there is a difficulty in establishing this," and makes no effort to do so. But a still more singular part of the matter is, that while commentators are so generally disposed to believe that the Pentecost or fiftieth day was on Sunday, they are far from being unanimous as to the day of the week from which they should begin to count. Elsley, from whom we have already quoted, seems to be contented if allowed to believe the conclusion right, whatever the mode of computation adopted. "The manner of computing the Christian Pentecost," he remarks, "varies with that of the Passover in the year of Christ's passion. If, with Lightfoot, Whitby, &c., we hold, that the general passover of the nation was celebrated on the Thursday, when Christ instituted the Lord's Supper; the Friday on which He suffered was the 15th day of Nisan, or first day of the paschal week; Saturday the second of that week, and the 16th of Nisan, when the wave-offering was made; and from the evening of that Saturday or Sabbath, to the evening of the seventh Saturday, was forty-nine days, or seven weeks, and the next day, or Sunday, is the fiftieth, and the Pentecost. If it is concluded, with Calmet and others, that the general passover of the nation was celebrated on the Friday, when Christ suffered, the Saturday was the 15th, and Sunday was the 16th of Nisan, or the second day of the paschal week, when the wave-offering was made; and, including that day in the computation, to the seventh Saturday evening, is forty-nine days, and the Sunday thus again becomes the fiftieth, or the Pentecost."

While, therefore, it is confessed that the first and last days of the Feast of the Passover, were Sabbaths, distinct from the weekly Sabbath; and while it is farther confessed, that the day of Pentecost was counted from the day of First-Fruits, immediately following the first of these two Festival Sabbaths—yet "the manner of computing the Christian Sabbath" must be such, to suit existing practice and justify the abandonment of the Sabbath, that Pentecost shall fall on a Sunday. But there is nothing of this in the statements, either of the Old Testament or the New. Through Moses, the instruction given is, "Ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the Sabbath, from the day that ye brought the sheaf of the wave-offering; seven Sabbaths shall be complete; even unto the morrow after the seventh Sabbath shall ye number fifty days; and ye shall offer a new meat-offering unto the Lord." Lev. xxiii. 15. 16. The "seven Sabbaths" here, it is stated, are in the Alexandrian MS. "seven weeks." These were to be complete; and it was "when the day of Pentecost was fully come," that the church, after the ascension of our Lord, "were all with one accord in one place." The full number of days prescribed had elapsed—but nothing is said as to which day of the week succeeded. Much discussion there has been as to whether this Pentecost fell on Sunday—and, as above shown, even when different days are selected for commencing the computation, care is taken to have "the Christian Pentecost" to fall on the day which the church has adopted instead of the blessed Sabbath. But, surely, although it were true beyond all question that the day signalized by the descent of the Holy Ghost was the first day of the week, this would not warrant such a departure from God's express command. In the narrative of the circumstances of the outpouring of the Spirit, no allusion is made to the day of the week on which it occurred—it is particularized only as the day of Pentecost. We are far from thinking that this is unimportant, or without much significance. As the offering of the first first-fruits prefigured the resurrection of Christ our glorious Head, so this second first-fruits, at the the completion of the harvest is emblematical of the resurrection of the members of the body of Christ when He cometh again and also of the Holy Spirit being then poured out "upon all flesh" then living on the earth.

The outpouring of the Holy Ghost, on which day soever enjoyed, would neither annul the law of the Sabbath previously instituted, nor revoke its blessing. Nor would such an outpouring, of itself, imply the institution of a new Sabbath, or impart to it a similar blessing. There is nothing in the inspired narrative giving the least countenance to the idea which the Church has sought to graft upon it. Indeed, when we contemplate the efforts made for the defense of Sunday, and the sort of foundations on which it is attempted to be reared, we are forcibly reminded of what has been said of the Moslem mode of dealing with the Koran. "When sacred texts are wanting, traditionary tales, or constructions put upon the silence of the prophet, supply their place, and the involuntary fraudulence of ingenious reasoning pervades the whole." Eucye Brittan. Art., "Turkey."*

P. S. Since transmitting the first portion of the remarks on Pentecost, I have received the Sabbath Recorder containing the letter by J. C. and would be glad if he would state his reasons for the view he entertains as to the time of first-fruits.

* Even if a commemoration of the Spirit's descent on the day of Pentecost had been divinely intended, may we not suppose that it would have been annual rather than weekly and falling on different days, as the festival was on which it was dependent. The Church of Rome, the Greek Church, and the Church of England, have such a commemoration. The Rev. J. P. Fletcher, (in notes from Nineveh, vol. ii p. 286,) gives account of the very peculiar ceremony with which it is observed by the Syrian Church. After some morning prayers by the congregation at Edessa, "the bishop and priests lay down before the altar in the attitude of persons about to sleep. All of a sudden they started up and began tapping each other on the back." The congregation imitated the example. The reason assigned was that "the apostles having waited all night for the descent of the Holy Ghost, became towards morning very drowsy, and adopted this means of keeping one another awake." This church, therefore, commemorated the apostles' weakness on Whitsunday morning.

CLOSING TAVERNS ON SUNDAY.

Opinion of Judge Thompson of Philadelphia.

In Philadelphia, June 16, Judge Thompson delivered the following opinion on the closing of taverns on Sunday, to the constables and tavern-keepers present:—

At the commencement of this term, when the constables of the city and county, in compliance with the requisition of the law, were presenting their reports of the number of houses in their respective Wards, where liquor is sold by less measure than a quart, I took occasion to call their attention to the fact, that many places where the business of selling liquor is carried on, by continuing such business on Sunday, were acting in violation of the law; and that it was the duty of the constables to cause the laws to be respected. Several constables have since made inquiries in relation to their duties on the subject; and in order that the views taken by the Court may not be misapprehended, I take this occasion more fully to explain them.

There are now in force two laws, designed to enforce the observance of Sunday as a day of rest—the first is that of 1705, entitled, "An Act to restrain people from labor on the first day of the week." The 4th and 5th sections of this Act are the only portions of it now in force (the remaining sections having been supplied by the act of 1794.) The 4th section relates to the service of process on Sunday; and the 5th section imposes a penalty on person found drinking and tippling in ale-houses, taverns, or other public house, or place, on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and upon the keepers of such houses who tolerate such practices. The second is the act of 1794, the first section of which provides "that if any person shall do or perform any worldly business or employment whatsoever on the Lord's day, commonly called Snnday, works of necessity and charity only excepted, or shall use or practice any unlawful game, hunting, shooting, sport or diversion whatever on the same day, and be convicted thereof, every such person so offending shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay four dollars, to be levied by distress; or in case he or she shall refuse or neglect to pay the said sum, or goods and chattels cannot be found whereof to levy the same by distress, he or she shall suffer six day's imprisonment in the house of correction of the proper county. Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the dressing of victuals in private families, bake-houses, lodging-houses, inns, and other houses of entertainment for the use of sojourners, travelers or strangers, or to hinder watermen from landing their passengers, or ferrymen from carrying over the water travelers, or persons removing with their families on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, nor to the delivery of milk or necessaries of life before nine of the clock in the forenoon, nor after five o'clock in the afternoon of the same day."

This Act of 1794 is not only in full force, but has hitherto been universally respected by every class of our citizens, (unless the keepers of trverns may be regarded as exceptions.) Under it, the store of the merchant, the worship of the mechanic, and places of business of every kind, are closed on the first day of the week. It has constantly been enforced even against those whose consciences prevented them from regarding the Christian Sabbath as a holy day. Neither the the Jew nor the Seventh-day Baptist has been exempted. As recently as 1848, this act was fully considered by the Supreme Court of this Commonwealth, in the case of the Commonwealth vs. Specht, 8 Barr. 312, upon an appeal taken by a member of the sect of Seventh-day Baptists, who had been convicted of having performed worldly business on Sunday; and was held not only to be constitutional, but that its provisions are to be enforced against every one who violates the sanctity of this chosen day of rest. The majority of the Supreme Court place their decision on the ground that the object of the act is to enforce the observance of a weekly cessation from labor, as a civil, rather than as a religious observance; but the late lamented Judge Coulter took the higher ground, that it was constitutional, because it guarded the Christian Sabbath from profanation.

So, too, the late Judge Kennedy, in the case of the Commonwealth vs. Pupuy, 6 Penn. Law Jour., 223, says, "I consider it a great mistake, to say that you may do in Pennsylvania, on the first day of the week, or more commonly called Sunday, whatever you may do on any other day of the week. It is forbidden that we should engage in and follow our usual occupations, unless, indeed it should be that our daily labor was that of performing acts of necessity or mercy, which are lawful at all times and seasons.

The policy of these acts, I think, ought not to be questioned. I presume it will be admitted, by any intelligent mind, that religion is of the utmost importance of every community. The history of the past furnishes abundant evidence of the truth of this proposition. It is the basis of civilization. Without it, we should be in a state of moral darkness and degradation, such as usually attend the most barbarous and savage states. It is to the influence of it that we stand indebted for all that social order and happiness which prevails among us.

It is by the force of religion, more than by that of our municipal regulations, or our boasted sense of honor, that we are kept within the line of moral rectitude, and constrained to administer to the welfare and comfort of each other. In short, we owe to it all that we enjoy, either of civil or religious liberty. Blessings, which certainly cannot be to highly appreciated, but ought not, as the defendants are said to have done upon this occasion, to be used as a cloak to cover a design to disturb the public peace, and to promote a sinister end. Here, then, give me leave to say, that the institution of the Sabbath is, in my humble opinion, not only admirably adapted to promote and establish religion among us, but to secure and preserve our physical, as well as moral health and strength.

It has further been frequently decided, that contracts entered into upon Sunday are void under the act of 1794. (See Kepner vs. Kepner, 6 Watts, 231, and Berrill vs. Smith, 2 Miles, 402.) In Kepner vs. Kepner, it is said, the words of the Act of Assembly "are sufficient to embrace every species of worldly business not therein specially excepted, whether it appertains to, or be in the exercise of a person's ordinary calling or not. By the terms of the Act it is clear that it is not restricted to the business of his ordinary calling."

It matters not, then, upon what ground the law is sustained. It is the law of the land; and while it remains upon our statute book, it is the duty of the officers of the law to enforce it.

The only question, then, is, Are those persons whose "ordinary calling" is to keep taverns, or sell liquors by less measure than a quart, under a license obtained for that purpose, exempt from the operation of a law which effects all other persons and callings?

In order to sustain this position, it must be shown that the keeping open of taverns on Sunday, for the purpose of vending liquors to all persons who apply, is a "work of necessity or of charity," or is embraced in the proviso which permits the dressing of victuals in private families, bake-houses, lodging-honses, inns, &c.

It appears to me that neither of these positions can be sustained. Surely the person whose business is that of selling liquors by less measure than a quart, without at the same time keeping an inn or hotel for the accommodation of sojourners or travelers, can claim no better right to pursue his business on Sunday, than can the grocer or the dry goods man, the suspension of whose business is recognized by public sentiment, as well as enforced by law. Does, then, the tavern-keeper stand in a better position? On this point the true rule appears to me to be, that the tavern-keeper has the right, on Sunday, as on other days, to administer to the comfort of his guests, whether boarders or travelers, and to supply them, as the head of a private family would supply the wants of his family; but that he has no right, under the law, to keep his house open for the purpose of selling liquors to every passer-by who chooses to call for it—and much less to encourage or to allow idle persons to congregate upon his premises for similar purposes.

Under the present system of granting licenses, when every person who can pay the required tax may obtain the privilege of selling liquors by less measure than a quart, unless the restraints imposed by law are carried into effect, the results must necessarily be disastrous to the community. Until recently, the Court, which had the power of granting licenses, could, in some measure, guard against abuses; at present there is no other remedy than by a strict enforcement of the law. Whether the law, as it stands at present, supported as it is by public opinion, is sufficient for the purpose, remains to be seen; but whether sufficient or not, it is the duty of the officers to enforce it.

The proper course to enforce the law is pointed out in the 4th section of the Act of 1794, which authorizes and requires the magistrate to proceed against and punish all persons offending against said Act. It is the duty of the constable to bring every case in which he observes a violation of the law, to the notice of the magistrate; and it is the further duty of this court, to see that the constables perform that which their oath of office imposes on them, that is, the strict enforcement of the laws of the land.

But the Act in question does not impose the duty of enforcing its provisions upon the officers alone—every citizen has the same authority to bring to the notice of the magistrate any violation of its provisions. It is a matter in which all are equally interested—and that same public sentiment, which now recognizes the propriety of closing stores and workshops, under the law, if properly directed, will be able to restrain within their legal limits, every other "worldly business and occupation."

The constables were then notified, that it is their duty to make a weekly return of every infraction of the law within their wards and townships, to the alderman or magistrate of such ward or township, and if the alderman or magistrate refuse or neglect to take notice of the matter, then it is the duty of the constables to bring the subject to the attention of the Court, who will take such action in the matter as the case demands.

"THE DEATH OF THE INFANTS."

O! many a sigh came frae the heart,
And tears fell frae the e'e,
When the brains took flight to the world of light,
Where tears can never be!

The sun shone with its fairest beams,
To light them on their way,
And the lay'rock high, with notes of joy,
Attuned his sweetest lay.

"Sweet birdie, say—which is the way
That we'll gang through the sky?
We left an earthly hame to-day,
For heavenly hame on high."

The bird up flew on soaring wing,
Till near the hour of even,
When the bairnies heard the angels' song,
At the portal gates o' heaven!

"Gang down! gang down! sweet bird, gang down,
Nae further maun ye flee;
For these are sounds ye maunna hear,
And sights ye maunna see."

The birdie turned him to the earth,
The bairnies to the sky,
While the seraph strain awoke again,
To welcome them on high! [Gilfillan.

THE KARAITE JEWS.

The following account of an interesting and peculiar sect of the Hebrews is extracted from Elliot's Travels in the three great Empires of Austria, Russia, and Turkey:—

The Karaites take their name from the Hebrew word Kara, signifying Scripture, because they adhere exclusively to the letter of the Bible, rejecting the Talmud and the interpretations of the rabbies, on which the other Jews, called, by way of distinction, Talmudist, Rabbinist, Pharisaical Jews, and Son of the Text, lay so much stress. This is the fundamental point of difference. They are said to hold some of the doctrines of the Sadducees, with whom they were probably identified, till these fell into gross errors, when such as retained the pure faith gave them the name of their chief, Sadok, and separated from them. Others, again, maintain that they have handed down the heterodoxes of the Samaritans, and that they deny all Scripture except the Pentateuch. The assertion, however, is incorrect; and the charge probably originated in their keeping the rest of the Sacred Scriptures apart from the books of Moses, which are much used in their schools, in order that none may suffer unnecessarily from the carelessness of the boys. As they have no printed copies, each manuscript is of great value, and this precaution is indispensable; while, in order to secure a farther supply, every member of the synagogue is expected to transcribe the whole, or the greater part, of the Law at least once in his life; a work which the Karaites perform with much precision and beauty of penmanship. They possess Tartar Targums, or versions of the Old Testament in that language; which are regarded as objects of interest equally by themselves and by those versed in the Biblical lore. The Rabbies kindly showed us all their manuscripts, and complained that, as the society has been from time to time reduced by the departure of its members, several have been taken away, and their collection has accordingly suffered. Afterwards, they conducted us into their school, and exhibited the various books in which the youth are instructed in the Hebrew and Tartar languages.

From all we could ascertain, in personal conference with these sons of Israel, and with their neighbors, as well as from what is recorded concerning them, it appears that they hold the Jewish faith in much purity and simplicity; adhering so strictly to the letter of the Law, that, as their Rabbi informed us, they allow no fire to be seen in their town on the Sabbath, neither for light, warmth, culinary purposes, nor even for smoking; though it is well known the Talmudists find little difficulty in evading the Levitical prohibition. Their morals are unusually blameless. At Odessa, where several hundreds of them are established as merchants, they enjoy a high character for honesty and general probity—forming a striking contrast to the Jews of other denominations. In Poland, the records of the police prove that no Karaite has been punished for an offense against the laws for four centuries; and in Galicia, the government has exempted them, on account of their good conduct, from the imposts levied on other Hebrews, conferring on them, at the same time, all the privileges enjoyed by their Christian fellow-subjects.

Among the minor points of difference between the two Israelitish parties, are the Liturgy, the regulation of food, and the degrees of affinity that oppose marriage. Their civil laws also present some distinctive characters. The Karaites suffer polygamy, which, however, is not much practiced; and by them, as by the Rabbinists, affiance is considered as sacred as marriage; so that the means requisite to annul the one are equally necessary to set aside the other, except in the event of the death of the father of a girl betrothed when a minor, who is then allowed a voice in the matter, and may refuse to ratify her father's contract. The members of this tribe are not permitted to dispose of their estates, either by gift or testament, to the prejudice of the lawful heirs; nor to leave more to one child than to another. The following is the order in which succession to property is regulated:—1st, Sons; 2dly, Male descendants through the male line; 3dly, Daughters; 4thly, Daughters' children indiscriminately; 5thly, Fathers; 6thly, Paternal uncles; 7thly, Brother; 8thly, Mother. Illegitimate children are not excluded, provided the mother be a Karaite. A husband can never inherit from his wife; but it is lawful for her to resign to him a care of her dower.

VALUE OF A CENT.

A little thing to write about, you may say; but trifles light as air make and mar our fortune. Then are they not important enough to be noticed?

Suppose a child were starving in the streets—what then? Why! a penny would buy him bread enough to recruit his dying energies; depend upon it, a cent properly disposed of, may, at certain times, do more good than a million at others.

A friend of ours was returning once through a busy thoroughfare to her home. Her intention was not to purchase anything, and she happened to have in her purse but one cent. Passing by a little stand, she saw some very large, rich looking oranges for sale at a penny a-piece. She spoke for one, took the cent from her pocket, when suddenly a thought arrested her. She could not help it, but involuntarily stayed her hand; it was this: "I have just left a luxurious table; I have had all I wanted; how foolish in me to spend even this cent, when I may come across some poor beggar child, to whom it may be a treasure." She replaced the cent, and went on her way. A long distance was before her; but as she came to the head of a narrow alley, she paused for a moment; something seemed to draw her irresistibly towards the place; she knew a poor widow lived there; a lady-like woman, who supported her children by her own industry, and she thought she might just look in upon her for a moment, to ascertain if she was comfortable.

The widow was sitting by a small fire, her children ranged around the hearth, as she entered; the former made her welcome, but in subdued tones; and our friend saw that she had been weeping. With great delicacy she inquired the cause.

"To tell you the truth, Mrs. M.," said the widow, while her cheek crimsoned, "I have today spent my last fartheing for bread for these children; and though I have work, yet my money was advanced, and I cannot get more till it is finished to-morrow. My oldest boy came running home a few moments ago from the upper part of the city, saying that a letter was in the penny postman's box, with my name upon it, and the postmark of my native town. It may be of the greatest importance, but I am a stranger in this neighborhood; I don't like to expose my poverty by borrowing, and yet I haven't one cent."

"And I am sorry to tell you that one penny is all I have at present," said our friend, "but that will enable you to get what you wish, and I hope you will find good news in it."

The letter was sent for; it was written by her father's sister, a good and pious woman, and a dependent. She begged her to come to her early home, from which her father had long ago expelled her, for marrying a poor man; the old gentleman was dangerously ill; might die at any moment; he had spoken of her; he seemed to feel kindly towards her; and if she could hasten there, his forgiveness might be obtained, and she and her five children made comfortable.

There was no time to be lost, and on foot and alone the widow set out, traveling, secure in her poverty, six weary miles.

By midnight, her feet, for the first time in twelve years, pressed upon the threshold of her father's princely mansion; the good aunt met her with tears. Tired and travel-worn as she was, she yearned to behold her old father before he died; she hurried to his chamber, glided to his bedside, and without speaking fell upon her knees, beseeching only his forgiveness, his blessing. How could the demon of vindictiveness longer rule in that dying man's heart? He looked upon the hollow, grief-worn cheek of his surviving child, and forgot the past; he held forth his feeble arms, and she fell upon his bosom.

The old father died with the dawn, but not before he had affixed a codicil to his will, making his child and her children heirs to most of his large estate; and to-day the poor shirt-sewer, who was stitching herself into the grave, lives beloved and respected by rich and poor; her children, well educated, promise to become blessings and honors to her. Upon her mantel, in the best room, is a gilded and transparent vase, containing one cent; and she often reminds her friends, that through the instrumentality of so trifling a sum, she became enabled to do all the good for which hundreds of hearts bless her daily.

"LORD, WHAT WILT THOU HAVE ME TO DO?"—"Whatsoever thy hand findeth," of all the varied forms of kindness and of good. Stand in your lot and work around you; in your own home, in your own neighborhood, your own town, county or State; and if God enlarges the ability and opportunity, "break forth upon the right hand and upon the left;" but don't wait for a large field; cultivate the spot you have, and help your neighbors.

Don't forget the prayer meeting and the Sabbath school, nor "to do good and communicate;" for "with such sacrifices God is well pleased."

Remember that to put a sound gospel tract into a family is like giving them a draught of the water of life; to put there an evangelical volume, is like furnishing them a "water-pot of two or three firkins;" nay, some volumes might rather be likened to a reservoir; but to supply them with the Bible, is to open a fountain of living waters by the very hearth-stone. It is like planting a perennial spring in the traveler's track across the great Sahara.

Do any or all of these, and a blessings shall return into your own bosom, and God shall be glorified in you. [N. Y. Obs.

The Sabbath Recorder.

"THE SABBATH AND THE HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD."

"The thing is a defiance of Almighty God, public, bold, open; and an outrage on all Christian decency. It is a wound upon the morals and religion of the community, the perniciousness of which no one can measure, the iniquity of which no sophistry can palliate or justify, and for which no form or amount of profit could make the least amends."

[Independent of June 3d.

It is generally imputed to our Puritan forefathers, as one of their distinguishing excellencies, that they were rigid observers of the Sabbath. Their stringent laws, by which even the traveler was prevented from pursuing his journey on the first day of the week, are magnified by their descendants as having been the chief bulwark of public morals; and loud is the lamentation, that public opinion will not tolerate the same rigidness now. Could their ardent wishes be met, there would be a solemn stillness on the day of their devotions, broken only by the voices of them that worship God, and proclaim his praise. Not a steamboat would plow the waters, not a vessel would be loosed from her moorings, not a car would move upon our railroads, not a mail-coach would be driven, not a post-office opened, not a canal that would not be locked up, not a house of entertainment open any where, not an article of provision or of luxury sold, nor sound of cart, nor clangor of horn. All would be at rest.

And would not this be a beautiful spectacle? Verily, it would. Only one sad reflection would attend it, namely, that all this was brought about on a day possessing no rightful claim to such a disctinction; in order to which, the day that really is entitled to it had to be robbed of the sanctity which God had conferred upon it. For that another day was once esteemed sacred by God's people, is most indisputable. Who gave it that sacredness? The Creator of all things. When? When he rested. Why? "Because that in it he had rested from all his work which he created and made." Gen. 2: 3. If that same day which the Creator then constituted holy, is not holy still, let the scriptural proof that it is otherwise be furnished.

We certainly admire the zeal of those who plead for the better sanctification of what they suppose to be the Sabbath. But is it the Sabbath, after all, that they are contending for? Should they succeed even beyond their most sanguine expectations, they will only have effected what will afterwards have to be entirely undone. For "every plant that my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up." Matt. 15: 13. Under the mistaken notion that they are advocating the cause of the Sabbath, because they insist upon the santification of one seventh part of time, they suppose themselves to be doing God service. But when they shall have accomplished their work, and shall appear before God, saying, "We have finished that which thou gavest us to do," it will be somewhat withering to their self-satisfaction, to hear Him say, "Who hath required this at your hands?"

The tone of rebuke assumed by these pretended reformers towards those who do not reverence the Sunday, would undoubtedly be somewhat moderated, if they could be made to see that they were contending for nothing but a human tradition. And why not pause a while for the investigation of this very point? Why not prayerfully ask, whether God has commanded men to keep holy the Sunday? For aught we know to the contrary, the Directors of the Hudson River Railroad may be very wicked men, and may concern themselves but little whether the Sunday is a divinely sanctified day, or not. They may, by this very indifference, give evidence of their enmity against God. But how shall we best succeed in waking up the consciences of such people? How shall we make them feel, that running their trains on Sunday is "a defiance of Almighty God, and an outrage on all Christian decency?" Is it to be done by mere denunciation? This may answer in those cases where the understanding is well convinced that the practice denounced is a clear violation of Divine Law. But in cases where there is not such conviction, it will have scarcely any other effect than to excite contempt and more determined opposition.

Certainly, we have no right to assume, that the Directors of the Hudson River Railroad are as well convinced of the fallacy of the reasoning by which it is attempted to be proved that Sunday is the divinely appointed Sabbath, as we are. The strong light in which the question is viewed by us, may be, to them, faint as the twilight that glimmers in the first dawn of morning. But has the writer who reproves them in the denunciatory language which stands at the head of this article, any right to suppose that their consciences accuse them of a breach of the Sabbath law? Has he a right to take it for granted, that they need no argument to enlighten them on this point? Those who have been educated in the rigidness of Puritanism, may very naturally suppose, that every one who works or plays on Sunday feels the compunctions of a guilty conscience; and the writer in question appears to be one of that class. We doubt his capability of viewing any subject, whatever, from any other than a Puritan stand-point, unless it be a problem in mathematics. But we know, that there are vast numbers of people, who fail to feel the force of the proofs laid upon them for Sabbath-breaking, simply because they do not understand why a law, which so explicitly declares the seventh day to be the Sabbath, should lay them under sin for working on the first day of the week. True, they have never investigated the subject thoroughly, and are not prepared for an argument with those who reprove them. Hence, when reproved, it may be that they keep silence. But their silence is no evidence that their understanding is enlightened. Though silenced, they think as they did before, and only wait for their reprovers to be gone, that they may resume, with greater determination, the very course which has subjected them to censure. Conscience never becomes really awake. For if the understanding, even doubtingly, and with the greatest uncertainty, supposes that the sanctity set forth in the Fourth Commandment attaches to another day, it is impossible to create any self-reproving conscience with regard to the popular observance. Nothing but that strength of conviction which leaves not the smallest avenue for evasion, will rouse conscience to its duty.

We commenced these remarks with the design of suggesting the propriety of adopting a different method of labor with these very wicked profaners of the Sunday rest. The denunciatory method has been tried pretty effectually, and the evil which it aims to cure seems only to increase. We recommend a sober, earnest, persevering effort, to convince them that the day which they secularize is entitled to be counted holy. Let God's direct and explicit testimony be brought to bear upon the question. Let the passage of Scripture be adduced, where it is said that "God blessed the first day, and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made." Or, if that cannot be found, point out the one which says, that "God blessed the first day, and sanctified it, because that in it Christ rose from the dead." Or, if that is rather apocryphal, bring forward the passage which shows, that Christ rested from his work on the first day of the week. Or, if that too is wanting, find the one which says, that the inspired Apostles observed the first day of the week by abstaining from all secular business. Find something express, and direct to the point which you would desire to prove. Do up the thing honestly, plainly, and without sophistry or evasion. If you have a 'thus saith the Lord' for your doctrine, you can make it stand out from the inspired page in bold relief, so that the ignorant, and the half blind, can see it. But remember, that when we call for a 'thus saith the Lord,' we do not mean thus saith Dyonisius or Tertullian. Those whom you would convict of sin, have a right to expect God's testimony, not man's.

Now, it is the uniform, utter failure of our Puritan zealots—we do not use the term in any opprobrious sense—to find a direct warrant for Sunday-keeping in the word of God, which leaves the consciences of those whom they would reform unawakened. Their whole argument is a motley piece of patchwork, made up of perverted scripture, doubtful inferences, and scraps from the old Fathers. Yet, as if its canonicalness were not to be questioned, they go on denouncing those who do not square their actions by it, as if they were the most heaven-daring sinners that ever taxed the forbearance of Almighty God. Hence, the writer who has furnished us with our text, breaks forth in such strains as the following:—

"Every railroad constructed to run its trains upon the Sabbath [Sunday,] or permitted by its constituted guardians so to do, is one of the most grievous and outrageous public defiances of the authority of Almighty God, that could possibly be entered into."

"In very truth, every such structure is an iron clamp, fastening our globe more securely to the roots of hell. And those who have the hand in such a work, those who supply the means and the sanction of such a perpetuated fixture of iniquity, such established public temptation and license to sin, have laid up for themselves a responsibility to discharge before God, which the most hardened wretches might tremble to think of meeting at the judgment. Certainly, their works will follow them, when they have gone into eternity, if none others' do. And every thundering tramp of the iron horse that they set in motion as the productive power of such iniquity, the roar and trembling will be felt in the lower world, sinking down still deeper the authors of such guilt and misery into the experience of its consequences."

"Certainly, a Sabbath-breaking railroad is the nearest realization of such an imagined causeway to hell that we can ever expect to behold upon this globe. It is the culmination of depravity and of the defiance of God, and of a leagueship with the powers of darkness, in that material direction, in this our modern age."

We wish to be clearly understood. We would make no great objection to such authoritative denunciations, if it were established, beyond all reasonable doubt, that the day on whose account they are employed is Divinely constituted a day of rest. The law which says, Thou shalt not steal, is too plain for even a fool to call in question. He that robs his neighbor, therefore, may at once be denounced as a wicked sinner. If he breaks open his neighbor's dwelling, and carries off his silver spoons, it is not necessary to go into an argument with him, to convince him that he has broken the eighth commandment. His conscience tells him that at once. But is it the same with him who secularizes the Sunday? It is not absolutely certain, that God has said, 'Remember the first day of the week, to keep it holy.' It is certain, however, that he once commanded the seventh day to be kept holy.

Come, then, all ye who desire to arouse the slumbering conscience of a guilty community, join with us who have an express precept for our faith and practice. Unite your testimony to ours, that in the mouths of a mighty multitude of witnesses every word may be established. Join with us in telling the wicked, that the same Sabbath which God proclaimed from Sinai, is still, as it was then, "the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." Confess your error in having labored to impose upon them the observance of a spurious institution, and penitently tell them, that you will no longer lend your example to such a God-dishonoring course. Then, with a good face, you may tell them that a Sabbath-breaking railroad is "an iron clamp, fastening our globe more securely to the roots of hell."

We long to see the day, when not only the overt act, but the very spirit of Sabbath-breaking, shall cease from the land. God speed the time, when, on the day which commemorates creative goodness, the whole world shall be at rest. No happier era can dawn upon these realms of sin. But we have no confidence that the pseudo-reformatory measures which spring from Puritan theology, will contribute any thing towards bringing it about.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Church of England Matters—Fergus O'Connor—British Museum.

GLASGOW, June 11, 1852.

In the Arches Court, yesterday, the Rev. Mr. Gladstone, who some time ago spoke of the blame which attached to the Bishop of London for encouraging Tractarianism, and whom the Bishop interdicted from preaching, was admonished to refrain from reading prayers, publicly preaching, and administering divine offices, in the consecrated building called Long Acre Chapel, until he obtains a license from the Bishop. He is besides condemned to pay the costs of the suit. The prohibition extends to the whole of the diocese of London and province of Canterbury also. Intimation has been given of an intended appeal; and for the success of that appeal to the highest quarter, it is not unimportant that Mr. Horsman has in the House of Commons this week carried, by a majority of 156 against 111, his motion for a Select Committee "to inquire into the circumstances connected with the institution of the Rev. Mr. Bennett to the vicarage of Frome." This is the person whom the Bishop of London was compelled by public opinion to censure, by accepting his conditional resignation. Nothing that has since occurred has indicated that the Bishop acted voluntarily in the case, and he had previously long tolerated the Romanizing practices of Mr. B., when a true Protestant would have intimated that the Church of Rome was the appropriate sphere for such "histrionics," as he himself at last termed them. Considerable interest has been excited by Mr. Horsman's success in this matter, as on his first giving notice of his motion, the Government undertook to make inquiry into the matter of the Bishop of Bath and Wells having inducted a person in such circumstances—as there was no evidence of any change in Mr. Bennett's opinions. On the contrary, as proved by Mr. H., this clergyman, who went to the continent shortly after his separation from the church of St. Barnabas, Pimlico, regularly attended a Roman Catholic Chapel, in a town where there was an English Episcopal congregation; and, as farther alledged, even carried, as Papist priests do, a stone altar on which to offer mass. Mr. H. farther pointed to a Popish Directory which intimated that Mr. B. had been received into the Church of Rome. This, however, he intimated in a letter to Lord Castlereagh to be without foundation. The Government, after several weeks, intimated that there was nothing which they could do in the case—as there was no law which could be brought to bear against the Bishop who inducted him, although the proceedings were carried through in haste, to prevent the parishioners from even trying to find the means of preventing such a scandal. Mr. H., who exposed this conduct of the Bishop, was opposed by the Government, who are evidently mortified at the result of his motion.

It really is high time that laymen were undertaking the task of inquisition and exposure—for little of good is to be expected at the hands of the Bishops. They are fully aware of the Romanistic tendencies which prevail among Tractarian clergymen, and do nothing to restrain them. A Mr. S. Lee, in the diocese of Exeter, in his zeal for Popish vagaries, announced a "midnight service" to inaugurate Easter Sunday. The civil authorities, however, being apprehensive of popular violence, communicated, it is said, with the Bishop, who advised that the service should no be held. Farther exposures have also been made of the Popery of Miss Sellon and her Sisters of Mercy at Plymouth. One pamphlet by Miss Diana Campbell, "a novice lately seceded," exhibits the whole system as one in which the demands of will and conscience made by this Mother Superior are equal to anything the Pope has ever claimed. In consequence of the indignation excited, several gentlemen were stated to have gone down from London to collect information relative to this proceeding, to lay before the House of Commons also.

Mr. Fergus O'Connor, who lately returned from New York, was taken into custody on Wednesday, under the warrant of the Speaker of the House, for misconducting himself towards several of the Members. Besides abuse with his tongue, he struck with his fist, interrupting repeatedly the progress of business. It is however doubted by many, whether his eccentricities and violence were not wholly stimulated to escape from the dreaded inquisition into the affairs of the Land Scheme.

On the 4th inst., the House of Commons voted £21,360 for the buildings of the British Museum, and £52,343 for salaries and other ordinary expenses for the ensuing year. Great complaints continue to be made, by students who resort to this great collection of Literature, of the sad want of accommodation and condition of the catalogues. J. A. BEGG.

THE WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Western Association held its seventeenth annual meeting with the 1st Church in Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., commencing on Fifth-day, June 24, and closing on the following First-day. The attendence was larger than usual, and included, we believe, every Seventh-day Baptist minister living within the bounds of the Association. There were also present James H. Cochran as delegate from the Eastern Association, Joshua Clarke as delegate from the Central Association, Eli Forsythe as delegate from the Ohio Association, and other visiting brethren from different parts of the denomination. The people living in the vicinity seem to have made their arrangements beforehand to get what good they could of the meetings, and from first to last their presence testified that they felt a deep interest in the deliberations. We would very gladly report at length the proceedings; but we are compelled, by the brief time at our command, and the small space left us this week, to dismiss the matter with a bare sketch.

The morning of Fifth-day was occupied with the Introductory Discourse, which was preached by N. V. Hull, his theme being the duty of Christians to study the characteristics of the times in which they live, and direct their labors accordingly. The text was Rom. 13: 11—"Knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep; for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed."

In the afternoon, the Association was organized by the choice of J. M. Allen of Alfred for Moderator, and A. C. Burdick of Independence and E. R. Clarke of Friendship for Clerks.

Then followed the reading of the letters; and, if we mistake not, there was one from each church in the Association. Some of these were of an encouraging character; as that from Wirt, which reported fifteen additions by baptism, that from Hartsville, which reported twenty baptisms, and that from 2d Alfred, which reported twenty-three baptisms. Nearly all of them expressed a growing interest in our benevolent operations, but lamented that this interest was not connected with more of that devotional spirit which leads to the erection of the family altar, and the maintenance of the monthly concert of prayer.

The Reports of the Executive Committee, the Treasurer, and the Corresponding Secretary, were then presented; the former of which we give below, that our readers may see with what commendable zeal these churches, a large number of which are quite feeble, are laboring to support and encourage each other. The proper disposition of these reports, with the appointment of Standing Committees, and some minor matters, used up the afternoon.

On Sixth-day morning, the Association assembled at eight o'clock, and proceeded to the public examination of candidates for ordination, as requested by letters of churches. Two hours were spent in this way; and the result was a conclusion to comply with the request of the 2d Genesee Church for the ordination of Bro. Phineas S. Crandall on the following First-day, and also with the request of the Church in Hebron, Pa., for the appointment of a Committee who should ordain Bro. Hiram W. Babcock, at a meeting which it is proposed to hold at Hebron about the middle of July.

At ten o'clock, agreeable to previous arrangement, the Committee appointed last year to prepare a Paper on Family Religion, presented their report, the reading of which occupied nearly an hour. This document will soon be published in the Recorder, and we only hope it will interest our readers, and impress them with the importance of the duty it inculcates, as much as it did those who listened to it when presented to the Association.

The afternoon of Sixth-day was taken up in discussing the resolutions which are appended, in receiving and disposing of the reports of the various committees, appointing delegates to sister Associations, &c. The delegates for the next year are as follows: To the Eastern Association, Thomas E. Babcock—alternate, J. M. Allen; to the Central Association, Wm. C. Kenyon—alternate, Jared Kenyon; to the Ohio Association, Rowse Babcock; to the Wisconsin Association, Hiram P. Burdick.

In this connection, perhaps as well as in any other, we may give the names of the Association's officers for the ensuing year. Corresponding Secretary—James Bailey, Little Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y. Treasurer—David R. Stillman, Alfred Center, Allegany Co., N. Y. Executive Board—T. E. Babcock, N. V. Hull, James Bailey, C. D. Langworthy, E. R. Clarke.

The strictly religions exercises of this Anniversary were more than usually numerous, and were attended by large congregations. On Sabbath evening a discourse was preached by Jared Kenyon of Alfred; on Sabbath morning, a discourse by Thomas E. Babcock of Independence, followed by a collection for the Associational Mission; on Sabbath afternoon, by Geo. B. Utter of New York; and on the evening following the Sabbath, by Joshua Clarke of Brookfield. On First-day morning, James H. Cochran, of Plainfield, N. J., preached a sermon in behalf of the Foreign Mission, which was followed by a collection. In the afternoon, Leman Andrus of Pendleton preached the ordination discourse, after which N. V. Hull gave a charge to the candidate, and the right-hand of fellowship was extended to him by T. E. Babcock.

The next meeting of the Association is to be held with the church in Independence, Allegany Co., N. Y., commencing on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in June, 1853. Leman Andrus is appointed to preach the introductory discourse; H. P. Burdick alternate.

Report of the Executive Committee.

The Executive Committee, immediately on their appointment, made arrangements to supply the churches in Hebron and Ulysses, Potter Co., Pa., with regular labors during the year; and to furnish a limited supply to the Church in Persia, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y.; that Church having agreed to meet the expense. They also made conditional arrangements to furnish aid to the Church in Clarence, Erie Co., and that in Darien, Genesee Co., N. Y. Those conditions not having been carried out, the supply was not furnished.

FINANCES.—At the commencement of the year there was nearly one hundred dollars due for missionary labor already performed. That demand has been canceled. The amount for which the missionary in Hebron, Ulysses, and vicinity receives on the field of labor is one hundred and seventeen dollars, leaving eighty-three dollars to be supplied by the Association. Of this sum he has received $37 50, leaving his due $45 48. The Church in Persia has been visited three times, for which about thirty dollars has been paid by the Church, leaving nothing due. During the year the Executive Committee have settled with Bro. Alonzo Green, heir of Nathan Green, deceased, and have received in notes and cash three hundred dollars. The said Nathan Green, in a will dated some years since, devised to the Executive Committee of the Association an unnamed amount as residuary legatee. The cash, amounting to $23 59, has been paid to the Treasurer of the Association. The notes are in the hands of the Clerk of the Committee.

REPORT OF LABORS.—Bro. H. W. Babcock has labored in the employ of the Committee on the field included in Potter Co., Pa. He reports that he has divided his labors on the Sabbath between the churches at Hebron and Ulysses, occupying upon First-days a number of out-stations in the vicinity. His labors in the churches have been attended with considerable encouragement. Four have been added to the Church in Ulysses by baptism, and two others have professed conversion. Encouraging improvement has been realized, both in the extent and attention of the congregations at the out-stations; and a desire is manifested for the continuance of labor. Some are apparently discussing the Sabbath question with candor; though opposition manifests itself under a variety of forms.

PLAN OF OPERATIONS.—The Executive Committee have directed their efforts mainly to the purpose of securing the location of laborers with the feeble churches within the Association. Brother Hiram W. Babcock is located at Hebron, and Bro. Rowse Babcock is located in the vicinity of the churches of Clarence and Darien; and it is deemed important that some one should be settled with the Church in Persia. Could one be obtained, the Church would probably be able to furnish half of his support. But these are not the only fields that need attention.

PROSPECTS, &c.—Though the Committee feel that, in the increased attention bestowed upon the subject by the churches, evinced by the better time and enlarged liberality of their contributions, they have cause of encouragement, yet, to meet the increasing demand laid upon us in this respect, we need to extend the scale of our operations; to do which, a still more vigorous effort to raise the means will be necessary. The Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society has been asked to aid us, but no response has been received. What is coming from the estate of Bro. Nathan Green can be realized only in small sums through a series of years. Our appeal is therefore to the churches.

Report on the State of Religion.

The Committee on the State of Religion respectfully report: That in their estimation the communications from the churches show tokens of the Divine favor in a number of them, which lay us under new obligations of gratitude to our Heavenly Father. Though the proportion is small, a few of them have been graciously revived, and enlarged by the addition of young converts. Among the indications of improvement in the spiritual condition of the churches, we ought not to overlook the fact that their contributions to benevolent purposes, within the year past, have been more regular and liberal, and a much larger proportion of them have taken hold of the matter than heretofore.

But we are by no means beyond the reach of causes of alarm. The letters come up, bringing before us the dark and cheerless picture of many families without an altar of devotion—of churches, a few of whose members are left alone in the house of prayer—of congregations, for another whole year blessed with the means of grace apparently almost without signs of improvement. These things call loudly for an humbling of ourselves before God, and a more thorough consecration to his service. Oh! that we might do so, and during the year to come be blessed with a more extended work of revival.

Resolutions.

1. Resolved, That this Association advises the churches of which it is composed, to invite such sister churches as they may please, to meet with them and aid in the ordination of such of their members as they may deem qualified for the gospel ministry, instead of sending them to the Association for examination and ordination.

2. Resolved, That duty to God, to ourselves, and to the rising generation, imperiously demands of us, as Seventh-day Baptists, that we give a cordial support to our Publication Society, both by purchasing its publications ourselves, and by prevailing on others to do the same.

√ 3. Resolved, That the articles which recently appeared in the Sabbath Recorder, entitled, "Denominational Sins," are most heartily approved by this Association, and commended to the consideration of our brethren.

4. Resolved, That while this Association regards the doings of its Executive Committee with interest, it especially commends their efforts to supply feeble and destitute churches with the preached gospel; believing such a course more advisable than to expend our efforts to seek new fields, leaving our own churches destitute.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR THE MINISTRY.

The subject of ministerial education has within a few years elicited much valuable thought. We have reason to believe, that much prejudice has been overcome, and that many false notions have yielded to the sway of true Bible teachings. Most heartily do I approve all judicious measures for the elevation of the gospel ministry; among which I deem the education of the ministry of vital importance. The time may not yet have come when our denomination can launch forth into extensive and expensive schemes of education; but the time has fully come when the subject should be thoroughly investigated and discussed. Hence I conceive that the various resolutions and reports which have been brought before our Associations and Conference, as well as articles in the Recorder, have not been ill-timed or premature. I think the subject should be kept before the people, until its merits and demerits are fairly understood. Obvious as may be the truths of any proposed reform, it were folly to expect that success will crown the most judicious scheme on its first presentation. The work must be slow, and the patience of the most enduring must be severely tested. Hence, it is not characteristic of the true reformer, to denounce the people who may not at once appreciate his plan, and take hold of the work with alacrity. He must labor on, content with slow marches and apparently small results.

That we need highly qualified ministers, must be conceded by all. There may, however, be a difference of opinion as to what constitutes the most desirable qualifications. There are not a few who discard a thorough education as a necessary qualification for the minister of the gospel. But, if I mistake not, the most ultra of these will admit, that a minister cannot have too much mental discipline, provided it be wholly consecrated to God, and let not his education puff him up and make him forget his holy calling; while, on the other hand, the most strenuous advocate of an educated ministry does not claim that any amount of unsanctified intellect can qualify the minister for his holy avocation.

Much stress is laid by "A MINISTER," in a well-written article in the Recorder of May 27th, on "aptness to teach," as an indispensable qualification for the ministry. This is certainly the teaching of the Bible, as quoted by the writer; but as to what amount of aptness to teach is indispensable, the Bible has not informed us, and the writer has left us in the dark on this point. He insists with much earnestness, that the candidate for holy orders shall be a teacher, and that, however much zeal and piety and goodness a man may possess, if he want "aptness to teach," he can never receive ordination—under his "incog." Now, as this "aptness to teach" is a variable quantity, and as the writer has specified no degrees of excellence to be required, it has occurred to me, that his remarks may tend to discourage those who may be approved of God as his armor-bearers. If we adopt the sentiment of the writer, unqualified as it is, we may never ordain another minister, for it is hardly supposable that all the members of the presbytery will adopt the same standard of excellence to be required of the candidate. We may suppose that "A Minister" would require a very high degree of "aptness to teach," while other ministers might be content to accept great piety, zeal and perseverance, with small "aptness to teach." It seems to me that we should avoid both extremes.

But while I admit that "aptness to teach" is required by the Bible, I firmly believe that this qualification is less essential to success than the others already specified. I predicate this belief on the teachings of the Bible, and on human experience. It seems to me that the preaching of Christ and the apostles was not so much "exegetical" as it was the spontaneous outgushing of that deep-toned devotion which so eminently characterized them. They did not deal so much in elaborate discussions, and "exegetical" essays, as in simple truth, unadorned, save by the heart-reaching emotions with which it was uttered. I do not believe the Galilean fishermen, when called to the ministry, were possessed of great aptness to teach; but, being possessed of great zeal and piety and perseverance, they grew in this grace. It seems to me that Christ's notable Sermon on the Mount is not remarkably "exegetical," but is remarkable for its practical and simple truth. Now, the experience of all the past teaches that deep-toned piety, coupled with unyielding perseverance and burning zeal, have been the predominant elements of ministerial success.

While I admit that great "aptness to teach" adds efficiency to these qualifications, I must nevertheless believe, that this is not an indispensable prerequisite of success; for many have been eminently successful who have not been remarkably "apt to teach." But, on the other hand, I do not believe, that great "aptness to teach," unaccompanied by these other virtues, has ever been successful in winning souls to God. Without designing any invidious comparisons, I may allude to the unparalleled success which has attended the Methodist preaching in this country. It has moved on like a resistless torrent, conquering, not so much by the scholastic accuracy of its teachings, as by the warmth and sincerity with which it has uttered the simple truths of the gospel. I believe that at the present time less good is done by the most learned and studied sermons, than by those having more soul and less mechanical accuracy. I readily admit, that "talking an hour, and waxing warm," may not be characteristic of the true minister, provided his talk be not true and appreciable; but we have more to fear from cold, formal, and lifeless recitations, that never wax warm, than from those soul-stirring exhortations which have great warmth, and less accuracy. The latter have always been more effective than the former, and although "zeal and piety and eminent success" do "beautifully adorn the private Christian," they no less adorn the minister; and if the young candidate has been successful, and if "many have been converted under his labors," it seems to me that the ministry needs him none the less because souls have been converted by means of "zeal and piety." While his zeal and piety has been warming souls into life, the "exegetical discourses" of others may have been freezing souls to death.

Now, if it be admitted that the conversion of souls be the great purpose of the gospel ministry, it seems to me that he who is greatly instrumental in converting souls, is highly qualified for that ministry.

It seems to me, that public teaching is but a small part of the minister's duty. He needs, above all men, those virtues which render private labor successful. The apostles did not succeed so much by learned public discourses as by faithful and persevering private effort. They mingled with the people, and "taught" them repentance and faith by word and deed. We need ministers whose pre-eminent "piety and zeal" shall be living teachers. He who has most piety is the most "apt to teach" piety. While it is highly important that we be schooled in the doctrines of Christianity, it is more important that we be "taught" practical godliness. Hence I consider that the candidate may be "apt to teach" who may not have grappled with all the metaphysical abstractions of theological schools, nor be able to frame a discourse after the "latest style." If he can express the simple truths of the gospel, with earnestness and warmth, his daily piety will do more towards enforcing them, than all the exegetical nicety of the most fashionable divine can do.

I have not, in the foregoing remarks, intended to discard "aptness to teach," as a ministerial qualification. I have only endeavored to show its true relation to other qualifications.

Now, what are the wants of our denomination? It is the part of wisdom to yield to the necessities of the present, and patiently provide for the future. No fact is more painfully obvious than that there is a great destitution of ministers in our denomination. If we allow that all those now in the field are duly qualified, yet it is true that many more are needed. Many of our oldest churches are destitute of pastors, and are fast declining, while numerous small churches in the West are struggling to maintain a precarious existence, without the preached word, except as accident may bring it to them. Such is our present condition. But what will be the future? The gray hairs and trembling voices of our fathers in the gospel, plainly admonish us of a greater destitution still, about to come upon us. One by one they ascend to their reward, and turn back their wishful eyes to see on whom their mantles fall. Now, shall we raise a standard which it is at present impossible to reach, and thus let the chasm continue to widen, or shall we fill these vacancies, as fast as they occur, with the best material we can now obtain, while at the same time we urge forward our plans of education, thus providing both for the present and future? The latter seems to me to be our true policy. We must not expect that the new candidate will be as strong as the hero of many battles, who has just fallen. Many of our strongest ministers were weak when they began. They were not very "apt to teach" then, but they were pious, zealous, and persevering, and by these they have conquered in many well-fought battles. So it will be with the rising generation of ministers, (if indeed we do not forbid them to rise, by unreasonable exactions.)

In conclusion, I may say, that I am in favor of securing the highest degree of excellence in the ministry. We should aim at a thoroughly educated ministry—a ministry "apt to teach" the whole gospel; but it were suicidal to our best interest to make such qualifications a sine qua non of the ministry at present. Let us make the best of present circumstances, and keep our ship from sinking until competent pilots and sailors can be secured.

A Layman.

New York State Temperance Society.—At the recent annual meeting of the N. Y. State Temperance Society, it was stated that the Society has had three agents actively engaged in canvassing the State during the year, and that several others have been engaged during portions of the same time. More than half of the counties of the State have been visited, and most of this number thoroughly canvassed. The principal efforts of the Executive Committee have been in behalf of the principles of the Maine Law. Over 300,000 petitioners had been brought to beseech the action of the Legislature on this subject, and the action of that body had been as favorable as could have been anticipated. A large part of an afternoon session was consumed in the consideration of a proposition made by Dr. Mandeville, of Albany, to strike out a sentence in the report of the Executive Committee, complimentary to the Woman's State Temperance Society, and substituting a sentence indorsing the efforts of woman in her proper sphere—the social and domestic circles. Speeches pro and con were made by a large number of the members. The proposition was adopted by a vote of 62 to 59.

California News.—The steamer Crescent City, with eleven days later news from California, two million dollars in gold dust, and a large number of passengers, arrived at New York on Second-day. The news is not important. Discoveries of gold continue to be made, both in California and Oregon. On the other hand, it is said that a company recently left San Francisco for the silver mines of Mexico. Great mortality is reported among passengers to San Francisco on the Pacific side.

Suicide of M. S. Brundage.—As any information upon this subject will be very desirable, I would say, that since a notice was written for the Recorder his friends have visited the place, and ascertained that his health had been considerably on the decline for near a week, from over-doing and working in the water, and that, at the time of his death, he was laboring under severe brain fever. Upon close inquiry, his friends are satisfied that he was unconscious of whatever passed during the morning and forenoon of the fatal day.

SECOND-DAY, JUNE 21.

In the Senate, nothing of importance was done. The bill relating to salt lands in Michigan was passed, besides which some petitions, were referred, and communication rs eceived.

The House met, read the journal, and adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, JUNE 22.

In the Senate, a number of petitions were presented, and reports were made upon several private matters. The bill extending the time for the selection of lands granted to Michigan, for saline purposes, was read a third time and passed.

The House spent some time upon the bill granting lands to all the States; Missouri, Alabama, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, Arkansas, California, Illinois, to use theirs for railroad purposes; the remaining States for educational purposes; all land granted by any other act during the present Congress, to any State, for railroads, to be deducted from the amount granted by this bill. A motion to lay it upon the table was negatived by a vote of 73 against 99. The morning hour having expired, this subject was laid aside, and the Senate bill to establish a branch mint at San Francisco was taken up and passed.

FOURTH-DAY, JUNE 23.

In the Senate, Mr. Seward, from the Select Committee on the subject, reported a joint resolution for the purchase of "Catlin's Collection of Indian Scenes, Portraits," &c. Mr. Mason, from the committee on Foreign Claims, reported a joint resolution for the relief of the Spanish Consul, and other Spanish subjects residing at New Orleans and Key West, for losses sustained by violence during the year 1851. A large number of territorial bills were received from the House, and were taken up, and appropriately referred. The joint resolution from the House, accepting the portrait of Henry Clay, presented to the Nation by Mr. Fagnani, of New York, and directing it to be placed in the Congressional Library, was taken up and passed.

The House resumed the consideration of Bennett's Land Bill, granting land to all the States for Railroad and Educational purposes, which, after considerable discussion, was read a third time and passed over. The Deficiency Bill, as returned from the Senate with amendments, occupied the remainder of the day, but was not finally acted upon.

FIFTH-DAY, JUNE 24.

The Senate spent a large part of the day in discussing a resolution to amend the rules in a certain point, and finally tabled the resolution.

The House agreed to an amendment by the Senate to the House bill providing more effectually for the punishment of incendiarism in the District of Columbia, and to make all house-burning Penitentiary offences. The remainder of the day was occupied in a discussion of the Land Grant Bill, the Pennsylvania election case, and the Deficiency Bill, neither of which was disposed of.

SIXTH DAY, JUNE 25.

The Senate was occupied all day upon private bills or in executive session, and at the conclusion adjourned over to Second-day.

In the House, Mr. Bennett's Bill appropriating lands to all the States for railroad and educational purposes, was farther discussed, but not disposed of. Ditto of the Pennsylvania contested election case.

SABBATH-DAY, JUNE 26.

The House only was in session. Mr. Bennett's Bill giving lands to all the States for railroad and educational purposes was farther considered, and finally passed by a vote of 96 to 86. The bill appropriates to Missouri three millions of acres, to Alabama, two million five hundred thousand acres; to Iowa, three millions of acres; to Michigan, two million five hundred thousand acres; to Wisconsin, two million five hundred thousand acres; to Louisiana, two million five hundred thousand acres; to Mississippi, two million acres; to Florida, two million acres; to Arkansas, three million acres; to California, three million acres; to Illinois, one million acres; to Indiana, all the public land not sold, located, or reserved, lying within her limits, and one million acres in addition thereto; to Ohio, all the public land not sold, located, or reserved, lying within her limits, and two millions of acres in addition thereto; and to each of the States, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee, at the rate of one hundred and fifty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative in the Thirty-second Congress from said States respectively; and to each of the organized Territories and the District of Columbia, one hundred and fifty thousand acres. The eleven States first named are to apply their shares in the construction of railroads, and the remainder of the States and Territories, and the District of Columbia, are to expend theirs for the support of schools, or for other educational purposes.

European News.

Ten days later news from Europe has been received since our last, by the steamers Franklin, Niagara, and Atlantic. The following is a summary of it.

The proceedings in the English Parliament are devoid of interest to readers on this side the water.

Queen Victoria has issued a proclamation prohibiting the public exercise of Roman Catholic ceremonies elsewhere than in places of public worship.

The Cape of Good Hope Mail packet, Harbinger, with dates from the Cape to the 2d May, had arrived in England. The news showed most clearly, that, contrary to all expectations, the war is far from being finished. The Kaffirs had rallied throughout the Amatolus, and had gone back to the Waterkloof, where Macome was in command, and had been joined by a large number of rebel Hottentots. The Kaffirs are as much unsubdued as ever, and fight with the greatest energy and fierceness. It was thought, however, that the policy of the new Commander-in-Chief, General Cathcart, would soon tell powerfully upon them. He had directed that the cattle of the Kaffirs should be destroyed when captured. Two of the rebel chiefs had been captured and sentenced to be hung, to strike terror into the remaining Chiefs.

Messrs. Viana, Jones & Chappell, of Liverpool, announce a line of steamers to commence running on the first of August, between Liverpool and Australia. Three of the intended steamers are now employed in the Mediterranean.

Mr. Otto Goldschmidt and Madame Goldschmidt, late Jenny Lind, returned to Europe by the Atlantic, Captain West, which arrived in the Mersey on Wednesday, the 9th ult. On landing she was enthusiastically cheered. M. and Madame Goldschmidt drove to the house of John Bald, Esq., the Swedish Consul at Liverpool, whose guest she was to be for a few days. She was in excellent health and spirits. The crew of the Atlantic fired a salute on Jenny's leaving the vessel. We understand that it is not her intention to give any performance during her stay at Liverpool.

The extensive printing establishment of the Messrs. Clowes, in London, was damaged by fire recently to the extent of $50,000. The whole of the editions of the "Illustrated Catalogue of the Great Exhibition," and of "Knight's Illustrated Shakspeare," were destroyed.

The National Exhibition of Irish Industry was opened at Cork on Thursday, June 10th.

The Roman Catholic religious population in the Canton of Fessido in Switzerland are superseded, and their property confiscated, by an order of a General Council, carried by a majority of two. This act of intolerance has stirred up anew the spirit of discontent that at present pervades the Republic.

The greater part of Bosnia Serai, the capital of Bosnia, was destroyed by fire on the 23d May. During the conflagration the troops committed the most abominable acts of rapine and pillage.

Latest news from Rangoon is to the 23d April. No further collision had taken place. Cholera was abating. A cessation of hostilities is at least temporarily restored, for Burmese laborers were crowding into the city, tempted by the offer of wages at the rate 2 annas (6 cents) per day. The European troops are suffering from want of proper food and shelter, their rations consisting chiefly of bad pork. No hint has transpired respecting future movements. In all probablity nothing will be done till after the monsoon. Contradictory accounts reach camp of the force of the Burmese, some stating 25,000, others say the enemy has entirely disbanded. The Burmese Governor recently sent a messenger to Gen. Godwin, offering to open negotiations, but the General tore the missive, and sent word that if the British catch the Governor, they will hang him for firing on their flag of truce. The Governor is said to offer 50 rupees for the head of every white soldier, and 30 for Hindoos.

SUMMARY.

On the evening of June 14, about 2,000 of the inhabitants of Dunkirk rose en masse, and attacked the house of Henry Tiles, foreman in the New York and Erie Railroad machine shop, and having captured him, burnt his house to the ground. Tiles having accused another man, named Isaac Smith, in the same establishment, of having improper intercourse with his wife, with a view of extorting money from him, on the false oath of Tiles' wife, Smith was arrested, tried and acquitted. Smith took it so much to heart that he committed suicide. Tiles' wife then confessed her perjury. On the facts getting wind, the inhabitants rose as above.

A dispatch dated Troy, June 27, 1852, says: This afternoon, at 1½ o'clock, a fire broke out in the steam iron mill of the Albany Iron Works, in this city, which destroyed a large portion of these extensive works, and some fifteen or twenty dwelling-houses, occupied chiefly by the operatives in the factory. The Troy Iron and Nail Works, in the immediate vicinity, were at one time in imminent danger, but were saved by the exertions of the firemen and citizens. The fire, it is said, was caused by the falling of a lighted lamp into spirits of turpentine, which one of the workmen was drawing from a barrel. The full amount of loss will probably reach $150,000 at least.

A Water Spout, says the Abingdon Virginian, discharged itself in that county, near Brown's Furnace, recently, during a very heavy shower of rain. Several men took shelter in a building near the Furnace, when one of them saw descending from the heavens an immense volume of water, and with an exclamation of terror sprang from the house, his companions following him. They had scarcely left the building, when the volume, discharging itself in the creek, swept away the building the men had left, together with a mill which stood upon the stream.

Mr. Silas Perry died at Keene, N. H., June 3d, aged eighty-nine years. He entered the revolutionary army in 1779, when but sixteen years old, and was one of a detachment of soldiers who guarded the house in which Major Andre was confined, and who escorted him to the gallows on the 2d of October, 1780. It is quite probable that Mr. Perry was the last survivor of that "Old Guard." Mr. Perry was born in Leominster, Mass., had resided fifty-two years in Keene, and has been a pensioner for twenty years.

A case of lynching recently occurred in Marshall, Harrison Co, Texas. A young man presented himself to one of the most respectable merchants of that place as an applicant for a clerkship, with a forged letter of recommendation. The forgery was detected, charged upon him, and he confessed it. He then attempted to leave the town, but a party of eight or ten men, who had become acquainted with the circumstances, seized and whipped him most severely.

While some laborers were digging a ditch for a fence in the Alamo, in San Antonia, recently, they came suddenly upon several pieces of ordnance, since which time thirteen cannon have already been recovered from their hiding place, four of which are copper, and nine iron pieces, from one to twenty-four-pounders, all spiked, and the trunnions and knobs of the cascables broken off. An old Mexican woman says they were buried there by the brave men under the command of the noble Travis, Bowie and Crockett, at the siege of the Alamo, in 1836.

While two gentlemen, strangers, were recently viewing the Chaudiere Falls, Canada. one of them somehow lost his foothold, slipped into the water, and was carried over the Falls, a hight of 120 feet. Fortunately he was floated into a shallow part of the river, where he regained his footing, and remained there until assistance could be rendered to him. He was severely bruised in tumbling over the rocks, so much so that he had to be conveyed to New Liverpool on a bed in a cart.

Some three years since, a poor factory girl working in one of the villages on Blackstone River, in Rhode Island, was given a sealed letter by a maiden aunt, with a solemn injunction not to open it until she was 18 years old. The girl was then 15. On the 23d of last month, being her 18th birth-day, she opened the letter, and found directions for her to obtain a fortune of $8,000, willed to her by the aunt, who has since died. On Thursday last the fortunate girl obtained the whole amount in cash. She will probably have plenty of applications from young gentlemen to be permitted to assist her in taking care of it.

The clip of Wool in the Western States this year, it is estimated, will exceed that of 1851 about fifteen per cent. In Ohio alone the clip will be about 14,000,000 of pounds. Australia has heretofore been a great Wool-growing country, and large shipments have been made annually to Great Britain. This year the receipts of Wool into England from Australia are likely to be much smaller than usual, in consequence of the excitement caused by the production of gold-dust and the scarcity of laborers in agricultural pursuits.

The new law passed by the Legislature of Maine, respecting marriage licenses, saves $5 to the young New Brunswickers who desire to "haste to the wedding," in the purchase of a license, and Calais is likely to become the Gretna Green of the border. On the southern border, also, (says the Boston Courier,) where the clergymen have felt that their dues were improperly filched from them by clergymen and justices of New Hampshire, the law will probably act like a protective tariff, and keep the money paid for marriage fees at home.

A dispatch dated Buffalo, Saturday, June 26, 1852, says: The propeller Montezuma sprung a leak last night, between Ashtabula and Conneaut, on Lake Erie, and the fires were extinguished. Some 500 bbls. flour, 200 bbls. of whisky, several casks tobacco, and a large quantity of wool, were cast overboard, and the propeller finally reached here this morning, after a hard night of bailing and pumping. Vessel and cargo insured.

The steamer Yacht has arrived at New Orleans, bringing Rio Grande dates to the 12th June. The outrages on the frontier were on the increase, and murders were of frequent occurrence. The newspapers are filled with accounts of incursions to the American side, made by Mexicans and Indians. Five persons had been murdered near Augua Negro, and a party of Americans who started in pursuit of the murderers were forced to retreat, not being strong enough to effect anything.

The trial of Abijah Larned for the robbery of the Otsego County Bank of $32,000, in December, 1850, was concluded Saturday night. The jury, after being out one hour, returned a verdict of guilty, at half past nine. Hon. D. S. Dickinson, who pleaded in behalf of the prisoner, occupied six hours and a half. Hon. John C. Spencer was employed for the prosecution, and closed in a speech of several hours' duration.

On Sunday, the 13th June, two brothers, W. H. and Andrew J. Lawrence, residing at Estell County, on Red River, had an altercation relative to a partition fence. A. J. Lawrence went and got his rifle, came back, and in the presence of four or five persons, shot his brother while sitting on the fence, the ball taking effect in the eye and killing him instantly.

The U. S. Razee Independence, Com. Charles W. Morgan, from Leghorn, via Gibralter, May 14, arrived at New York last Friday. The U. S. steam-frigate San Jacinto, left on the same day, on a cruise to the eastward. The Independence has been absent 35 months, having left Norfolk 26th July, 1849, rates 56 guns, with a company of 560 men.

The New Orleans papers contain Texas dates to the 15th ult. Lieutenant Haven, of the Second Dragoons, and fifteen men, have had a skirmish with the Camanches, in which two of the latter were killed and thirty-eight horses and four captive children were recovered. The children say that the Indians had murdered their father and mother and elder brother and sister three days before the recapture.

We learn from the Evansville (Ind.) Journal, that the work on the unfinished portion of the Wabash and Erie Canal, is progressing rapidly. Large numbers of men are employed at different points, and nothing but an unusually sickly season can prevent the completion of the work by November next.

The Washington National Monument is languishing for want of means to carry it on. The Board of Managers suggest to clergymen throughout the Uuited States, that as the anniversary of our independence falls on Sunday, they shall each and all take up collections in their churches for this great and patriotic object.

The members of the Legislature of Connecticut are men of the following occupations: Farmers, 140; Manufacturers, 29; Mechanics, 23; Merchants, 15; Lawyers, 11; Physicians, 7; Teachers, 4; Tanners, 4; Carmen, 8; Clergymen, 2; Author, 1; Publisher, 1; Printer, 1; Surveyor, 1; Treasurer, 1; Quarryman, 1; Hotel-keeper, 1.

At Hartford, Ct., June 21st, as the Whigs were firing a national salute of 100 guns in honor of Scott's nomination, a man named Viberts, who was assisting to fire the pieces, went before the gun just as it was discharging, and was instantly torn to pieces. Some parts of his body were blown ten rods.

At Harper's Ferry, June 21st, a serious accident occurred while a salute was being fired in honor of the visit of the Board of Directors of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company—invited guests of the town. The cannon burst, killing Mr. James McLaughlin and a negro man instantly, and seriously wounding several others.

An iron bridge, five hundred and thirty-eight feet long, is to be erected by the Central Ohio Railroad Company, over the Muskingum, at Zanesville. It is to have four spans, 124½ feet each, containing 67 tons of wrought, and 130 tons of cast iron. The only timber used will be in the floor, which will require 65,000 feet of lumber.

Geo. Peabody, Esq., the eminent London Banker, has given to the town of Danvers, Mass., his native place, the munificent sum of twenty thousand dollars for the establishment of a Lyceum and Library, and the erection of the necessary buildings.

Brewer, the Suffolk Bank defaulter, has been sentenced to three years imprisonment in the State Prison, and one day solitary confinement.

Oliver H. Rand has been arrested in Richmond, Va., on a charge of being concerned in the Portsmouth Bank robbery. The arrest was made on a telegraphic dispatch from Boston, a brother of Rand having been arrested there with some of the stolen notes upon him, which he alledged to have received from the former.

Rev. Dr. Stow, pastor of the Rowe-st. Church, Boston, baptized ten persons on a recent Sunday. Of this number, four were young men, of nearly the same age, bearing the names of Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, William Henry Harrison, and Benjamin Franklin.

A dispatch dated Cincinnati, June 22d, says: The weather is warm, and the Cholera is prevailing to some extent among the laboring classes on the Covington and Lexington Railroad. A few scattering cases have occurred in the city.

St. Louis papers report that the Missouri River boats do not make a trip without having one or more cases of a disease resembling cholera aboard. It is said that the sick die without experiencing any sensation of pain.

Aaron R. Levering, a prominent and influential citizen, and formerly Whig candidate for Mayor of Baltimore, died on Friday, June 25. He was one of the defenders of North Point.

A grand Temperance and Educational Convention is to be held at White Sulphur Springs, Gaines County, Texas, on the 11th, 14th and 16th days of August next.

There is a finer prospect this season for heavy corn and cotton crops throughout the eastern counties of Texas than has ever been known.

The number of Military Land Warrants issued is stated to be 111,000; of which 17,000 were for 160 acres, 37,000 for 80 acres, and 57,000 for 40 acres.

Thomas Davis has been convicted at Boston of murder in the first degree, in cutting his sister's throat, because she had married a man whom he did not like.

Mr. Clay still continues in an extremely feeble and low state, and there have been no signs of amendment during the past few days.

Mr. G. L. Bartlett, baker, of Mendon, Mass., died on the 23d June, from burns occasioned by the explosion of burning fluid.

Mrs. Betsey Grimes, an invalid, died a few days since in Boston, from drinking too much iced lemonade.

During the week ending June 26, there were 190 deaths in the city and liberties of Philadelphia. Of consumption, 17.

Mr. F. Rhoebus, of Baltimore, fell from a scaffold at Wilmington, on Wednesday, June 29, and was killed.

MARRIED,

In Genesee, N. Y., June 5, 1852, by Eld. Henry P. Greene, Mr. Samuel Crandall, of Genesee, to Miss Alsina Brown, of Clarksville.

DIED,

On the 21st of June, Mrs. Phebe, wife of Auly Ayars, in the fifty-sixth year of her age. Her illness was painful and protracted. "Tumoruos ulcers, of various dimensions and in great numbers, appeared on her person, very painful, unusual in their appearance, and unyielding to medical remedies, finally wore out an uncommonly strong and active constitution." But her suffering was borne with great fortitude and resignation; she never was heard to murmur or complain of her situation, but said she was in the hands of the Lord, let him do what seemed good to him. She expressed strong confidence, saying she had no fear of death, and entertained no doubt of being accepted in the beloved. She selected the 17th Psalm to be read at her funeral, and the fifteenth and last verse to be used for a text on that occasion. Funeral on the afternoon of the 22d, at the meeting-house, Marlborough.

D. C.

In Verona, N. Y., June 8th, of cancer, Elisha Maxson, aged 76 years. He suffered much for several months before his death, but he endured his sufferings with Christian patience. Brother Maxson was one of the first settlers in Verona; he emigrated from Hopkinton, R. I., to this State in early life, and united with the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Verona at its organization, of which he remained a worthy member until removed by death to join the church triumphant.

THE Trustees of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society will hold their next Quarterly Meeting at the house of David Dunn, New Market, N. J., on Fourth-day, July 7. T. B. STILLMAN, Rec. Sec.

Notice.

THE Executive Board of the American Sabbath Tract Society have employed Bro. E. P. Larkin to visit the churches in behalf of the Society. Bro. L. will act as agent for the Society's publications. It is hoped that every family will take this opportunity to procure for its library a bound volume of our Tracts on the Sabbath, and a copy of Carlow's Defense of the Sabbath.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

New York and Boston.

REGULAR MAIL LINE, via Stonington, for Boston Providence, New Bedford, Taunton, and Newport carrying the great Eastern U. S. Mail, without change of cars or detention. The secure and elegant steamers C. VANDERBILT and COMMODORE leave on alternate days (Sundays excepted) Pier No. 2 North River, (first wharf above Battery-place,) at 5 o'clock P. M. For passage, state-rooms, or freight, apply at Pier No. 2, or at the office, No. 11 Battery-place.

To Boston via Norwich and Worcester.

THE first-class Sound steamers CONNECTICUT and KNICKERBOCKER leave Pier 18, N. R., foot of Courtland-st., New York, forming the great United States and British Mail Line for Boston, Montreal, Quebec, Lowell, and Nashua, via Norwich and Worcester. Fare to New London $2; to Worcester $3; to Boston $4; to Bellows' Falls, Vt., $5; to Burlington $7; to Rowse's Point $8. Through tickets to Montreal $9 50.

The pier from which this line starts is the most contiguous of any occupied by the Sound Lines, to the Astor House, Irving House. Howard Hotel, Rathbun's Hotel, and the numerous Hotels in Courtland-st. and its vicinity. The passage affords a fine view of the Hudson and East Rivers, and the Route being Inland, avoids the uncomfortable passage round Point Judith, and through Fisher's Island Sound. Passengers can if they prefer, arrive in Boston at an early hour, by the Steamboat Train, or have the privilege of remaining and breakfasting on board the Steamers, and take the early train from Norwich to Boston; thus making the hour of arrival equally accommodated to pleasure and business travel.

Spring Arrangements, May 3, 1852.

FOR Clinton and intermediate places, from pier No. 1 North River, by steamboat RED JACKET, at 9 A. M., 1 (freight) and 5 P. M., and connects at Elizabethtown with trains on the New Jersey Railroad, which leave New York from foot of Cortland-st. at 9 A. M., 1 and 5 P. M.

Returning, leave Clinton at 8.15 A. M., 12.30 P. M. White House at 3.15 (freight) and 5.40 and 8.40 A. M.; and 1.40 P. M.; Somerville at 4 (freight) and 6.05 and 9.05 A. M., and 2.05 P. M.; Plainfield at 5.10 (freight) and 6.40 and 9.45 A. M., and 2.40 P. M.; Elizabethtown at 7.15 and 10.30 A. M., and 3.15 P. M.

Passengers for Easton, Bethlehem, Allentown, Wilkesbarre, and Maunch Chunk, Pa., and Flemington, N. Germantown, N. J., will take the 9 A. M. train from New York, and on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, for New Hampton, Washington, Belvidere, N. J. Stages leave Somerville daily for Peapack and Pluckamine on the arrival of the 1 P. M. train. All baggage at the risk of the owners, until delivered into the actual possession of the agents of the Company, and checks or receipts given therefor.

New York and Erie Railroad.

TRAINS leave pier foot of Duane-st., New York, as follows:—

Express Train at 6½ A.M. for Dunkirk, connecting with first-class steamboats for Cleveland, Sandusky, Toledo, and Monroe, and railroads to Cincinnati and Chicago.

Mail Train at 8 A.M. for all stations.

Way Train at 3½ P.M., via Piermont, for Delaware.

Way Train at 4½ P.M., via Jersey City, for Delaware.

Night Express Train at 6 P.M. for Dunkirk, connecting with first-class steamboat for Detroit direct, connecting with Express Train for Chicago.

Emigrant Train at 6 P.M., via Piermont.

The following are the times of leaving the several stations named:—

Hornellsville:
Going East—11.10 A.M., 4.30, 10.32, 11.07 P.M.
Going West—8.20 A.M., 6.56, 7.25, 12.50 P.M.

Alfred:
Going East—4.03 and 10.18 P.M.
Going West—1.18 and 8.16 P.M.

Genesee:
Going East—10.09 A.M., 3.25 and 9.18 P.M.
Going West—9.18 A.M., 2.02, 7.54, 9.18 P.M.

Belvidere:
Going East—9.40 A.M., 2.53 and 8.16 P.M.
Going West—9.40 A.M., 2.30 and 8.16 P.M.

Friendship:
Going East—2.41 and 7.54 P. M.
Going West—2.41 and 10.13 P.M.

Olean:
Going East—8.45 A.M., 1.47, 6.23, 7.56 P.M.
Going West—10.29 A.M., 3.41, 9.10, 11.40 P.M.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Miscellaneous.

The Grave of the Shipwrecked.

We leave thee here alone,
With none to weep and moan,
Stranger, o'er thy sad doom,
Save the roaring billow.
Thy cold death bed's pillow,
And the night's dreary gloom!

We found thee on our shore,
And thy rigid features bore
Death's pale, well-known seal.
The wind howled o'er thee,
The crow's beak touched thee,
But thou couldst not feel.

Unknown to us thy former tale;
No sight was there on thy visage pale
Of glory or of shame.
In silence we interred thee;
Sadly we have given thee
A grave without a name.

Perhaps some dear ones watch afar,
E'en by the light of evening star,
To welcome thee with gladness.
And they look and say, "To-morrow,"
Till their eyes grow dim with sorrow,
And hope is lost in sadness.

Afflicted ones, lift up your eyes;
His home is there, above the skies;
What sleeps in dust is dust.
But One there is, mighty to save,
Who watches o'er his lonely grave;
In him put ye your trust.

Fetish Worship of the Africans.

From the "Journal of a Voyage from Boston to the West Coast of Africa. By. J. A. Carnes."

Most all of the adult negroes of this place, among the males, we observe had a "Fetish" of some kind or other suspended from the neck. Some of these were in the form of a crescent; others were of different shapes and materials, and, generally, nearly covered all over with small marine shells, which gave to them a very pretty appearance. Whenever it thundered, we noticed they always took hold of their Fetish with one or both hands, and muttered something over it, as if they were praying to some imaginary deity. If they were on board our vessel, in their canoes, or on their native soil, the same singular idolatrous worship was performed. But the smaller Fetishes are only worshiped as inferior deities. They have others of a superior order, called "Grand Fetishes," whom they appeal to on great occasions. The "snake" is one of these. We saw a very large tree, which the natives informed us was the resort of a monstrous serpent some thirty feet in length. We should have doubted the story of the serpent, notwithstanding the assertion of the Africans, although we had tangible evidence of the tree, had not an English gentleman, who had seen this enormous snake several times with his own eyes, satisfied us of its truth. On particular occasions, we were informed that several of the natives would resort to it in a body when they thought their private or inferior Fetishes had not sufficient power to protect them. At such times as drouth, or famine, or any other great calamity, they would go in considerable numbers, forming a kind of procession, with their rude gongs or drums beating, and trumpets sounding, and when they arrived within about twenty or thirty rods of the tree they would suddenly halt. For a few minutes they maintain perfect silence, and them commence their worship by beating upon their gongs with all their might, with quick and rapid strokes, while the trumpets send forth their loudest and most lively strains. Now, songs and dances begin to the praise of this horrid living idol, or "Grand Fetish," that, even during these singular devotions, has at such times been seen with his enormous folds coiled round a limb of the tree, his head projecting some five or six feet from the wavy folds in a horizontal direction watching for his prey. Sometimes, the noise made by trumpet and drum would alarm him, and uncoiling himself from the limb, he would reach the ground and escape into the thicknesses of the forest. When they had thus seen him escape, they would approach nearer to the tree, still continuing their songs and dances. After they had, as they thought, appeased the anger of their heathen god by these peculiar devotions, they would give more substantial evidence of their sincerity by tying two or three goats near the resort of their "all powerful idol," that he might satisfy his appetite at his leisure. The poor goats were not allowed to crop the tender herbage around them, even to the extent of the tether which made these unsuspecting and innocent animals prisoners for such a dreadful sacrifice—for his snakeship had been watched by one or two English gentlemen, after the natives had retired, and he had been seen to return, coil himself around one of the limbs of the tree for a few minutes, and then suddenly darting upon the prey nearest to him, inclose the harmless goat while cropping the herbage within the mazes of his slimy folds, almost instantly breaking every bone in his body, while the crushed mass of bones, sinews and flesh, soon disappeared as it was gradually swallowed whole by the monster reptile. In this manner one by one of the living sacrifices left by the superstitious and idolatrous Africans were feasted upon by this heathen god or Grand Fetish!

After gorging himself thus, this serpent was observed to have increased more than one-half in circumference, and would remain in a kind of torpid state, sometimes for two or three days, when it might have been destroyed with the greatest ease and safety. And, generally, when the natives see a large snake in this state, they destroy him for the sake of the skin which they dispose of to European and American traders for a considerable sum; but in no case whatever would an African raise his hand against the "Grand Fetish" or a particular serpent as above described. Neither would they permit a white man to inflict the least injury upon this idol of their worship; for even among themselves the penalty of such an offense is death, and more than one European has lost his life on this coast, (as I shall mention in some future pages,) by inadvertently killing a "Fetish snake," not knowing the peculiar superstitions of the natives for this living reptile.

They have, also, another Fetish, somewhat resembling a Chinese idol. This is in the form of a negro in a [illegible] posture, or, rather more like squatting. It is generally made of a blackish earth or clay, placed on a sort of pedestal and adorned with a kind of red cloth ornamented with shells. On the top of the head are lizards, snakes, etc., with red feathers in the midst. Two or three half calabashes are placed before it. One of them contains two or three earthen balls. This idol is generally invoked or consulted when they commence any capital undertaking or anything very unusual.

They have also another Fetish, which is the sea. This, they seem to think, can be as auspicious to them in their various undertakings as the serpent, tree, earthen idol, or any other that they worship. Sometimes, when the weather is stormy and boisterous, they form a procession and walk toward the sea. Here, an ox, and sometimes a goat only, is killed upon the beach, where the blood is suffered to tinge the golden sands as it mingles with the waves that break in snowy foam upon the shore. And to complete the sacrifice, one of the priests throws a ring of pure gold as far into the sea as the strength of his arm will permit, and thus is the anger of their imaginary god or Fetish appeased. In relation to these Fetishes, as above stated, they do not apply to the natives in particular near Dix Cove, but to many of the tribes along the whole coast with whom we trafficked.

Why and Because.

Why is plumbago improperly called black lead? Because it consists of iron, and a certain proportion of carbon; and thus, there is no lead in its composition. Many other instances might be adduced, in which the names of substances have given false ideas of their nature and properties. Thus, white and green copperas contain no copper, but are formed, one with zinc, the other with iron.

Why is plumbago much used for making crucibles and portable furnaces? Because, like charcoal, it is indestructible by heat, unless with the presence of atmospheric air. It protects iron from rust, and is, on that account, rubbed on various ornamental cast iron work, such as the front of grates, &c.

Why do we sometimes see the street oil lamps, after a foggy night, burning to a late hour next morning? Because one effect of a fog is to diminish the combustion of oil in lamps and other lights; which shows that misty and damp air does not furnish oxygen so readily as that which is clear.

Why do smoked provisions keep better than those which are dried? Because of the impregnation of pyroligneous acid which the former receives from the smoke; turf smoke being generally employed, and turf, by distillation in close vessels, affording pyroligneous acid.

Why is baking the least advantageous of all modes of cooking? Because meat thus dressed loses about one-third of its weight, and the nourishing juices are then, in a great measure, dried up. Beef in boiling loses 26 lbs.; in roasting it loses nearly one-third.

Why is meat preserved by drying? Because all bodies, to ferment, must be more or less moist. Thus, a piece of meat, with all its natural juices, will soon putrify; whereas bodies completely dry can not be made to undergo any kind of fermentation.

June Hints—Hoeing, Weeds, &c.

No implement on the farm is in more demand than the hoe in the month of June. Get a good one and keep it smooth and bright. Let it be of the right weight, remembering that he "who makes with a common hoe two thousand strokes an hour, should not wield a needless ounce. If any part is heavier than necessary, even to the amount of half an ounce only, he must continually lift the half ounce, so that the whole strength thus spent would be equal, in a day, to twelve hundred and fifty pounds, which ought to be exerted in stirring the soil and destroying the weeds." It is important, also, to see that the hoe stands just right, neither out nor in too much, but in that position which will enable the person to stand in an easy attitude while using it. Hoeing is of the utmost importance in farm husbandry. It keeps the ground in fine tilth, which is its proper condition to receive light and heat, and the important atmospheric influences. Weeds are merely grasses out of place. They get a great many kicks, cuts and curses, from the indolent and thoughtless—but they are really "blessings in disguise." How many fields and gardens would feel the plow and hoe, if no weeds appeared? and would present a hard, impervious crust, resisting all efforts of the genial sun or cooling dews to enter and feed the starving roots. But the weeds spring up as faithful monitors to prompt us to duty! calling us from field to garden, as each demands attention. Look no longer, then, upon the weeds as pests and plagues, but by careful industry exclude them from the crops which you prefer to them.

The Blackberry.

In New England they are making a great account of this excellent fruit, and it bids fair to take a high rank among the smaller fruits. Hovey's Magazine, in treating of this subject says:—

"Since the introduction of the improved variety, about six or seven years ago—of which we have heretofore given several accounts, and whose cultivation has been so well detailed in our last volume, by Capt. Lovett, of Beverly, who has been one of the most successful growers of the fruit—it has been very generally disseminated; and, the past year, many remarkably fine specimens were exhibited before the Massachusetts Horticultural Society.

"The liberal premiums offered for this fruit, by the Society, have had the good effect of producing very general competition; and so superior have been some of the specimens—so much larger than when first exhibited, evidently showing what care and attention will do for this as well as other fruits—that the Society have deemed it advisable to offer a high prize for a seedling, with the hope of a still further improvement; for, although what few attempts have been made in this way have not been attended with a very favorable result, there is still good reason to believe that it will yield to the ameliorating influences of cultivation, as well as the strawberry, the gooseberry, or the raspberry."

So productive is this variety that, according to the authority we have quoted, a dozen plants when well established yield sufficient fruit for a family of the ordinary number. Some of the berries exhibited by Captain Lovett and others, were over an inch and a half long.

A Fast Man.—The Paducah Democrat thus details a few incidents in the life of a fast man of the present day and generation. Dr. Hayne, the notorious swindler and bigamist, ran off from New Orleans on the 19th of February last, arrived at Cincinnati on the 10th of March, married Mrs. Howe on the 18th, left her on the 19th, and after visiting St. Louis, Nashville, and other places, arrived at Paducah on the 3d of April, courted and engaged himself on the 4th and 5th, was married on the 11th, left her on the 14th, was arrested at Clarksville on the 15th, brought back on the 16th, was put on his trial on the 27th, found guilty on the 28th, sentenced on the 1st of May, started to the Penitentiary on the 2d, reached there on the 4th, and was put to spinning hemp on the 5th. Thus, in 25 days, he married two wives, traveled some 1,500 miles, told 4,000 lies, and in 20 days more was arrested, tried, convicted, and lodged in the State Prison.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

Church Bells.

Among the indispensables of a well-ordered community, must be reckoned the "church-going bell." Though not exactly a "means of grace," nor occupying quite so high a grade among the influences to which a people owes its moral life, it nevertheless serves so useful an office, and harmonizes so well with more important agencies, that a church can hardly be said to be a church, which does not add to its other attractions, the pleasant tones of the Sabbath morning bell. There is something better than the merely picturesque in those clear tones, sounding out, amidst the caroling of birds, and the silent hymn of nature, the voice of invitation to the house of God. They give a key-note to the praise which every right heart spontaneously utters, when recalling the associations of the day the Lord has made, and when anticipating the assemblage of God's people in the sanctuary—seeming joyfully to say, "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord." There is something so cheerful and inviting, and so finely in harmony with the sentiments and exercises of the Sabbath, that a congregation must be considered as wanting some of the accessories of public worship, whose ears are not regularly gladdened by its tones.

A recent inquiry from a country parish, respecting a bell, induces us to state, what we have long felt it our duty to state, that so far as our knowledge extends, we know of no bells so good, or sold so reasonably, as those manufactured by the sons of the celebrated Andrew Meneely, of West Troy, N. Y. Mr. Meneely possessed a remarkable inventive genius, and would have excelled in any branch of mechanical business. He had, in an eminent degree, that inquisitive mind, and that earnest enthusiasm of nature, which extorts the secret of success in everything it undertakes. Perpetually experimenting, he succeeded in securing such proportions of material, shape, and other qualities, as to give his bells a clearness, strength and agreeableness of tone, which certainly have never been surpassed in this country. The public have been finding out the merit of his work, too; for nearly ten thousand church-bells have been sent from the foundry since its origin, and we suppose the sales are now greater than ever before. Now, it is not every good founder that can make a good bell, any more than every good cabinet-maker can turn out a clear-toned and rich piano-forte; and from a long acquaintance, we are inclined to believe that what Erard and Chickering are in the business of piano-making, or what Straduarius was with the violin, Meneely was with the church-bell. So sweet, cordial, and inviting, as rung on a cheerful Sabbath morning, we wish every church in the land had one of them. We are confident that, in the pleasure and utility it would confer, and the pleasant associations it would gather around itself, it would more than pay the cost of its purchase.

Anne Boleyn.

Henry the Eighth was married to Anne Boleyn on the 25th of February, 1583, in a garret at the western end of the palace of Whitehall. She is described as a fair young creature, so exquisitely moulded in form and feature that she enslaved the eyes and understandings of all she encountered; and such is the interest with which her memory is still invested, that numbers daily visit her chamber at Hever Castle, near Edinbridge, in Kent, England, and eagerly listen to the romantic traditions which point out the hill where Henry used to sound his bugle, when he came to visit her, in their happy days of courtship, from his palace at Eltham; and the exact spot in the garden, where, at the turn of the walk, she suddenly came upon the king, who was so struck with her wondrous beauty, which confusion wrought by so unexpected a meeting greatly augmented, that from that moment he was inspired with the fatal passion which raised its unfortunate object to the throne, but to transfer her to the block. The axe with which the little neck of the cruelly sacrificed queen was severed, is still preserved in the Tower, and shares, with her grave in the chapel, the melancholy interest which for more than three hundred years has been associated with her name. It is said that during the night which followed the execution, her body was secretly removed from its grave before the altar in the Tower Chapel, and buried in the Chapel of Salle in Norfolk, where a black marble slab is shown as the covering of her remains.

French Improvements in Growing Wheat.

France occasionally furnishes us with some curious offshoots of her inventive genius. Amongst her recent schemes is one for "increasing the produce of autumn wheat," patented by Mr. D'Urcle, a farmer of Paris. The inventor grounds his discovery upon the fact—positively ascertained "by study and repeated experiments"—that autumn wheat is not an annual, but biennial, like the beet root and carrot class, and he therefore proceeds to develop the alledged biennial properties by a novel plan of planting and treatment, for the increase of the produce. The ground is to be well manured, either before winter or at the beginning of spring, to receive the seed between the 20th of April and 10th of May, this time being chosen to prevent the chance of blossoming during the year. But the time of sowing may be advanced from year to year; for, if it were not for the present degeneracy of the plant, it might occur now in March. Each grain is sown separately, allowing it a large area of ground if the soil is rich, but diminishing according to its sterility. It is deposited in rows in holes at regular distances, from 9½ to 23½ inches asunder, in each direction, the holes in one row are opposite the spaces in the next. Each hole is to contain 4 or 5 grains, 2½ inches asunder. When the plants have attained a height of four inches, all but the finest one in each group are pulled up, and this single one is then left for the harvest of the succeeding year. This curious process is stated to increase the produce very greatly.

Gough has returned to Canada, and is lecturing on Temperance. Hon. Malcolm Cameron, a member of the Provincial Cabinet, has publicly stated his intention to advocate on the floor of Parliament the adoption of the Maine Liquor Law.

Galls on Horses.

More than twenty years ago, when our large ferry-boats were propelled by horse-power, and the horses, by constant moving round in a circle, were exceedingly liable to be galled by the collar, I learned from the ferry-man the use of alum and whiskey. They bathed the neck and back, and wherever the harness rubbed, with whiskey, into which powdered alum had been put until no more could be dissolved. When the gall occurred, constant bathing would secure the continued use of the horse, and actually heal the wound while in service. I resorted to this remedy, carrying it with me when I journeyed, and have continued its use with undiminished approval, for more than twenty years. When a horse has been put out for the winter, and has not been used, his breast and back will be tender. A single hour's use of saddle or collar, in a hot day, will then scald the breast so as to produce serious injury. My uniform practice, therefore, has been, for a week before beginning to use the harness, to harden the breast and back by bathing them regularly two or three times a day. No injury has then resulted from the application of the collar. And when the bad gall has actually occurred, a frequent and persevering use of this remedy has secured the constant use of the animal, and healed the wound while in service.

Cork.

Many persons see corks used daily without knowing from whence come those useful materials. Corks are cut from large slabs of the cork tree, a species of oak, which grows wild in the southern countries in Europe. The tree is stripped of its bark at about sixteen years old; but before stripping it off, the tree is not cut down, as in the case of the oak. It is taken while the tree is growing, and the operation may be repeated every eight or nine years; the quality of the bark continuing each time to improve as the age of the tree increases. When the bark is taken off, it is singed in the flames of a strong fire, and after being soaked for a considerable time in water, it is placed under heavy weights, in order to render it straight. Its extreme lightness, the ease with which it can be compressed, and its elasticity, are properties so peculiar to this substance, that no efficient substitute for it has been discovered. The valuable properties of cork were known to the Greeks and Romans, who employed it for all the purpose for which it is used at present, with the exception of stopples. The ancients mostly used cement for stopping the mouths of bottles or vessels. The Egyptians are said to have made coffins of cork, which, being spread on the inside with resinous substance, preserved dead bodies from decay. In modern times cork was not generally used for stopples to bottles, till about the seventeenth century, cement being used until then for that purpose.

A New Way to Kill Whales.—The New Bedford Mercury gives an account of some interesting experiments performed in that city under the direction of Mr. Heineken, a merchant from Bremen, Germany, illustrating the effect of electricity in aiding the capture of whales. The electricity is conveyed to the body of the whale from an electro-galvanic battery contained in the boat, by means of a metallic wire attached to the harpoon, and so arranged as as re-conduct the electric current from the whale through the sea to the machine. The machine itself is simple and compact in construction, inclosed in a strong chest weighing about 350 pounds, and occuping a space in the boat of about three and a half feet in length, two feet in width, and the same in hight. It is capable of throwing into the body of the whale eight tremendous strokes of electricity in a second, or 480 in a minute, paralyzing in an instant the muscles of the whale, and depriving it of all power of motion, if not actually of life.

A New Idea in Agriculture.—The steward on board a United States steamer, in the Gulf, has produced several crops of excellent potatoes by the following mode of cultivation:—

"He procured a common 'crockery crate,' a bundle of straw, and a few eyes of the potato, and went to work farming it on board ship! The process for cultivating them is this: Fill your crate with alternate layers of straw and the eyes of the potato, commencing at the bottom with a layer of about six inches in depth of straw, and then a layer of the eyes—the eyes being placed about two inches apart over the surface of the straw—then another layer of straw on the top. Keep the straw always moist, and in about two months you will have about $14 worth of sound, good potatoes of the 'first water.'"

Business Courtesy.—Nothing more certainly marks the gentleman than the observance of a uniform courtesy and kindness in the buisness of life. Such a bearing toward all men should be cultivated till it grows to be a habit. Sure, kind words are as abundant, and cost no more than harsh ones. Many a man has robbed himself of success by an austere and haughty manner. Such an address chills those whom interest attracts, and impairs a confidence, that might become almost fond. There is nothing like a quiet, gentle, and polite manner in buisness. Petulence and passion grow worse by indulgence, and unfit their possessor for pleasant intercourse with his fellows. But every gentleman has a right to demand and receive courteous treatment at the hands of those with whom he may deal. He is worse than a boor who purposely and coolly refuses to extend it.

The End of a Romance.—A letter from Saut Ste. Marie, Michigan, to the Cleveland Plain Dealer, dated May 27, gives a narrative of an ill-assorted marriage: In 1839 and 1840, Catlin, the painter, exhibited a number of Indians in London, among whom was Cadotte, an interpreter. Sarah Haynes, then a beautiful English girl of sixteen, became enamored of Cadotte, and they were married. On reaching America, the romance of love was over; for two or three years they resided on the bank of the River St. Clair, on the little property the bride was possessed of; and since that at the Saut, where she taught French and music, to the time of her decease. She retained her beauty to the last, although exposed to many hardships by living in a birch-bark lodge with an Indian husband. She died in her 28th year, fortunately leaving no children to mourn the sad effects of an infatuated matrimonial match.

Cure for Melon Bugs.—Dr. Hull, of Newburgh, raised a large crop of melons, by a process thus stated in the Horticulturist:—

"Bugs were completely expelled by watering the plants daily with a strong decoction of quassia, made by pouring four gallons of boiling water on four pounds of quassia in a barrel, and after twelve hours filling the barrel with water. The intolerable squash or pumpkin bug was thoroughly driven off by a decoction of double strength, containing a pound of glue to ten gallons, to make it adhere. The result was, a product of 'sixteen hundred superb melons' on less than one-sixth of an acre of ground."

Life and Death in London.—Few know that in every seven minutes of the day a child is born in London, and that in every nine minutes one of its inhabitants dies! The population of London is roundly 2,362,000. If the averages of the last fifty years continue, in thirty-one years from this time as many persons as now compose its population will have died in it, and yet, in about thirty-nine years from this time, if the present rate of progress continue, the metropolis will contain twice as many persons as it does now. The whole population of Liverpool, in 1851, numbered 255,000; while the increase of inhabitants in the metropolis, 1841 and 1851, was 413,000. It is truly marvelous! Where it will stop, and how food and shelter are provided for these masses, are subjects for speculation. [Builder.

A Case of Hydrophobia Cured.—The son of a Mr. Waite, of Cincinnati, was recently seized with hydrophobia. We learn by the Cincinnati Gazette that since then, by judicious treatment, he has entirely recovered, though a running wound is intended to be kept up where the lad was bitten, in order to prevent the possibility of a return of the symptoms. The vesicles which formed under the tongue rapidly disappeared under the administration of Lachesis, a medicine prepared from the virus of the lance-headed adder, which was given as an antidote to the poison, and the spasms were prevented by the use of Belladonna and other remedies.

VARIETY.

The Louisville Journal says a Mr. Boone, now living, who is a nephew of Daniel Boone, and who was born at Boonsboro,' was the first male child born in Kentucky. An anecdote told by a Mr. Kimbley, would seem to corroborate strongly the justice of his own claim to the honor. He says that he remembers very vividly, that, when he was a small child, Daniel Boone came to his father's hut and nearly frightened him to death by seizing him in his arms and striding toward the door as if to make off with him, exclaiming at the same time to the old gentleman—"Come and take my two girls, if you want them, but I must have the first boy born in Kentucky."

Several very rare animals, serpents, &c., have just made their debut at Barnum's Museum. In 1851, Mr. B. sent a vessel and men to Africa to capture monsters and varieties, and these are a portion of the cargo. An immense Ostrich, the largest ever seen in America; two Boa Constrictors, and two Anacondas, of fearful proportions, measuring in all a hundred feet in length; an Orang Outang, of remarkable resemblance to humanity, and a whole troop of lesser animals, are domesticated in their new home—not exactly a happy, but certainly a very curious family.

We see it stated in our Western exchanges that a gentleman near Louisville, Ky., has applied the telegraph to an entirely novel and unique use. He has nearly completed an invention for writing music as it is played from the piano-forte, the notes upon the sheets being produced a fast, and to the exact time, as the keys are touched by the performer. Strakosh has offered him $10,000 for the patent right when the model is finished. Rather doubtful.

The Rochester American says: Mr. Catlin, the celebrated collector of Indian relics, whose museum has long been one of the attractions of London, is now in prison for debt. It appears that Mr. Catlin, in his zeal to enhance the value of his collection, has involved himself in pecuniary difficulties to such an extent, that unless Congress speedily interferes, all his paintings and curiosities must be sold at auction, and irreclaimably scattered.

The Cincinnati Association of Systematic Botanists, having for its object the study and advancement of Systematic and Scientific Botany, has been recently organized. The objects of the Society are eminently practical, embracing the classification, nomenclature and normal habits of plants and the definition of their general characters, together with the history and description of the insects that feed on and destroy them.

The Chelsea Telegraph, under the happy head of "a chained earthquake," states that there are on the grounds of the Naval Hospital at Chelsea over twenty-five thousand kegs of gunpower! If this ticklish substance should become ignited, the explosion would probably throw every house in Chelsea from its foundation, and create a crook or two in the spire of the Bunker Hills Monument.

It is folly for an eminent man to think of escaping censure, and a weakness to be affected with it. All the illustrious persons of antiquity, and indeed of every age in the world, have passed through this firey persecution. There is no defense against reproach but obscurity; it is a kind of concomitant to greatness, as satires and invectives were an essential part of a Roman triumph.

The Boston To-Day, edited by Charles Hale, says that Boston acquired its name as follows: St. Botolph's day is the 17th of June, St. Botolph's town, in the long run, got the name of Bo'stown, or Boston. And St. Botolph's successor, Rev. Mr. Cotton, being first minister of Shawmut or Tri-mountain, this place took the name of Boston.

Dr. Casper, of Berlin, has calculated that the mortality among bachelors, from the age of thirty to forty-five years, is twenty-seven per cent.; while among married men of the same age, it is only eighteen per cent. Out of a given number, forty-one bachelors only reach the age of forty years; seventy-eight married men reach that age.

CONTINUING OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

Outpouring of the Spirit on the Day of Pentecost.

(Concluded.)

The great and glorious effusion of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost was not the only one enjoyed by the Apostolic church. It was soon followed by another, probably not of less magnitude as respects the number of those by whom the gift was enjoyed. When, after Peter and John were released from the hands of the chief priests and elders, they returned to the company of the faithful, and reported all that had been done and said unto them, prayer was made to God. "And when they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together, and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they spake the word of God with boldness. And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul." Acts iv. 31.

It is not recorded on which day of the week, nor yet on which day of the month, this outpouring of the Spirit took place. If, however, the design of the gracious effusion on Pentecost was to mark the first day of the week as the Sabbath, might it not have been expected, that the same day would again be chosen—and that the mention of the particular day would not have been omitted? But we have no more reason, from the narrative, to believe that this took place on the first day, than we have to believe it was on any other day. We are thus, therefore, confirmed in the conclusion, that the inference drawn by those whose practice it is sought so to sustain, is wholly unwarranted.

As I am persuaded that too little attention has been given to the relation which subsisted between the time of eating the Passover Lamb and that for the offering of First Fruits, in their typical bearing on the time of our Lord's death and resurrection and following Pentecost, I was pleased to observe, in the Sabbath Recorder for March 25th last, a correspondent inviting to farther consideration of it; and in the P. S. to my last portion on this subject, I expressed a desire that brother J. C. would state fully his reasons for rejecting the view I have advanced. That view, and the grounds for it, I would briefly state. In endeavoring to ascertain the import of the various intimations of the several Evangelists relative to the time and circumstances of the death and resurrection of the Saviour, I presented the apostolic authority for considering both as the fulfillment of types instituted in the Passover and the Feast of First Fruits. Referring to the original appointment of these types, I sought to show that both were regulated, not by the days of the week, but by the days of the month Nisan in which they occurred; and that, according to that appointment, the eating of the Passover lamb was on the 14th day of that month, while the day following, namely, "the fifteenth day, was necessarily a Sabbath."

In reference to the period of Christ's resurrection, J. C. says, "I admit that 'this fifteenth day' was a Sabbath, but I question whether it was such independent of the weekly Sabbath. The fifteenth day of the first month will occasionally fall on the weekly Sabbath." That, therefore, which I understand to be determined by the law of the Passover, J. C. regards as without such authority; and that which I believe to have taken place of necessity every year, he views as only an occasional occurrence—which, however, he supposes to have happened the year of the Saviour's death.

He seems to have been led to his present opinion by the friend to whom he refers as having called his attention to Lev. xxiii. 15, 16, in proof "that the Jews changed the Sabbath every year." This friend's argument was, that "the fifteenth day of the month (Nisan) was a Sabbath, and from it seven Sabbaths were numbered; and that, as this fifteenth day of the month Nisan would from year to year occur on different days of the week, so the day of the Sabbath was changed from year to year."

But as the whole appointment in reference to the fifteenth day of the month Nisan was divine, if this friend's inference and argument were correct, it would imply, not that the Jews of their own accord changed the day of the Sabbath, but that the Jews, by command of the God of creation, the Author of the Fourth Commandment, were enjoined so to act as that the weekly Sabbath must, from year to year, be changed to different days! This, surely, is not to be believed or supposed without distinct proof. The mistake arises from not distinguishing between the weekly and the festival Sabbaths; the inference drawn is in consequence wholly unwarranted. That such a distinction exists is a plain and indisputable fact; and that the festival Sabbaths, being regulated by the day of the month, rather than by the day of the week, it is equally certain that they might fall, in successive years, on different days of the week, while the weekly Sabbath was always restricted to the seventh day of the week.

"In the seventh month, on the first day of the month, shall ye have a Sabbath," is an injunction given to Israel by the same authority, and in the same chapter, as "Six days shall work be done; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of rest." Lev. xxiii. 24, 3. Now, I would ask, Does either J. C. or his friend suppose that the first-quoted of these Sabbaths also (being another of the festival Sabbaths) would have such an influence upon the next-quoted (the weekly Sabbath) as to occasion its being changed from year to year? Being appointed, as it was, to be observed on "the first day of the month," there can be no doubt that it, as well as the first and seventh days of the Passover Feast, would from year to year occur on different days of the week? The 10th day, and the 15th day, and the 22d day of this seventh month were also Sabbaths, on whatever day of the week they fell. (Lev. xxiii. 27, 39, 40.) But surely, if the friend to whom J. C. refers had observed that all these were appointed Sabbaths, and that with his view they must have exercised a very singular influence upon the weekly Sabbath, he would hardly have supposed that the one appointment was designed to have such an effect upon the other as to cause it to be altered backward and forward every year, and that, too, several times a year, which his principle of exposition would thus require.

But while, in the above cases, the festival Sabbaths are too expressly named such to admit of any question as to them, (and the argument used, therefore, necessarily extends to them also,) concerning the corresponding appointments of the Passover festival, my objecting friend says, "God did not say to Moses, Tell the children of Israel that these 'convocation days' are 'Sabbaths.'" To this I reply, He describes them as Sabbaths, even when, in the first instance, He does not expressly name them so. Be it observed, that both the weekly Sabbaths and festival Sabbaths are first characterized by the same terms. They are both called "Feasts of the Lord," and "Holy Convocations." (Lev. xxiii. 2.) And while the weekly Sabbath is called "the Sabbath of rest, an Holy Convocation," in which no work is to be done, (ver. 3,) the 15th and 22d days of Nisan are also termed "Holy Convocations," in which "no servile work" was to be done, (ver. 4—9.) The Pentecost, also, was "a Holy Convocation," in which "no servile work" was to be done. (Ver. 21.)

By description, therefore, these festival days were all of sabbatic character. But, it is farther to be observed, as confirmatory of the view I have taken concerning the 15th and 22d days of the first month, Nisan, being Passover Sabbaths, that the precise form of their appointment is similar to that of the Sabbaths of the Feast of Tabernacles. These last were fixed to be observed on the 15th and 22d of the seventh month. In the first statement of their appointment they also are spoken of as "Holy Convocations," in which "no servile work" was to be done. Lev. xxiii. 33—36. But when, as in regard to the first of the Passover Holy Convocations, the days of First-Fruits and Pentecost are to be counted from it, it is briefly called "the Sabbath," so also in regard to the Feast of Tabernacles, when, farther on in the chapter, returning to give directions as to the erecting and dwelling in booths, re-stating the 15th day of the seventh month as the time of commencing the Feast, it is expressly enjoined, "On the first day shall be a Sabbath, and on the eighth day shall be a Sabbath." (ver. 39.) Their appointment as Sabbaths had therefore been previously enjoined, when they were only characterized as days of "Holy Convocation," in which "no servile work" was to be done. The terms of the institution of the Feast of Tabernacles thus help us to a more certain appreciation of those relating to the Passover Feast—and both serve to aid our perception of the import of some of the statements of the Evangelists, when relating the events connected with the death and resurrection of the Saviour.

I will not repeat here the numerous instances in which the language of these Evangelists seems to me in harmony with the view thus given of the nature of these "Holy Convocation" days. But as I conceive that, as pointed to in my pamphlet, they are inconsistent with the view which J. C. has adopted concerning those of the Passover Feast, I would request his farther examination of the point.

"ASSOCIATIONAL POWER."

The General Association of Connecticut held a session at Danbury week before last, when a great part of the time was occupied in discussing what we should call a question of "associational power." It seems that one of the most distinguished members of the Association, Rev. Dr. Bushnell of Hartford, is the author of a work, which many consider heretical, entitled "God in Christ," and of a later work, entitled "Christ in Theology," which farther advocates the views set forth in the first. The Fairfield Association reviewed the latter work, and a Memorial from that Association was read, which presented a series of questions, to which the answer of the General Association was desired. These questions are, whether the Hartford Association, (to which Dr. B. belongs,) in their decision respecting Dr. Bushnell's first book, "God in Christ," have not publicly given their shield and countenance to doctrines which deny the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion?—has not Dr. Bushnell's second book furnished new evidence that he persists in holding the chief heresies of the first?—and whether the Hartford body, in refusing to bring him to trial, after such proofs of heresy as the review of the Fairfield Association afforded, have not violated the fundamental principles of fellowship on which the Association is based? &c.

A remonstrance from Dr. Bushnell was then read, which professed to be self-moved, and protested in his own name against the action required by the Fairfield memorial. The remonstance turns upon the personal rights he has, to be regarded as orthodox and in good fellowship until proved otherwise by the ecclesiastical body to which he is amenable, and the impossibility of any action of the General Association which will not affect him personally.

It was proposed to refer this document to a Special Committee of one from each District Association; but Dr. Porter, of Farmington, affirmed that the Association had nothing to do with the subject, except to receive and record or reject the protest. The remarks of the venerable speaker excited a strong sensation, and he was called to order by the Moderator. An appeal from the Moderator's decision restored Dr. Porter to the floor, and he went into an argument on the subject of discipline, contending that neither the General Association, nor the District Associations, have any judicial power over Pastors of the Consociated Churches.

Rev. Theophilus Smith, on the contrary, maintained that both usage and the organic principle of the General Association authorized such action as the Fairfield memorial calls for. He went into a minute history of the Association, and dwelt upon the law of association and fellowship which formed it.

The debate on the question referring the Appeal and the Remonstrance, occupied most of the day Wednesday, and of Thursday till the adjournment, and was very spirited. The speech of Dr. Porter against the reference, and of Mr. Smith in favor of it, were followed by several others, waxing warmer and warmer, till nearly all the members delivered their opinions.

The venerable president Day took strong ground in favor of the power of the Association to entertain the appeal, and to act upon it as they saw fit. Every body must have the means of self-preservation; it is involved in the very idea of being. To deny the Association the power of correcting evils which may be fatal to its integrity as a religious body, would be to destroy it. Whether specifically granted in the Saybrook Platform or not, this right of reviewing and of expressing an opinion upon the doctrinal character or ecclesiastical proceedings of any of the District Associations, must belong to the General Association. The very idea of Christian fellowship involves the right.

The speech was clear and impressive, and coming from a man of President Day's candid and revered character, carried all before it; the reference was carried by a strong vote, and a committee of one from each Association was chosen by ballot.

The Committee on the case finally reported, recommending the Hartford Central Association, waiving all technical objections, to present Dr. Bushnell for trial, to his consociation, on the charge of heresy, as taught in his book. It was adopted by a large vote, and regarded by the Fairfield men as about what they asked for.

THE RETURNS OF PRAYER.

In one of the rural districts of Wales, in a little white cottage, with a green mountain behind, and a bushy lane in front, there lived a respectable farm-laborer and his wife. They were not without some respect for religion, but they were strangers to the peace and joy of believing. Of eternity they seldom thought; and when some solemn providence forced it upon their consideration, they comforted themselves with the belief, that inasmuch as they went to church every Sabbath, and lived soberly and morally, they had nothing to fear from a God of love and mercy. But one day, as they sat together under the faithful preaching of the gospel, the wife was awakened to a sense of her awful wickedness before a holy God. It seemed to her as though the minister saw into her very heart, and brought all her sins to light. She trembled and wept bitterly; she cried unto God, and he heard her. Through the great atonement, she at length found the peace of God which passeth all understanding.

The husband did not oppose the religion of his wife. He quietly accompanied her to the chapel where she had received her first religious impressions. He offered no objections when she publicly united with the dissenters. But he still continued a stranger to true godliness. The pious wife watched, and wept, and prayed over him. One new year's day she went into her closet, and there resolved that she would devote a portion of every day of that year to special prayer for her husband's conversion. With vehement solicitude she besought the Lord. But months passed away, and still the man's heart was not softened; he was still the same kind and sober, but prayerless and godless man that he had ever been. The last day of the year closed over them, and the wife's prayers were unanswered.

On the morning of the new year's day, the wife again resolved to set apart a portion of each day for special prayer for her husband, during the next six months. And daily her fervent prayers were offered, that the grace of God might melt that heart of adamant. The morning of the last day of that half year dawned upon them, and the husband went out to his daily toil still Christless, still unawakened. Had her supplications never reached the mercy-seat; had the great High Priest failed to present them; or did the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ refuse to hear her cry? O awful thought, must her husband perish? Such were the thoughts which agitated her mind. She was in an agony; but her surest and only unfailing resource was prayer, and casting aside her unbelieving doubts, she wrestled with God during the greater part of that forenoon.

At noon her husband returned home, and, without noticing his wife or children, passed into a back chamber. When called to dinner he made no reply. His wife then went into the chamber, and found him seated with his face covered by his hands. To her inquiries he still kept silence. At last, weeping, she said to him, "Husband, what is the matter, what have I done, that you will neither speak nor look your own wife in the face?" "Woman," he replied, while the tears gushed through his clenched fingers—"Woman, the hand of God is upon me. God has this day brought all my sins to my remembrance, and I am overwhelmed." It was now the wife's privilege to point her husband to the Lamb of God, and by the grace of God, he too became a trophy of redeeming power.

But they had unconverted neighbors, and encouraged by the gracious answer vouchsafed to the wife's prayers, they besought the Lord for the conversion of others. A weekly prayer-meeting was established, God poured out his Spirit. The house was too small for the number who attended. It was enlarged; but the company of belivers still increaseing a house of worship was built, and a church organized. It exists to this day, and many are still being added to the number of believers, in that Welsh hamlet. Such were some of the returns of the prayers of that pious woman.

THE LAKE SIDE.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

The shadows round the inland sea
Are deep'ning into night,
Slow up the sloops of Ossippe
They chase the lessening light,
Tired of the long day's binding heat,
I rest my languid eye,
Lake of the Hills, where cool and sweet
The sunset waters lie.

Along the sky, in wavy lines,
O'er isle, and beach, and bay,
Green belted with eternal pines,
The mountains stretch away;
Below, the maple masses sleep
Where shore with water blends,
While midway on the tranquil deep
The evening light descends.

So seemed it when yon hill's red crown,
Of old, the Indian trod,
And through the sunset air looked down
Upon the smile of God.
To him of lights and shades the laws
No forest skeptic taught,
Their living and eternal cause
His truer instinct sought.

He saw these mountains in the light
Which now across them shines;
This lake, in summer sunset bright,
Walled round with sombering pines.
God near him seemed: from earth and skies
His loving voice he heard,
As, face to face in Paradise,
Man stood before the Lord.

JOHN RANDOLPH OF ROANOKE.

My object in this article is chiefly to give an account of a visit paid to Mr. Randolph, by a friend of mine, Col Woods, of Albemarle Co., Va. Col. Woods was an elder in the Presbyterian church, and had written to Mr. Randolph, intimating a wish to purchase one of his fine blooded stallions.

Mr. Randolph invited the Colonel to pay him a visit at his seat on the Roanoke. Colonel Woods accepted it. When he arrived at Mr. R.'s gate, he was obliged to wait till his name could be sent in by a servant, before he could obtain admittance within the enclosure around his house. As soon as Mr. R. knew of his arrival, although there was an inch or so of snow on the ground, he ran out into the yard to receive him without his hat. An ambassador from one of the crowned heads of Europe, could not have been received with more ceremonious politeness. He was all affability and kindness to the Colonel. He ordered his horse, and immediately rode with him over a part of his plantation, to show him some of his horses. When they returned they sat down to dinner, and the servent started to hand round the bread from a side-table—the universal custom in Virginia. But Mr. Randolph motioned him back, and lifting up his hands implored the Divine blessing, in a most solemn and impressive manner. In a moment afterwards, conversing with his guest, he swore an oath.

From the conduct of the servant in starting so promptly with the bread, as soon as Mr. R. and Col. Woods had taken their seats at the table, we may infer, that the practice of asking a blessing over his food, was not common with Mr. Randolph. But a pious man was at his table, and he wished to gain his visitor's good will, and consequently resumed a practice which had been long laid aside. Some years before that, he had professed to be very religious. He had even read the Bible, and preached on the Sabbath to his slaves; but his zeal on the subject of religion had evaporated, and no one ever heard of it after his duel with Henry Clay, of Ky. Mr. R. showed Col. Woods the chronometers that he had brought with him from London; and when he went with him up stairs to his bedroom, he turned down the sheets, and said, in a triumphant tone, "There, sir, is a pair of sheets that have not been slept in since they were washed in Russia"—a piece of information which gave the Col. no pleasure, as the cholera was at the time prevailing in Russia, and was believed in this country to be very contagious. The next day, as Mr. R. and his guest were riding over his estate, he was taken with one of his fainting fits. Col. Woods and Mr. R.'s servant John, or Juba, (I forget which it was) had to assist him from his horse. They made a seat for him in the corner of a fence, along which they had been riding; and as soon as Mr. R. began to recover his strength, he made a motion to Col. Woods to take a seat by his side, and immediately began to speak. "You have heard, sir," said he, "of atheists. There are no such persons in the world. I had a pious mother, sir, and she taught me, God bless her, to pray; but in the family of my father-in-law, Judge Tucker, I imbibed infidel sentiments at a very early age. Before I was twenty years of age, I had read every infidel book in the English and French languages. The results was that I became a confirmed infidel. I even attempted to make myself an atheist, but could not succeed in the effort. The marks of the Divine wisdom and the Divine goodness, were too deeply and too manifestly impressed on the works of creation around me, to admit of my indulging, put for a single moment, in the supposition that there was no God. It is impossible, sir, for any man to be an atheist. I was, however, sir, a confirmed infidel, and continued to be so until I heard Dr. Hoge, on a certain occasion, preach a sermon on the evidences of the Christian Religion. His cogent reasoning put to flight all my unbelieving doubts; and since that time, I have been fully convinced of the truth of the Bible." Col. Woods was sorry that he did not bring down his religious history to a later period; but did not like to take upon himself to inquire, what influence Christianity had exerted upon his subsequent life.

It is well known, however, that for a time he was very devout. He wrote many letters to Dr. Hoge and Bishop Meade on the subject of religion. Dr. Hoge believed him to be sincerely pious, but I am told that he was never entirely satisfied himself that he had ever experienced a change of heart. He said that he could not believe himself to be religious, because he could never forgive his enemies. We know, too, that for many years before his death he made no pretensions whatever to piety. Every body has heard what he said on his dying bed about remorse. "The living," said he to his physician, "know not the meaning of that word." His death scene was an impressive one; but it was probable that he was so much under the influence of opium, as hardly to know what he was saying.

I remember an anecdote with reference to his keeping up family worship in his house, which is rather of the ludicrous order; but still, I cannot forbear telling it in the present connection. Dr. Dudley, who was long regarded as a protege of Mr. R.'s was at his house at the time, and some other young man. They were sent for in the morning to come down to family worship, but did not make their appearance, until Mr. Randolph had knelt down, and was engaged in reading the morning prayer out of the Episcopal prayer book. They opened the door, and came down stairs very softly. "Go back, young gentlemen," said Mr. R., motioning them back with his hand, "go back, young gentlemen, you were not here at the beginning, and you shall not be here at the close. Go back." So the young gentlemen were obliged to retreat out of the room, and Mr. R. went on with his prayer. [Pres. Herald.

THE GOSPEL IN FRANCE.

A recent number of the Baptist Missionary Magazine, has an interesting letter from northern France, addressed by a native helper to Mr. Willard, and by him forwarded for publication. From the following, it appears that "the gospel is the power of God unto salvation," even in France:—

Do you remember, dear brother, that I related to you at the time, how, on occasion of the interment of one of our sisters at B——, ——, the cure of that village, made his appearance with his clergy and utensils, and sung Te Deum "by way of thanksgiving," he said, because Protestantism was dead in that commune. Well, his God has used him as Baal did his prophets. Not only have we a faithful sister in the village, but there are three other persons well disposed. The following is what Mr. D. related to me of the means which God employed to bring him to a knowledge of his word.

"Nearly fifteen years ago, journeying upon business, I met a man who accosted me with civility, and we went on together for several hours. He talked to me of God, of my soul, of eternal suffering which I deserved, of Jesus Christ who died to redeem me if I would believe in his sacrifice; but alas! I understood at that time little of all he told me. When we separated he gave me a little tract, in which I saw that the Catholic religion was only a traffic; and from that time I paid no attention to religious things until I was at the funeral which you attended at B., nearly three years ago. What the traveler told me, was called up again by hearing what you said, of the necessity of conversion and of faith in Jesus in order to meet death without trembling. But those impressions did not yet bring my heart to a decision. They were soon effaced, and my religious indifference, disturbed for a moment, soon resumed its wonted dominion. I was in this condition when the census was taken. The mayor, after having inscribed my name, age, and profession, says,

'You are a Catholic?'

'No,' I replied, 'for I do not believe in the religion of the Roman church.'

'You are not a Protestant?"

'No.'

'You are then without religion?'

'That's true!'

'The mayor told his scribe to write 'D., without religion.' That was a thunderbolt for me. For several nights I was unable to sleep. Those words haunted me like phantoms; 'D——, without religion!' It was impossible to return to the Roman church, and feeling the necessity of having religion, I came to see you, sir, that you might have the goodness to teach me yours, in order that if it satisfied the need which I felt of being reconciled to God, I might make it mine.'

For several months that man not only walks well, but he has already done good to two other persons of the village.

HONESTY REWARDED.

The following anecdote of the late King of England, is said to be from an authentic source:—

A few years ago, when George IV. visited Ireland, he remained some time in Dublin, its capital. As it was expected he would attend Divine service, an eminent clergyman was appointed to preach before him. When the time approached, the clergyman fell sick, and it became necessary to appoint another to perform that duty. Dr. Magee, author of a work on the atonement, being in Dublin, was solicited to preach before his Majesty. He accepted the invitation. The doctor was a warm, zealous Churchman, of enlightened views, and liberal evangelical sentiments. When the Sabbath came, he read the prayers, ascended the pulpit, and gave out the following text, Acts 21:31—"Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." In this discourse he expatiated on the necessity of repentance, faith, and holiness. The command to believe—the object of faith, (the Lord Jesus Christ)—character of Him on whom we are called to believe—the importance of doing so for our own safety, and as an example to others, but particularly our own houses; with the individual, local, and national advantages of religion, were eloquently and honestly presented to his Majesty, and his court, present on the occasion. After he had held forth the doctrine of justification by faith, he powerfully insisted on a change of heart, without which it was impossible for any individual to arrive at heaven. His boldness and earnestness surprised and alarmed the courtiers of his Majesty, who had not been accustomed to such plain dealing. All were looking for a reproof from the sovereign for the boldness of the preacher; but though his sermon was a subject of general conversation, his Majesty alone retained a total silence respecting it, never alluding to the circumstance for several months.

During this time, the Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of Ireland, died, and the Right Rev. Lord John Beresford, Archbishop of Dublin, was appointed to succeed him. The see of Dublin being in the gift of the crown, a list of candidates were nominated to his Majesty, for each of whom powerful interest was made. Dr. Magee not being a favorite on account of his evangelical sentiments, was neglected. When his Majesty proceeded to make the appointment, he inquired the name of the faithful, able and eloquent preacher who had delivered a discourse before him in Dublin. He was told it was Dr. Magee. "Then," said he, "the man that fears not to preach the whole truth before his king, shall be honored, and Dr. Magee shall be Archbishop of Dublin." After saying this, he took his pen, and filled the blank in the deed of gift with Dr. Magee.

MARY MOONE, THE SLAVE MOTHER.

The following interesting narrative, which we copy from the Covenanter, was written by a gentleman who is engaged in teaching a school for colored children at Cincinnati, O. He became acquainted with the facts in carrying out a plan to visit the parents of all of his scholars.

I called the other evening on a rather elderly woman, who told me the story of her life. There was nothing strange about it, yet it was so simple and touching, that I thought you would be pleased with a sketch of it. She told me of her troubles; among the rest, this especially, that her husband is in slavery. I asked her if she always prayed for him. "I try to do so," she replied. "How long is it, madam, since you learned to carry your trouble to the Hearer of prayer?" "About eleven years," she answered, "when I was so shut up that there seemed no other way of escape. I went to God and he delivered me. Since that I have always tried to live a praying life. I was raised a slave in Kentucky, and was reasonably well used till the death of my old master and mistress. My young master was addicted to gambling and drinking, and soon involved himself in pecuniary difficulties. I was mortgaged for his debt. Though a dissipated character, he was both kind and considerate when sober, and he used his utmost endeavors to get some respectable planter in the neighborhood to purchase me, that I might not be sold to a trader and driven South. On the morning of the sale he said to me—'Mary, I have done all I could for you, but none of our neighbors have money on hand at present, and I see no other way of it than for you to go to the court-house and be sold.' 'Had you told me sooner,' said I, 'I might have done better myself.' 'What would you have done?' said he. 'Run off,' I answered; (it being for debt I was to be sold, it was little matter to him,) 'O, better not,' said he. So I took my two children by my side, and my infant on my arm. Henry, who goes to school to you was my baby then; and though he is a stout, hearty boy now, he was a poor sickly creature then, his bones almost cutting the skin. He was two years old, yet I carried him on one arm on a pillow. When I took him along, people asked me why I took that skeleton to the court-house. 'Oh dear,' I replied, 'I hope whoever buys me, will buy my child too.'

With a bitter heart I went to the place of sale. My husband, who belonged to a neighboring farmer, came to bid me farewell; for those who are sold to traders have no time, after the sale, to take leave of their friends, but are hurried off at once. For twelve years we had lived together, and now it was hard to part, perhaps for ever. In the bitterness of my soul I thought of what I had heard some good people saying of the efficacy of prayer, and I tried to lift my soul to God. I went to the court-house. There were many people there, and several slaves to be sold. A Southern trader looked at me, and said he would buy 'that girl.' Some white folks that knew me asked him if he would sell me on the sugar plantations. The haughty Southerner was offended that any one should ask him what he would do with his own property, and answered roughly, that he attended to his own business himself. He was answered that if he would buy her he would have to pay for her. One word brought on another, and a violent altercation ensued. At length a man stepped forward, and did for contention what he had declined to do for benevolence. He paid down three hundred dollars—the amount of the mortgage—and said to me, 'Mary, take your children and go to my house; I will pay for you and your children both, as soon as I can raise the money.' My heart leaped for joy; I knew his family well. My children were yet my own; my husband was still in reach; I would not be driven to the far South, where they kill the slaves on the sugar plantations."

"But how did you obtain your freedom?" asked I.

"I lived with them," said she, "eight or nine years, and then they moved here to Cincinnati, and brought us along with them, and set us free. It is with them that Henry lives now."

"Do you hear from your husband?" I inquired.

"Not of late," she replied; "I used to receive letters from him, but of late he has fallen into the hands of such hard masters that I suppose they will not take the trouble to write. I believe he is in the State of Missouri."

Two things struck me very forcibly in this tale of Mary Moone. First—She prayed when every other resource failed. How often are we like poor Mary: we make that the last resort which ought to be the first. Second—How remarkably, in this instance, did God make "the wrath of man to praise him!" This man, who would not purchase Mary because it did not suit his pecuniary circumstances, found means to do it when his temper was aroused. This was of God, who rules the raging of the sea and the tumults of the people.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, July 8, 1852.

ASSOCIATIONAL POWER.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I do not intend to prolong this discussion to any great length; and if you had not imputed to me what you had no good reason to, in one important respect, I would have dropped the subject where my last article left it. As it is, I will touch on a few points in your "Remarks," in connection with the false imputation I allude to.

And first, your idea of the "right of the church to be exempt from any and every sort of interference with its discipline by Association," &c., or, as you explain it, "that kind of interference which assumes to lay the church under obligation to obey;" I say, this idea appears not to have its outlines distinct enough, so that one can tell just what it amounts to. I suppose that a church may lose its membership in the body as well for corruption in discipline as any other fault. And whether the church's dismembership is the result of "that kind of interference which assumes to lay the church under obligation to obey," or of "advice," which assumes nothing in the shape of laying it under obligation, all that I contend for is admitted; which is, that the body is to be the judge of membership, and the terms of membership in the body.

You lay great stress on the Constitution, as though it were an impregnable fort, a munition of rocks, to protect you from all attacks. But it may be prudent to examine and see whether there may not be some vulnerable points or weak places in your stronghold. The thirteenth article of the Constitution of this Association, which you quote to prove that churches are not to be interfered with, in your sense of the word, contains in itself a limitation to the very independence it secures to the churches, in the word "gospel" there used to qualify the right allowed them; thus, "but shall recognize each one [church] as having a gospel right to manage its own concerns," &c. This must mean that the church shall be allowed to manage its own concerns, according to some rule understood to be contained in the gospel, or in conformity to gospel principles in general, as affording a guide which it is the duty of the church to follow, and outside of which, or beyond which, it has no rights or liberty to go; but if it should, it could not, in that case claim any standing or privileges in the body. This interpretation is unavoidable, if this article and the first and second articles of the Constitution are made to harmonize. The first article says, that the Association "shall be composed of churches, which, in faith and practice, harmonize with its object." The second article reads, "The object of this Association shall be to promote the piety, order, and increase of the churches belonging to it, and the cause of our Lord Jesus Christ generally in the world." Thus it will be seen, if the thirteenth article be interpreted so that its parts shall have a proportionable and consistent import, and which shall make that article harmonize also with the first and second, fairly construed, there can be no such exemption "from any and every sort of interference," claimed by the churches, as you contend for.

In respect to the principle on which churches are associated in one communion by a common faith and practice, I regard it to be purely religious, as opposed to mere expediency, and that it is as clearly, according to the Scriptures, the duty of churches to co-operate on that principle for the promotion of the cause of God, as it is for the individual Christian to join the church for that purpose.

Now to the false imputation above mentioned. You write as if, according to my theory, ministers are ex-officio members of the Association or Conference, in the sense of being thereby authorized to vote. I do not hold that doctrine, but directly the opposite, namely, that they have no right to vote, unless they are sent as representatives by the churches composing the body; nor have I said any thing that could justify you in presenting the sentiment in question as a part of my system. The wording of the late proposed amendment to the constitution, (which I admit to be capable of great improvement,) or some other cause, may have misled you as to what was intended in making ministers component parts of the Association. But the circumstances under which the amendment was proposed, and the amendment itself, taught me that the design of it was to make the ministers amenable or accountable to the body throughout which their right to officiate as ministers was acknowledged, without giving them any power to control that body, other than the degree or influence they should secure to themselves by a faithful discharge of the duties of their station.

Lucius Crandall.

Remarks.

A word in regard to the "false imputation," in which we are alledged to have charged upon our correspondent "what we had no good reason to, in one important respect," seems called for by his communication. We have carefully re-perused what we wrote, and we find nothing upon which such a complaint can justly be grounded, except the following paragraph:—

"We have never conceived of the Association as composed of two sets of members; one of ministers, holding their connection with it permanently, and ex officio; the other of delegates, appointed from year to year by the churches."

Setting aside this single sentence, we see nothing else to which his reply is at all pertinent. And we beg leave to say, that to our correspondent personally we do not impute the sentiment which, in the present instance, he so readily disavows. Nor did we intend to do so, when we penned our remarks. But as the subject under discussion embraced the constitutional powers of the Association, it was very natural to throw in a passing remark upon what had been proposed as an amendment, the working of which seemed to have a slight squint towards episcopacy.

After all, there is something in our correspondent's theory that we do not understand. In disclaiming the doctrine that ministers are, ex officio, members of the Association, he qualifies it by saying, "in the sense of being thereby authorized to vote." His doctrine, he tells us, is directly the opposite of this. Now, are we to understand, that without this qualifying expression, his doctrine is not directly the opposite? We suppose so. But, for our own part, we have no conception of membership which does not include the right of voting. Strictly speaking, membership is predicable of the churches, not of individuals. It is an Association of churches, and not of individuals. The individuals who conduct its proceedings are simply the representatives of the churches, and are supposed to carry out the wishes of the churches which send them. A minister sometimes calls himself a member of the Association, it is true, and he may so speak of himself at other times besides when the Association is in session; but if he means any thing by the expression, he means merely that the church to which he belongs is a member. He may, if the church so determines, go up as a delegate; but even in that case, he does not become personally accountable to the Association, except for a breach of such rules of order as the body may have established for the regulation of its proceedings. For his moral conduct, or his ministerial behavior, he is responsible only to the church to which he belongs. The idea of his being a member of the Association in his individual capacity, so as to be directly amenable to it for his behavior as a Christian, or as a minister, and yet having no right to vote, is not consistent with our view of church independency. In Presbyterian or Prelatical denominations, it might be accounted sound doctrine, but we do not think that Seventh-day Baptists are yet prepared for it.

The design of the proposed amendment, it is said, was "to make ministers amenable, or accountable, to the body throughout which their right to officiate as ministers was acknowledged." We are not sure that we understand how much our correspondent means by this. Our own views, however, shall be made as clear as possible as to the extent of the right of ministers to officiate as ministers. We suppose, then—1. That a minister is a minister of the church to which he belongs. And that there may be no mistake as to our meaning, we say, that his ecclesiastical connection is only with the church of which he is a member. To the church he is responsible, and to no other ecclesiastical judicatory whatever.

2. That his right to officiate as a minister is derived, in the first place, from the Lord Jesus himself, who called him to the work, and, in the second place, from the church, through and by whose agency he is called and ordained; that he may exercise this right, wherever he can find a church, or a people, willing to receive his labors.

3. That his connection with the Association gives him no right to officiate as a minister in any church belonging to it, unless that church is, of itself, willing to receive him in that capacity. "The body thoroughout which his right to officiate as minister," is only that church which, in some way, signifies its willingness that he should do so. Should a pastor of one of the New Jersey or Rhode Island churches visit New York, the privilege of officiating as minister would be very gladly extended to him. But the moment he should claim it as a right, the New York church would probably tell him that it takes two to make a bargain, and his plea of acting by authority of Association, Conference, or whatever else, would avail him nothing. Indeed, there is not a church in the denomination which would not take this ground.

But if it be replied, that a minister's right to officiate in and for another church, except that to which he belongs, is not what is intended, but merely the right to go out as an evangelist at large, preaching to assemblies wherever he can gather them; we answer, that this is a right which is not limited by the bounds of the Association, nor by the geographical boundaries of the denomination itself. His field is the world; his hearers, those whom he can induce to listen. "Preach the gospel to every creature." He derives this right or authority, as we have already said, first from the Lord Jesus Christ, and second from the church of which he is a member. The Association can neither increase this authority, nor diminish it. When he goes forth under the sanction of the church, he goes forth in an orderly manner, according to the gospel, and has all the credentials that he need have from any organized body on earth.

Whether we lay an unreasonable stress upon the Constitution, as our correspondent intimates, must be left principally to the judgment of our readers. But it strikes us, that if we recognize a Constitution at all, we ought to abide by its restrictions. The declaration of the thirteenth article, that the Association "shall recognize each church as having a gospel right to manage its own concerns," &c., is subjected to a singular sort of criticism, as if the word gospel was intended to qualify or limit the independence of the churches. We should think that the article in question might, at least, be allowed to be its own interpreter. The first sentence of it declares, that "the Association shall exercise no ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the churches;" and the last expression is, "without being amenable to any other body." How can language be more explicit? And what more complete refutation can there be of our correspondent's criticism? There is no want of harmony between this article and other parts of the Constitution. By a gospel right of each church to manage its own concerns, is meant, simply, that the gospel secures or gives to each church such a right; and the whole article is the undisguised, and unequivocal, confession of the Association's faith in this respect, namely, that each church has such a right secured to it by the gospel.

In conclusion, we have only to say, that we are sorry to have given our brother the least cause for complaint that we misrepresented him. We certainly did not intend to do so. It is not our wish to misrepresent any brother to whom we have the misfortune to be opposed in discussion.

T. B. B.

FACILITIES FOR SUNDAY TRAVEL.

The facilities for traveling on Sunday, in the vicinity of New York, have greatly increased within a few years. We well remember when it was scarcely possible to get away from New York by public conveyance on a Sunday. Three or four years ago, only one boat left for Albany on Sunday afternoon, and that was a mail boat of inferior quality, which went thumping along at the docks of the principal towns, and was on that account so uncomfortable as to present little temptation to the traveler. At length a through boat to Albany and Troy was added; and now we have two through boats of the largest class, in addition to the mail boat, every Sunday night. Then the Hudson River Railroad was completed—a road on which, it was said, "the Sabbath would be respected." But that road soon obtained a contract to carry the mail, and immediately started Sunday mail trains, leaving New York and Albany at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. Hereupon a great outcry was made, and one of the principal officers resigned his place, because he could not serve a road which run Sunday trains. A few weeks later, a morning train each way was started; so that now we have morning and evening Sunday trains between Albany and New York, in addition to the three Sunday afternoon boats. In other directions from New York the increase of facilities for Sunday travel has not perhaps been as marked, although it has been sufficient to show "progress."

These things will not surprise Sabbath-keepers. When, a few years ago, the general disregard of Sunday induced its friends to call conventions, adopt resolutions, and put forth addresses urging the duty and policy of railroad directors and civil legislators to enforce the stricter observance of Sunday, Sabbath-keepers looked on with interest, and told these people, both verbally and in print, that their efforts would prove unavailing—that they were attempting to heal the wound slightly—that any efforts to promote sabbatizing, which were not based upon the law of God, would produce only temporary results, and would certainly be followed by a most disastrous reaction. And now the very thing which they foresaw is beginning to develop itself. The pent stream is already overflowing its sandy banks, carrying devastation in its way.

Will these people learn wisdom from their experience? One would suppose, that the fate of the "pioneer" movement, which was so effectually killed by Johnson's specious Sunday Mail Report, and the re-action now following the more recent Sunday-coërcion efforts, teach a lesson which need not be misunderstood. There is a class of persons, we know, of whom the Scriptures say, that their folly will not depart from them though they be brayed in a mortar; but we cannot believe that those of whom we are speaking belong to this class. We still hope, that their sad experience will turn their attention to the true cause of existing evils, and lead them candidly to inquire whether they have not, by departing from the law of the Lord, brought upon themselves the trouble of which they so loudly complain.

SUNDAY AND "THE FOURTH."

The "sacred stillness" of last Sunday was sadly broken in New York by "snapping crackers" and miniature cannons. Nothing else could be expected in a city made up to a large extent of people from foreign countries, where Sunday is considered simply as a holiday. Such people see but little difference, on the score of sacredness, between a day which men have set apart to commemorate the resurrection, and one which the same authority has set apart to commemorate the Declaration of Independence—not difference enough, at any rate, to induce them to adjourn the celebration of the latter because it occurs on the day devoted to the memory of the former. Perhaps, indeed, they think the circumstance of the Fourth of July's coming on Sunday is a reason why they should be specially hilarious on that day—just as the advocates of a change of the Sabbath sometimes tell us we ought to be specially joyful on Sunday, because on that day we can celebrate at once the completion of the work of redemption and the work of creation. Be that as it may, the people had a jolly and boisterous time last Sunday, notwithstanding some of the newspapers of the previous day besought them to "respect the customs of their adopted country." Accidents were of course plenty, as usual on such occasions. If some of the people who are up to such work should collect them into a chapter of "Sunday accidents," they might make a long one, to say the least. We question, however, whether they would cover more paper, or be more significant, than the chapter which might be arranged of "Monday accidents."

An Awful Calamity happened at Staten Island, about six miles from New York, on Second-day last. A large number of persons had gone there to spend Independence Day, and towards evening, in their anxiety to secure the first boat, so many crowded upon the ferry bridge that it gave away, and nearly two hundred were precipitated into the water, of whom some twenty-five are supposed to have been drowned. Seventeen bodies had been recovered on Third-day morning.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Laws in Europe—Liberty of the Press—Popish Processions—Maynooth College—Mr. Salomon—Fergus O'Connor.

Glasgow, June 18, 1852.

Amid all the efforts to promote Sunday sanctification in this country, there is an increasing tendency to its desecration. Our old laws, especially the Scotch laws, designed to keep it out of its place as one of "the six working days," are very stringent; but the spirit of the day is so averse to their enforcement that many of them have been allowed to fall into disuetude. Still, under one of these ancient statutes, a case was decided in one of the higher Courts in favor of a barber apprentice at Dundee, whose master had compelled him to shave on Sundays—and reference has often been made to this case as proof that the Judges would put down all acts of desecration. We do not, however, believe that the decision warrants any such interpretation. It was against compelling a reluctant apprentice; and would probably have been different had the charge been against the master for personally shaving customers, or even for employing an acquiescing workman or apprentice. In this form, the question is now likely to be tried; for three hair-dressers have recently been opening their shops on Sunday in the Main street, Cowcaddens, a suburb of Glasgow; and a correspondent, in the Free Church organ, the Scottish Guardian, of this day, complaining of this being done "under the very eye of the police," calls for the interference of the authorities for its prevention.

In France the Parisian organ of the Jesuits, the Universe, is likewise urging upon Government the enforcement of Sunday sanctification; and, having assumed, from one of the published decrees, that this was about to be done, the President has since explained, that while desirous of permitting those in the employment of the Government to enjoy that day by release from labor, there was no intention of compelling any to observe it. The decree having probably been dictated by the priests, had perhaps been made to express more in regard to both Sunday and other holidays than was meant by those having the power in their hands for its enforcement.

The liberty of the press in France is being still farther curtailed, in the President's desire to maintain the despotism he has assumed. Not contented with putting down every journal in that country that ventures to breathe a word of complaint against any of his measures, he has sought to enforce the same rule over the Belgian press, and has threatened with expulsion the French correspondents of the London newspapers, should offense be given in the correspondence or leading articles. The threat is meanwhile held in abeyance, although the journals referred to have wholly disregarded it. And the Prefect of one of the Departments has threatened with suspension a Protestant journal published there for having quoted from a Scotch paper a paragraph intimating that five persons in Edinburgh had abjured "the errors of Catholicism"—and this, while the Universe is every day talking of Protestants abjuring the errors of Luther. The Vienna Gazette of the 4th instant also contains an ordinance by the Emperor of Austria which will much affect the liberty of the press in that country. At Blois, likewise, a person who is familiarly termed "Prophet Menelous," was accused before the Tribunal of Correctional Police of Romoran, on a charge of outraging the Catholic religion and illegally practicing medicine. The outrage was evidently the true cause of displeasure to the priests, as he was insisting on Protestant views; and although, as it appears, a Swedenborgian, his answers at the Tribunal seemed correct, sober and just. The charge as to the practicing of medicine, was founded on cures alledged to have been in answer to prayer in faith, and anointing with oil. He was acquitted on the charge of outrage, but fined five francs for his cures.

Popish processions, which were formerly illegal in France, are now being openly allowed by the President; and processions of the Host, as the blasphemy is termed, have taken place in Paris and other towns.

A Proclamation has been this week issued, in the name of our Queen, on this last-named subject. In an Act passed twenty-two years ago, in favor of Popish liberties, it was expressly prohibited, that there should be religious processions, or that priests should wear the vestments of their orders, except in places of worship or in private houses. In the growing boldness of Papists, this prohibition has been violated in several instances, and the Proclamation now issued warns those referred to, that while the Government is determined to maintain their legal rights and religious freedom, that in future the commission of such offenses will meet with punishment. It is not too soon that the check is given, as it is said that London swarms with dirty-looking priests, wearing their vestments in places of public resort; and that a platform has even been erected in the city, upon which the Protestant Bible has been repeatedly burnt.

It would seem that a sum of £1000 or £1200, which was intended to have been proposed to the House of Commons to be voted for the maintenance of the buildings of the Popish College of Maynooth, in Ireland, was omitted in consequence of the change of Ministry, when Lord John Russell resigned. Unless this should be supplied by a larger grant the ensuing year, it seems to be lost to their cause. They will have still undisturbed the main grant, however; as Mr. Spooner's motion for a Committee of Inquiry into the affairs of that nursery of apostacy and immorality will not again be proposed this session of Parliament. But the Earl of Winchelsea, on Monday, gave notice in the House of Lords, that he will next session move for a Committee to inquire whether the moral and religious principles inculcated at Maynooth College be not subversive of all Protestant government.

The Court of Exchequer was on Monday engaged in trying the question, at the instance of an informer, whether Mr. Salomon, the Jew who was prevented from sitting as a Member of Parliament by the form of the oath, had incurred the penalty of £1500, for having voted in the House of Commons. No countenance was given to the action by Parliament or the Government; and Mr. S. had a verdict given in his favor, from a want of proof, which in other circumstances could have been easily supplied.

Fergus O'Connor, having been committed to custody on a warrant by the Speaker of the House of Commons, a Committee was appointed to inquire into his state. Two medical gentlemen having expressed an opinion that he was of unsound mind, and his sister having petitioned for his liberation, in order that he might be committed to a Lunatic Asylum, he was on Wednesday transferred to one. The fact of £1200 in bank notes having been found on his person, when first committed, affords ground for suspicion that his Land Scheme, which impoverished so many working men who foolishly trusted him, has afforded him an opportunity of enriching himself with the plunder.

Government has entered into new contracts for conveying our sea-borne correspondence. When these come into operation, the cost to the nation will amount to nearly a million sterling per annum. The number of miles which the British mail packets will traverse annually will be nearly 2,500,000; and the number of letters which these packets may be expected to carry in the course of a year, at the present postal packet rates, about 30,000,000.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR THE MINISTRY.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

I noticed in the Recorder of the 27th of May, an article written by "A Minister," with the above caption. I would like to make a few suggestions on this subject, that have from time to time occurred to me.

That the work of the herald of the cross is of vast importance, and requires no novice to perform it, is very true. But one would infer, from the tenor of this article, that the ministerial office among our people had been "burdened and dishonored by inducting into it good men who can not teach." I have yet to learn that such is the case. I believe that, on the whole, the ministers of our denomination are at least respectable. Our standard, of course, is not as high as that of our First-day Baptist or Presbyterian brethren. This we can not expect, and that for the best reason. We are very much scattered. We have but little surplus wealth. We have no colleges or theological schools for the benefit of our young men. In short, we have much to discourage and little to encourage our young men to enter the ministry. We have plenty of censors upon the qualifications of young men for the ministry, and few to take a brother by the hand and lead him forward to the work. If a young man aspires to the holy office, he is in too many cases frowned down by his brethren, when, by a little encouragement, he might have become a mighty champion in the cause of Christ. In attempting to elevate our standard, we should not carry it so high that it would cut off a majority of our ministers were they to come forward for examination. If we cannot get the best, we must accept of such as we can get, and put forth all our efforts, both in prayer and in other ways, to make them better. We must abandon the notion that God will raise up ministers among us, capable of discharging the duties of the office, irrespective of our own exertions. He does not see fit to carry on His work in that way. We must make our own ministers, under His direction.

Our brother speaks much about aptness to teach. But what better evidence can we have of a young man's "aptness to teach," than that "many have been converted under his labors?" What brighter examples of Peter's and his coadjutors' "aptness to teach," have we, than the three thousand souls converted under their preaching on the day of Pentecost? What better evidence have we of Paul's "aptness to teach," than the churches planted by him throughout Asia Minor, Macedonia, Greece, Italy, and Spain? What do the converts of Luther, of Calvin, of Wesley, and of Whitfield, witness? If such a brother is not well received by the church, it argues that the church is wrong, and not he. True, exegetical discourses are very important in their place, but a minister had better be deficient in that field, than destitute of the sword of the Spirit. We need diversity of gifts in the ministry, as well as in any other sphere. Paul planted, and Apollos watered. Again, it looks like absurdity, a contradiction of terms, to say a man is "incapable of teaching," who has been successful in winning souls to Christ. "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty." And again, the writer of Acts, in speaking of Barnabas' ministration at Antioch, says, "He was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith," and this seems to be reason enough why "much people were added to the Lord" through his preaching.

Our brother, in speaking of such aspiring ignoramuses, who, unskillful as they may be, have, as he admits, been instrumental in dispensing the bread of life to many, says: "The custom has been to induct such an one into the ministry; and wo betide the minister who dare make an innovation upon the long-established custom." "O tempora! O mores!" Would that none worse had ever been inducted into the sacerdotal office! Many a young man, armed with fervent zeal and humble piety, although in a measure destitute of the more brilliant endowments which, other things being equal, would help him much, has nevertheless done good service in the vineyard of the Lord, while others, far more brilliant, have been almost entirely unsuccessful. What then? If God seals the ministry of this or that humble brother by the birth of souls into the kingdom of Heaven under his labors, shall any one break the seal? Cases are rare where persons in their private and individual capacity have been very eminently successful in winning souls to Christ; and when they do occur, the presumption is, that such individuals would do more good were they to devote their whole time to the ministry of the word of life. Did I believe that God had called me to preach, and had he sealed my labors by the conversion of many souls," I should preach—preach if ministers and councils should frown, denying me the privilege, and laymen laugh—preach if I had to go forth entirely uncommissioned by the church or council; and if my own people would not hear me, behold, I would "turn to the Gentiles." I should ask no better evidence of my calling than that "many souls had been converted under my labors." If I am wrong, I would like to be made right.

THE CHURCH—ITS MISSION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

In the number of the Recorder dated May 20th, the editorial under the head of "Denominational Sins," applies some pretty severe censures to us as a people; and perhaps we richly deserve them. In the beginning of the fifth paragraph the writer says: "For our own part, we have lost all faith in the competency of Seventh-day Baptists of the present day for the mission which they have undertaken." And in the next paragraph he says: "The truth is, we are not yet ready for our mission."

The above conclusions, indicative as they are of almost hopeless despair, are probably not groundless. And they are equally as applicable to nearly the whole of the professedly Christian church as to the Seventh-day Baptist denomination. That the church has lost the power of reform, to a great extent, is a fact that is fixed by history; for when has the church, as a body, ever addressed herself to the work of a world's salvation, since about the commencement of the third century? In proof that the church has lost the power of reform, I would ask, whether most of modern reforms have not been carried on by private individuals, either in the church or out of it? And farther, whether the church, almost equally with the world, has not needed such reform? Instance the reform under Luther, the temperance reformation, the anti-slavery and peace movements. And I seriously put the question, What reform has the church brought about? As a stream cannot rise higher than its fountain, so the church can never expect to reform higher than she herself stands. What influence for good could the church exert in the temperance reform at its commencement? What can she now against slavery and war? Identified as she is with slavery and war, how can she pronounce them sinful?—folding in her arms those who, on the field of battle, have poured the molten lead through their fellow men, brothers in Christ though they might have been—holding in fellowship those who have plundered cradles of their infants, wives of their husbands, parents of their children, children of their parents—permitting those to officiate at her altars who buy and sell their brethren in Christ, as cattle in the market—elevating to the bishopric men who assert that "the right to hold slaves is founded in the golden rule"—holding in fellowship the kidnapper, with his aiders and abettors—forbidding the use of her pulpits for the purpose of pleading the cause of suffering humanity, of the slave, of peace, of prison and moral reform?

In view of the above, I fully believe, that not only the Seventh-day Baptist Church, but the whole professed church, is "incompetent for its mission;" and I frankly admit, that with me it is beginning to be a serious inquiry, what is to be done, and what ought I to do? That the church is not now performing the mission of Christianity, is almost certain. Whether she can be made to perform it, admits of a question.

That Christianity has power to save men from sin here, I do not doubt. That it is equally powerful to save nations as individuals, I firmly believe. But that the American churches are saving the nation from its sins, seriously question. Governed and ruled by a worldly spirit to a great extent, conniving at political chicanery, and relying almost exclusively on human aid for protection and success, how can she stand forth "clear as the sun, fair as the moon, and terrible as an army with banners?"

That the church has zeal, I doubt not; but is it "according to knowledge?" Who can look at her Tract and Sunday-School Societies, and doubt her resources? But when I reflect that neither of these Societies will publish any work on the sin of slavery, and that they expunge all reference to this sin from foreign books when they republish such, my soul is pained within me. But I am not discouraged; for I have not fully lost confidence in the power of Christianity. But it must be that taught by Jesus Christ, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of good works, without partiality, and without hypocrisy. I would not wish to detract one jot or tittle from the church's due; but, according to my view of religion and Christianity, the church has yet to take a higher stand before she can be said to be the light of the world, the salt of the earth.

It is not unfrequent that reformers have been forced to leave the church, because of the opposition to such reform from it. But I would ask, Ought not the church to load in all reforms from sin? The great difficulty is, religion is made to consist in abstractions, while religion and some of the most important questions of morality are divorced. Things which God once joined together, man has put asunder. Let the church but arm herself with her legitimate weapons, which are not carnal, and enter upon the conquest of the world, and victory will be hers. S. S. G.

GREENMANVILLE, June 4, 1852.

DEATH OF HENRY CLAY.

HENRY CLAY died at Washington on the morning of Third-day, June 29, at 11 o'clock. He was born April 12, 1777, and was therefore 75 years, 2 months, and 17 days old when he died. Although the event had been hourly expected for some time previous, yet it produced great gloom, not only at the capital, but throughout the country. His funeral took place at Washington on Fifth-day, and was attended by members of the Cabinet, both Houses of Congress, most of the diplomatic corps, and a large body of citizens. According to his request, the remains were removed to Kentucky, by way of N. Y. and Albany. At all the principal places on the route, they were received with tokens of respect and sorrow, particularly at New York, where they arrived on Sabbath afternoon, and remained until Second-day morning.

The following account of Mr. Clay's religious exercises near the close of his life, we copy from a report of the funeral sermon preached at Washington by Rev. C. M. Butler, Chaplain of the Senate:—

Twenty years since he wrote: "I am a member of no religious sect, and I am not a professor of religion; I regret that I am not; I wish that I was, and trust that I shall be; I have and always have had a profound regard for Christianity, the religion of my fathers, and for its rights, its usages and observances." That feeling proved that the seed sown by pious parents was not dead though stifled. A few years since its dormant life was re-awaked. He was baptized in the communion of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and during his sojourn in this city he was in full communion with Trinity parish. It is since his withdrawal from the sittings of the Senate that I have been made particularly acquainted with his religious opinions, character and feelings. From his first illness he expressed to me the persuasion that it would be fatal; from that period until his death it has been my privilege to have held with him frequent religious services and conversations in his room. He averred to me his full faith in the great leading doctrines of the gospel, the fall and sinfulness of man, the divinity of Christ, the reality and necessity of the atonement, the need of being born again by the Spirit, and salvation through faith in the crucified Redeemer. His own personal hopes of salvation he ever and distinctly based on the promises and the grace of Christ. Strikingly perceptible on his naturally impetuous and impatient character was the influence of grace in producing submission and patient watching for Christ and Death. On one occasion, he spoke to me of the pious example of one very near and dear to him, as that which led him deeply to feel and earnestly to seek, for himself, the reality and blessedness of religion. On one occasion, he told me that he had been striving to form a conception of Heaven, and he enlarged upon the mercy of that provision by which our Saviour became a partaker of our humanity, that our hearts and hopes might fix themselves on him. On another occasion, when he was supposed to be very near his end, I expressed to him the hope that his mind and heart were at peace, and that he was able to rest with cheerful confidence on the promises and merits of the Redeemer. He said, with much feeling, that he endeavored to, and trusted that he did repose his salvation upon Christ—that it was too late for him to look at Christianity in the light of speculation. He had never doubted its birth, and he now wished to throw himself upon it, as a practical and blessed remedy. Very soon after this I administered to him the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Being extremely feeble, and desirous of having his mind undiverted, no persons were present but his son and servant. It was a scene long to be remembered. There, in that still chamber, at a week day noon, the tides of life all flowing strong around us, three disciples of the Saviour—the minister of God, the dying statesman, and his servant, a partaker of the like precious faith—commemorated their Saviour's dying love. He joined in the blessed sacrament with great feeling and solemnity, now pressing his hands together, and now spreading them forth, as words of the service expressed the feelings, desires, supplications and thanksgivings of his heart. After this he rallied, and again I was permitted frequently to join with him in religious services, conversation and prayer. He grew in grace and in knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Among the books that he read most were "Jay's Morning and Evening Exercises," "The Life of Dr. Chalmers," and "The Christian Philosopher triumphant in death." His hope continued to the end, though true and real to be tremulous with humanity rather than rapturous with assurance. When he felt most the wearing of his protracted sufferings, it sufficed to suggest to him that his Heavenly Father doubtless knew that after a life so long, stirring and tempted, such a discipline of chastening and suffering was needful to make him meet for the inheritance of the saints, and at once the words of meek and patient acquiescence escaped his lips. Exhausted nature at length gave way. On the last occasion when I was permitted to offer a brief prayer at his bedside, his last words to me were, that he had hope only in Christ, and that the prayer which I had offered for His pardoning love and His sanctifying grace, included every thing which the dying need. On the evening previous to his departure, sitting an hour in silence by his bedside, I could not but realize, when I heard him in the slight wanderings of his mind to other days and other scenes, murmuring the words, "My mother—mother—mother;" and saying, "My dear wife," as if she were present, I could not but realize then, and rejoice to think, how near was the blessed re-union of his weary heart with the loved dead, and with her (our dear Lord gently smooth her passage to the tomb) who must soon follow him to his rest, whose spirits even then seemed to visit and to cheer his memory and his hope. Gently he breathed his soul away into the spirit world.

MORE TROUBLE FOR THE SUNDAY FOLKS IN PENNSYLVANIA.—The Opinion of Judge Thompson, in favor of closing taverns on Sunday, seems to have suited one of the Philadelphia constables, who wanted to make business for himself or for the courts. The Constable of High Street Ward, almost immediately instituted suits against John McMakin and others for the penalty of four dollars for keeping their hotel open on Sunday. They were tried before Alderman Mitchell on Sabbath, June 26, and a decision was given in favor of the defendants, who were accordingly discharged. The Alderman held, that the act of 1705 gave tavern-keepers a right to do business on Sunday, under certain restrictions, and that the law of 1794, imposing a penalty of four dollars for following a "worldly employment," did not repeal nor conflict with that act. It will be necessary to make more Sunday laws before the sticklers for the day will accomplish all they wish in Pennsylvania.

CATHOLIC MISSIONS.—It appears from the Annual Report for 1851, of the "Society for the Propagation of the Faith," just published at Lyons, that the receipts of the Society for the year 1851 exceeded those for 1850 by the sum of about $48,229. They were from the following sources:—

France,	$397,460	The Levant,	$ 926
North America,	15,654	Lombardy, &c.,	11,307
South America,	5,861	Malta,	2,879
Belgium,	41,105	Modena,	3,667
Great Britain,	27,894	Parma,	1,693
States of the Church,	14,803	Netherlands,	16,883
Spain,	1,808	Portugal,	5,969
Greece,	3,397	Prussia,	35,947
Sandwich Islands,	230	Other Germ. States,	3,254
Sardinia,	45,555	Switzerland,	8,548
The Sicilies,	13,785	Tuscany,	8,903

The Society distributed in the year 1851, among its various missions, nearly $600,000, and still has in its Treasury, after paying all its expenses, a reserve of $53,196. The distribution was as follows: The Missions in Europe, $111,816; the Missions in Asia, $203,035; the Missions in Africa, $57,800; the Missions in America, $149,736; the Missions in Oceanica, $68,516.

PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF PUBLICATION.—This Board appears (says the Independent) to be conducted with increasing energy, and to be well supported among the people. The report for last year states that they have added 27 new books to their catalogue, (2 of which are German,) of which they have printed 67,750 copies; and 33 new tracts, 115,000 copies. Also 30,000 almanacs. Total copies of new publications, 212,750. They have published 605,500 copies of new editions of books and tracts, being an increase of 315,000. Total number of copies issued, 818,250, being an increase of 388,000, or 90 per cent. The Presbyterian Sabbath-School Visitor now circulates 34,000 copies semi-monthly. The receipts of the year are, from sales $66,513, an increase of $6,500 or 10 per cent.; donations $17,996, an increase of $7,705 or 75 per cent.; total increase $14,219, including a legacy of $825. The debt on the building is all paid off.

REV. DR. ELY.—It is stated that Rev. Ezra Styles Ely, D. D., after some forty years' service in the cause, and after expending a fortune of a hundred thousand dollars in an unsuccessful attempt to establish a college at the West, is suffering under paralysis and poverty in Philadelphia. He came back from the West, having lost property, wife, and child, or children, still unbroken in spirit, and commenced anew a pastorship in that city; but now has come an affliction which for ever lays him aside from service, and makes him dependent.

THE USE OF TOBACCO.—The following resolution, passed by the Universalist Reformed Convention, at their recent festival in Boston, we heartily commend to "all whom it may concern:"—

"Resolved, That among the vile and dangerous habits indulged in by some of our race, the habit of using tobacco is not the least pernicious. Deeming it a useless expense, injurious to health and mental vigor, and likely to lead to practices of an immoral character, we feel bound to exhort parents and Christians generally to discourage, both by precept and practice, the use of tobacco in any form."

THE CONSUMPTIVE'S GUIDE TO HEALTH; or, the Invalid's Five Questions, and the Doctor's Five Answers: A Comprehensive practical Treatise on Pulmonary Consumption, its preventive and curative treatment, etc., etc., addressed in popular language to non-medical readers, and incidentally to Physicians and Students. By J. HAMILTON POTTER, M. D., No. 404 Broadway. Second Edition. New York: J. S. Redfield, Clinton Hall, 1852.

Such is the title-page, entire, of a work which has been placed on our table. The author of it claims to have enjoyed the advantages of the medical colleges and hospitals of Paris, Brussels, London, Dublin, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, and to have "returned to his native country, rejoicing in the belief that the progress of consumption, bronchitis, and other diseases of the chest, and diseases of the throat, can be arrested by the hand of science." This book gives his reasons for that belief, together with a variety of information about diseases in general, and consumption in particular.

SECOND-DAY, JUNE 28.

In the SENATE, the interminable business of the Mexican war occupied some time. A bill was reported providing for the settlement of the accounts of military officers charged with the collection of "contributions" in Mexico during the war; another, to dispose of military sites. The President transmitted a copy of Hulseman's farewell. Mr. Weller proposed a committee of five to examine charges against Mr. Bartlett, of the present Boundary Commission. The Select Committee on Census Returns made a report proposing to exclude from the published census historical sketches, geological statements, calculations on returns of deaf and dumb, blind and idiotic, tables of nativity, of occupations, of medical statistics, on the ground that they are "incomplete, inaccurate, false, useless, and unnecessary." The report was laid over.

In the HOUSE, some time was spent in talking about Gardner's fraudulent Mexican claims; after which the Pennsylvania contested election case was debated till the hour of adjournment.

THIRD-DAY, JUNE 29.

No business was done in either House, immediate adjournment following the announcement of the death of Henry Clay.

FOURTH-DAY, JUNE 30.

The SENATE held a session, at which several eulogies were pronounced upon Mr. Clay, and the usual resolutions were passed.

The HOUSE proceedings were of the same general character.

FIFTH-DAY, JULY 1.

No session, both Houses being in attendance at the funeral of Mr. Clay.

SIXTH-DAY, JULY 2.

In the SENATE, the usual formalities of notifying the Governor of Kentucky of the death of Mr. Clay were ordered. Ten thousand copies of the funeral proceedings are to be printed. The House bill, restoring the mass of public lands heretofore reserved in Arkansas, was taken up and passed. A bill concerning Brazilian claims was passed as amended by the House. The Diplomatic Salary bill was taken up, but nothing done. After passing a few private bills, the Senate adjourned to Third-day.

The HOUSE promptly laid on the table several land-grant bills. The Pennsylvania contested election case was settled by laying the whole subject upon the table, 87 to 74. The Deficiency Bill coming up, Mr. Wells made an intervention speech, and then the House adjourned.

SABBATH-DAY, JULY 3.

Only the HOUSE was in session. It passed a bill amendatory of the bill discontinuing the offices of surveyors general, land officers, &c., in certain cases, also a bill providing for resurveys of public lands in Mississippi. The Deficiency Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Toombs made a political speech thereupon. He was followed by Mr. Breckenridge, of Ky., who opposed the appropriations for the mail steamers generally, and the Collins line particularly. Adjourned till Third-day.

European News.

The Steamer Africa, with Liverpool dates to June 19, arrived at New York July 1.

Parliamentary proceedings are destitute of interest to American readers.

A London paper learns that the frigate having on board the French envoy deputed to arrange the affairs of La Plata, is detained at Maderia by casualties. Sir C. Hotham, the British Commissioner, will therefore await his arrival at Bahia. It is added, that Urquiza, President of the Argentine Republic, is desirous to meet the views of the commission, and a reasonable hope exists that the waters of La Plata will soon be opened to the traffic of the world.

The Cunard Company have arrangements nearly completed for the establishment of their new line of steamships to Australia, via Panama and New Zealand, and in connection with the mail service between Liverpool and the United States. Their expectation is to secure the carriage of the mails between England and those places, and also to procure from the French Government a contract for Tahiti.

It is reported that a Government journal, to vie with the first-class London press, is about to be established in Paris.

Great inundations are occurring in the south of France. At last accounts the Garonne was rising rapidly, and an overflow appeared imminent. The Lot was also in a state of flood; the low grounds along its banks were inundated, and much farm stock had been destroyed.

A Court Martial at Lyons has convicted M. Lancher Cremieux's land agent of a conspiracy to murder all the officers of the 12th Reg't. No particulars of this singular affair are given, except that four sergeants of the Regiment and two civilians were implicated and are found guilty.

The Alcades of all the towns in the Province of Cadiz, Spain, are to hold a meeting, under the presidency of the Civil Governor, to devise a system of Railroads for the province.

A revolt has broken out in Algeria. On the 2d, a tribe of Arabs, numbering 1,000, rose and attacked a camp of French workmen, killing some and causing the others to flee. The insurgents afterward marched on Ghelma, and on the 4th and 5th had an engagement with the troops from Bora and Constantia, in which the French appear to have been worsted.

SICKNESS ON SHIPBOARD.—The steamship Philadelphia left Aspinwall on the 22d of June, for Havana and New Orleans, and when two days from port the cholera broke out among the passengers and crew, carrying off nearly forty of them. Among these was Mr. Birdsall, the U. S. Mail agent. On her arrival at Havana she was immediately ordered away by the authorities—they not even allowing her to remain two miles outside the harbor to have the requisite stores sent to her, but compelling her to put to sea quite unprepared for the voyage. She proceeded to Key West, where she arrived on the 28th, but was not allowed to land passengers. She went thence to Sand Key, and there landed. She had thirty-two deaths on board—twenty-six passengers and six of the crew. Thirteen died after her arrival at Key West, and on the 30th of June thirteen were still sick—four of them with cholera, the rest Chagres fever.

RAILROAD COLLISION.—On Fourth-day, June 30, two trains, the one heavily laden with passengers, the other carrying freight, came into collision at high speed on the Patterson Railroad. The shock was terrific; both locomotives were large, and one of them was of the largest size in use; they rushed against each other with such fury as to crash the fore part of each, knocking off the massive heads of the cylinders as though they had been of paste-board, and rending heavy bars of iron like twigs. The tenders and freight cars behind were dashed in pieces, and their fragments and contents strewn along the ground. The loss from broken and damaged machinery and other property could not be less than $20,000. Very strangely, no life was lost in this collision.

SUMMARY.

Anthony G. Hastings, Postmaster at Hillsborough, Delaware, was arrested on Friday, June 25, and lodged in jail at Georgetown, Del., on the charge of robbing the United States mail, at various times, for six months past, of letters containing money to a considerable amount, sent South, East, North and West. Several packages containing money, for Baltimore and various parts of Virginia, and others for Washington, Georgetown, Philadelphia, and various other points, have been recovered, and a considerable portion of the missing money, with many of the letters, were found in his possession when arrested.

The fly-wheel of Messrs. Harris, Burnish & Co.'s rolling mill, near Pottsville, Pa., recently burst asunder, throwing the fragments in every direction. One portion, weighing from 1,500 to 2,000 pounds, was thrown through the roof of the building in an easterly direction, more than one hundred yards. Another part, weighing not less than three tuns, passed up almost perpendicularly through the heavy frame timbers and roof, to an elevation of fifty or sixty feet; in its descent other portions of the roof were chrushed. But one of the twenty-two men employed was injured, and he not seriously.

Mr. Carpenter, of Rome, N. Y., has made an improvement in the ordinary form of Railroad, calculated greatly to diminish the liability if not utterly preclude the possibility of a train running off the track, under any circumstances. The improvement consists of a middle rail of Iron or Wood, running the whole length of the track, precisely in its center, and raised a foot or so above the side or bearing Rails. Friction rollers are attached to the Engine and Cars beneath, to play upon the sides of the middle or guiding rail, whereby the motion of each car is steadied and any tendency to fly the track at once arrested.

The Governor of Connecticut has signed the Free Banking Law recently passed by the Legislature of that State. The stocks receivable under it as a basis for circulation are the New England stocks, New York, Virginia, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and the United States. Also those of the cities of New York, Boston, and of any city of Connecticut. These stocks must be equal to a six per cent. stock at par.

At Cincinnati, Lewis Slate, Sarah Slate, Milton Parker, and John Frisbee, have been found guilty by the Criminal Court of dealing in counterfeit money. The evidence showed the parties to have belonged to a most extensive gang of counterfeiters, one of whom, named John S. Collins, turned State's evidence, but after the trial he was arrested by the United States Commissioner, on a charge dealing in counterfeit coin.

On the 22d ult., the engine and tender of an upward passenger train on the Georgia State Railroad were thrown from the track down a bank twenty feet high, about two miles from Atalanta, by coming in contact with a hand car. One fireman was killed and another seriously injured. No passenger was hurt. On the same road, on the previous day, a collision occurred between two freight trains, damaging only the engines and cars.

In five days after the news was received at Boston of the discovery of gold in Australia, a clipper ship was dispatched, laden in part with wooden buckets for the miners. She made the passage in 91 days, bringing news from England up to Oct. 4, whilst by the direct way they had no later dates than Sept. 18.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

New York and Boston.

REGULAR MAIL LINE, via Stonington, for Boston Providence, New Bedford, Taunton, and Newport carrying the great Eastern U. S. Mail, without change of cars or detention. The secure and elegant steamers C. VANDERBILT and COMMODORE leave on alternate days (Sundays excepted) Pier No. 2 North River, (first wharf above Battery-place,) at 5 o'clock P. M. For passage, state-rooms, or freight, apply at Pier No. 2, or at the office, No. 11 Battery-place.

To Boston via Norwich and Worcester.

THE first-class Sound steamers CONNECTICUT and KNICKERBOCKER leave Pier 18, N. R., foot of Courtland-st., New York, forming the great United States and British Mail Line for Boston, Montreal, Quebec, Lowell, and Nashua, via Norwich and Worcester. Fare to New London $2; to Worcester $3; to Boston $4; to Bellows' Falls, Vt., $5; to Burlington $7; to Rowse's Point $8. Through tickets to Montreal $9 50.

The pier from which this line starts is the most contiguous of any occupied by the Sound Lines, to the Astor House, Irving House, Howard Hotel, Rathbun's Hotel, and the numerous Hotels in Courtland-st. and its vicinity. The passage affords a fine view of the Hudson and East Rivers, and the Route being Inland, avoids the uncomfortable passage round Point Judith, and through Fisher's Island Sound. Passengers can if they prefer, arrive in Boston at an early hour, by the Steamboat Train, or have the privilege of remaining and breakfasting on board the Steamers, and take the early train from Norwich to Boston; thus making the hour of arrival equally accommodated to pleasure and business travel.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms are attached to these Bells, so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Miscellaneous.

Japan.

Japan was formerly divided into a great many small kingdoms, which still retain their names; but they were at length swallowed up in one to which all the rest have become either subject or tributary. The tributary princes are invested with real dignity, and are absolute in their respective territories; but they are entirely subject to the emperor, who can depose and even condemn them to death if he thinks proper.

The Japanese are of a yellowish complexion. Their heads are large, their necks short, their eyes small, their hair dark brown, and their noses, although not flat, thick and short. They are a vigorous, energetic people, and assimilate in their bodily and mental powers much nearer to Europeans than to Asiatics. They are eager of novelty, open to strangers, extremely curious and inquisitive concerning the manners and habits of other countries, take great interest in learning the course of events, and progress of the useful arts and sciences among the western nations; are frugal, ingenious, sober, just, and of a friendly disposition, warm in their attachments, but proud, distrustful, and implacable in their resentments.

They have existed more than 2000 years as a homogeneous race and independent nation, under the same form of government and system of laws, speaking the same language, professing the same national religion (Boodhist,) owe no allegiance to China, and have never been conquered or colonized by any foreign power.

Their language is pollysyllabic, with an alphabet of 48 letters, soft, euphónious, and one of the most polished and perfect of eastern Asia, bearing no affinity to the Chinese, or any other primitive Asiatic idiom. They have a rich indigenous literature, primary schools, where the children of both sexes and all classes are taught the elementary branches of education; colleges, with professors in the higher departments of learning and science, including mathematics, astronomy, geography, and the leading Arabic and European languages; possess an imperial library at Jeddo, said to contain 150,000 volumes; are far more advanced in arts and civilization than the Chinese; and are in many respects a most superior race.

The commercial and sea-faring classes are very desirous of a more unrestricted intercourse and trade with foreigners, but are prevented by fear of their rulers and the law.

The revenue and military force of the Japanese empire are said to be immense. But on these points no positive or reliable information is to be obtained.

In the progress of steam navigation, the opening of the ports of Japan will be of the utmost importance to commerce. In many of the provinces of the empire there are inexhaustible mines of the lest bituminous coal, which have been worked from time immemorial. The coasts of her northern dependencies, as well as those in the Gulf of Tartary, and the island of Tarakay, are covered with vast forests of pine, larch, birch, and other woods, suitable for burning in steamers, which it is presumed could easily be supplied by the natives at very low rates. Shooting the Devil.

June 10 was the day for the yearly Roman Catholic festival of Corpus Christi, which is a feast of obligations, held always the Thursday after Trinity Sunday. It is a feast instituted by that church in commemoration of the Eucharist, or Lord's Supper, and is one of the greatest festivals of the year—being observed by Catholics throghout the world. In Catholic countries the sacrament is carried about in the streets in procession—the priests and people expressing their devotions in prayers, accompanied by other testimonials of affection, such as flowers, music, &c. The streets are thronged, altars are erected and beautifully decorated in honor of the sacraments, and benedictions are pronounced upon the people by the priests. The pronouncing of the benediction is accompanied by the firing of guns, as a signal to all persons within hearing of the report, to unite in devotion at the time of the benediction. In Germany and other countries this day is strictly observed. All Catholics and many Protestants rest from all labor. The day of this festival is appointed in the season of flowers, that smiling Nature may cast her floral tribute at the shrine of fervent Devotion. Fragrant flowers are strewed in the streets, and flowers and evergreens decorate the cathedrals and churches of the Catholics, on this prominent occasion. This festive day is also regarded as a day of prayer for God's blessing upon the fruits and crops of the season—that there may be an abundance in the harvest—and in that respect may be regarded as an antecedent of the Thanksgiving Day recognized by other churches.

The signal of shooting has been ignorantly or wilfully represented as the ceremony of Shooting the Devil, by which appellation only this observance is known to many, and the impression is thereby created that this shooting is either a literal or typical shooting the Devil out of the Church! An attendence upon these ceremonies at the German Catholic Church, located in that section of Williamsburgh known as "Dutch Town," will enable us to give a brief account of what occurred. That neighborhood being almost exclusively German, the characteristics of Faderland are visible in many respects, of which this is one most prominent. The day wore the appearance of the Sabbath. Labor was at a stand; the Sunday suit was donned, and the principal portion of the people flocked to the church to participate in the services. The Washington Guards, one of the military companies of that locality, were out, armed and equipped, and had the Star Spangled Banner flying at the head of the flag-staff at Military Hall. At 10 o'clock the church was filled to attend mass and hear the discourse for the occasion. During mass, at certain points, and while the organ was playing and the choir and congregation chanting, the military drawn up in line in both aisles, facing each other, would present arms; and then followed, in quick succession, the roll of the drums, the sound of trumpets, and loud discharge of fire-arms outside of the church. This was repeated several times during the services. The church was decorated with flowers and evergreens, and filled to its utmost capacity by the congregation. At the close of the services the military were marched into the street and formed in front of the church. Some further ceremonies, including a discharge of fire-arms at the side of the church, closed the services of the morning. The band of music commenced playing, and with the military proceeded up Ewen-st. to their quarters, followed by the throng. In the afternoon, services were repeated, after which, as is usual on holiday, festival, or Sabbath days, the lager-bier halls, and other places of amusement, would be thronged for the remainder of the day and evening. Such is what is termed the ceremony of Shooting the Devil, as seen in "Dutch Town," together with a brief account of the origin and objects of the day. [Trib.

Things Worth Knowing.

CAMPHOR.

This is a vegetable substance, semi-transparent and colorless; solid and easily broken, and yet so tough that it is with great difficulty it can be powdered, without the addition of a few drops of spirit or oil. It is exceedingly volatile, and when exposed to the air, it flies off in vapor. Its smell is strong and aromatic, and on account of this strong odor it is much used to preserve cabinets and clothes from insects and moths. From its strong smell has arisen the idea that it is a preservative from infectious disorders, but as it is poisonous, disease is more liable from the camphor than from infection. Although camphor dissolves in water only in a very small quantity, sufficient however is taken up to give the water both its aromatic odor and bitter taste. Water containing a small quantity of camphor disolved in it, is known by the name of camphor julep. A singular effect takes place if small shavings of camphor are thrown on the surface of perfectly clean water in a large basin; the pieces immediately begin to move rapidly, some round on their center, others from place to place. The cause of these motions is unknown. Camphor is readily dissolved by spirits of wine; the solution thus made is called camphorated spirit. It is useful for rubbing unbroken chilblains, and for applying to burns and scalds when the skin is not destroyed or broken. Camphor exists in many plants, but it is chiefly obtained from two trees; one a native of China and Japan, very much resembling the laurel. From this tree it is procured by chopping up the leaves, branches, roots, &c., into small pieces, and placing them in a still with water; on the bottom of the still being heated, the camphor from its volatility, rises in vapor, and collects again in a cold part of the apparatus. The other camphor tree is a native of Borneo and Sumatra; the camphor is obtained from this one by splitting open the tree, when it is found in large pieces in the interior.

SAGO.

This nutritious food is the produce of a palm-tree growing in low marshy situations, in the peninsular of Molucca, and the adjacent islands, and is called cycas circenalis. This tree grows to about 25 or 30 feet high; the trunk is thick and cylindrical, destitute of branches, and bearing on its top a tuft of numerous leaves before the tree forms its fruit. The stem consists of a thin, hard wall or shell outside, about two inches in thickness; the whole of the inner part of the trunk is filled with an immense quantity of a pithy substance, from which the sago is obtained. This pith disappears as the fruit ripens, the latter deriving its nourishment from the pith, and when the fruit is quite ripe the stem is merely a hollow cylinder. The sago is obtained by cutting down the tree close to the ground, splitting up the trunk, and taking out the pith, which is rubbed to powder and mixed with water; after straining off, the water is left standing; the sago settles at the bottom, and after a few more washings it is fit for use; but before it is sent to this country it is again wetted with water, so as to make a paste which is rubbed or rolled into the small grains we are acquainted with. The quantity of sago yielded by each tree is immense; 500 or 600 lbs. is a common produce for one palm. To Moluccans it is the staff of life, and is both nutritious, wholesome, and easily digested.

SODA.

This important and useful article is an alkaline substance, the oxide of sodium. Until lately, soda was obtained from the ashes of burnt sea weed, but is now obtained from sea salt by complicated chemical processes, and is generally manufactured on a very extensive scale. Soda is usually in large crystals, transparent, soluble in water, and has a cooling, alkaline taste. They contain nearly two-thirds their weight of water, and if gently heated they melt. If the crystals of soda are kept in a warm, dry place, the water they contain flies off, and a dry white powder is left, less than half the weight of the crystals. Combined with carbonic acid, soda is found in a mineral state in Egypt, where it abounds under the name of natron, when it is frequently called mineral alkali. Soda is well known for its use in washing, and its value in various arts. All the different kinds of soap are made with fats, or oils and soda. Its use in cleansing from dirt and grease, clothes, wood-work, or paint is universal. A small quantity placed in hard spring water renders it fit for wash- or cooking vegetables. It is also a medicinal article.

NUTMEGS AND MACE.

These two spices are the produce of one tree, which is a native of the Molucca or Spice Islands. The tree is not large, but it blossoms and bears fruit at all seasons of the year. Its fruit is of the same size as a peach; the outer rind, which resembles the green rind of the walnut, but thicker, is smooth, pulpy, and bitter, and about half an inch thick. As the fruit ripens, this outside covering bursts, and discloses a thin, bright scarlet membrane, which appears as if torn into narrow branched slips. This membrane, when dried, is mace. It grows round the nut, which consists of a thin, hard, dark-brown shell, enclosing an oily kernel, which is the nutmeg. The nutmeg-tree is very largely cultivated for the sake of these spices. The fruit is gathered when ripe, the outer rind taken off, and thrown away. The mace is then carefully separated from the nut and dried. During the operation it loses its bright scarlet, and becomes of a reddish orange color. It is then pressed into bags, and is ready for exportation. Mace, when good, is of a rather deep color, very oily, with an agreeable aromatic odor and taste. After the mace has been removed, the nuts are dried, first in the sun, then over a fire until the kernel rattles in the shell when shaken. The latter is then broken, and the kernels, which are the nutmegs, extracted. These are dipped in lime and water to preserve them, and exported. The gathering of the fruit takes place at three periods, in July or August, when the nutmegs are most abundant, but the mace thinner; then in November, and the third harvest is in March or April, when the nuts as well as the mace are in perfection.

Statistics of Tobacco.

Mr. Trask addressed a circular to the Methodist General Conference, while in session at Boston, on the subject of Tobacco, calling attention to its statistics and its mischiefs. He says:—

We export tobacco to 22 nations or provinces of the earth; we import it from 21. The value of exports is $9,219,251. The value of imports (cigars only) $2,520,812. We cultivate tobacco in 28 of the States and Territories of the Union; the cultivation is on rapid increase. In 1851, we raised 199,522,494 pounds. National consumption, 100,000,000 pounds. Cost to the consumers, $20,000,000. New York city pays $10,000 a day for cigars; $8,500 for bread.

On the authority of Dr. Coles I would add, the American church annually expends $5,000,000 on this vile narcotic, and less than $1,000,000 on benevolent objects, or for the conversion of the world.

In 1840, we employed 1,500,000 men in the cultivation and manufacture of tobacco.

He then proceeds to point out the evils of using tobacco—as deleterious to the body, the mind, and the soul, and closes with a brief statement of the remedy.

The evil is great, what can be done? What can we do? We have the power—where the power is, there is the responsibility. 1. We can drop it ourselves, if we use it. 2. We can rule it out of our families, if used there. 3. We can act upon the church, and purify the sanctuary. 4. We can act upon the schools and towns where we reside. 5. We can use our individual influence in ways too numerous to specify.

Moreover, the use of tobacco is a social evil. It indirectly injures the church, and the body politic. Measures to banish it may take a social form. We can write and distribute Tracts—we can address public bodies; we can form societies, if thought best; we can bring the science, intellect, and principle of the church of Christ to bear down on this evil, and with the blessing of God, create an individual and public conscience which will banish this impure demon from the church and state.

Magnificent Railroad Enterprise.

Within a year or two past we have occasionally noticed the plan for a railroad from Chambery, in France, to Turin, the capital of Piedmont, traversing the Alps by a tunnel cut through Mount Cenis. As this is one of the most gigantic schemes yet devised by modern engineers, our readers will be interested in a more exact account of it, which we here give, derived from the report of M. Henri Maus, by whom the line has been surveyed for the Piedmontese Government.

Starting from Turin, the road will ascend the valley of a small stream called the Dora Riparia to Bardonneche, at the foot of the Alps. The mountain is here some 5,400 feet high, and the length of the tunnel will be nearly 6½ miles. The mountain will be perforated in a northerly direction, carrying the road through to Modane, on the Arc, a small stream which flows down into the Isere. M. Maus proposes to bore first a central gallery 14¾ feet wide and 7½ feet high, in order to prepare for cutting the complete tunnel, which will be 27 feet wide and 20¼ feet high. The boring will be done by machines at each end, driven by water-power, which is abundant from the many brooks that run down the mountain. The grade in the tunnel will have a descent from Bardonneche to Modane of 97 feet 8 inches to the mile, which may be overcome either by very heavy locomotives or by stationary power at each end, with endless drag ropes; if stationary power is used the brooks will afford it cheaply. The machines to be used for the boring are devised by M. Maus, and as experiments have proved, will suffice to complete the excavation in from 3½ to 5 years. When the mountain is entirely pierced the tunnel will ventilate itself, although the great depth of the rock above will not allow of perpendicular shafts; but while the excavation is going on, ventilation will be provided for by fan wheels driven by the belts and shafts that connect the boring machines with the power without. The entire cost of the tunnel, with a double track, M. Maus estimates at 13,772,000 francs, or $2,754,400; the whole road he estimates will cost 35,000,000 francs, or $7,000,000. The length of the present carriage road from Chambery to Turin is about 25 miles. [N. Y. Tribune.

Good Bread.

Mr. Weed writes to the Albany Evening Journal:—

"We could learn one lesson from Austria with great advantage to our people. This is the art of making good bread, which, being as it is here, universal, is really a great national blessing. We were struck first at Trieste with the fine quality of bread at our hotel. At all the eating-houses between Trieste and Vienna we remarked the excellence of the bread. Here we enjoy the same luxury. Nor is it a luxury for the rich alone. The same light, sweet bread is in all the bake-shops at prices which enable all classes to purchase. England has contrived, humanely, to give "cheap bread" to her people; but Austria affords it still cheaper and of an excellent quality. I do not know that this secret for making good bread can be communicated. Perhaps it is owing to some peculiarity in the flour, or in the water; but I do know that the art of making for the American people such bread as is eaten throughout Austria, would be an acquisition of incalculable value. A Vienna baker who should go to the City of New York and vend such bread as we get here, would be able to ride in his coach and reside on the Fifth-av. in two years. That is, providing the Yankee bakers did not find out his secret."

New Candidate for Fame.

A new claimant for posthumous fame has been brought to notice by T. D'Arcy McGee, editor of the Celt, now published at Buffalo. He states in his History of the Early Irish Settlers in America, that Christopher Colles, an Irishman, who arrived in this country about the time Fulton was born, delivered, in 1772, at Philadelphia, a series of lectures on the subject of Lock Navigation, and was the first person who suggested to the Government of this State, canals and improvements on the Ontario route. He was generally considered as a visionary projector, and his plans were sometimes treated with ridicule, and frequently viewed with distrust. In 1784, 1785, 1786, and for several successive years, he petitioned the Legislature of that State on the importance and practicability of uniting the western lakes to the Atlantic. He was, probably, the author of the letters signed "Hibernicus," on the same subject, which were published at New York about the beginning of this century. In 1774 he proposed to supply New York with water by aqueducts, such as now bring in the Croton, and of which he exhibited models at public lectures. During the last war he was "the projector and attendant of the telegraph erected on Castle Clinton." He died in obscurity and poverty, while others were growing famous and wealthy upon the stolen ideas of his failing intellect.

A Life Passed in Prison.

From the Baltimore Sun.

On a recent morning, a prisoner, named William Dunn, was released from the Penitentiary for the seventh time. It appears that he was first convicted of stealing, on the 16th of December, 1823, when but 13 years old, and sent to prison for 1 year. At the age of 16, (Nov. 22, 1826,) he was again convicted of stealing, under three indictments, for which he was imprisoned 6 years. At the age of 23, (Feb. 15, 1833,) he was convicted of stealing once more, and sent to the Penitentiary for 4 years. On the 6th of June, 1837—a few months after his release—he was convicted of stealing for the fourth time, and locked up for 2 years. On the 18th of February, 1842, (after having aired himself three years this time,) he was convicted of stealing for the fifth time, and ordered to be locked up until the 5th of April, 1847. On the 15th of October, 1847, (six months after his last release,) he was convicted of stealing for the sixth time, and sentenced to be cooped and caged till the 2d of April, 1850; and, on the 18th June, 1850, he was found guilty of being "a common rogue and vagabond," and ordered back to his old quarters for two years more, from which he was turned out for another airing on the 18th ult. Now, whether BILLY will keep himself uncaged this time till the dog days, is a matter of exceeding doubt, judging from his former propensities. It has been near twenty-nine years since he first entered the penitentiary, and fully twenty-five of the twenty-nine years have been spent by him in the jail and penitentiary together, and it may, therefore, be very properly said, that from the age of 13, BILLY'S home has been almost entirely in prison. A question to be determined is, whether this man is constitutionally a thief, or whether, from his fondness for his prison home, he only commits small thefts in order to get back again. For the gratification of the curious, we will state, that BILLY is a native of Baltimore city, is now 44 years of old, and represented himself as being addicted to intemperate habits. He is well behaved as a prisoner, and is an excellent weaver, and there is no doubt, if we had had a House of Refuge for his reception when he commiited his first offense, at the age of 13, he would have grown up an honest and industrious man."

Yankee Ingenuity.

A correspondent of the Scientific American describes an interesting method adopted by a Yankee of East Dorset, Vermont, of transporting timber from the Green Mountains. The gentleman referred to had contracted to furnish the Western Vermont Railroad with 32,000 ties and other timber. As the only place from which he could procure ties and timber was three miles distant from the railroad, on the top of the Green Mountains, in a place inaccessible by any feasible road, his friends and foes joined in predictions that it was impossible for him to fulfill the contract. He ascended through a narrow ravine to the mountain's top, and there gathered, in one vast pile, 32,000 ties and other timbers. Then the question arose with every one, by what means is all this to be conveyed to the railroad? Only a few weeks of summer weather is allowed to accomplish it in, and nothing but rocks and gullies intervene. Surely "necessity is the mother of invention." He goes to work and builds a small substantial spout or flume of long narrow plank, stretching from rock to rock down the mountain gorge. Here it rests on a rock, there high on the branches of a tree, and there again high in the air, it threads accross the valley, supported like telegraph wire. In four or five weeks the three miles are completed, all built in the most simple, cheap, and substantial manner. A small stream of water is turned into the flume, and twenty men go merrily to work dashing in the heavy ties and timbers; away they fly on the wings of the water over rocks and gulf, swifter than the wings of a dove. In four summer days that pile of 3300 tons of lumber is conveyed without cost from the Green Mountains, in Peru, to the railroad in Dorset.

The flume still stands, and the thousands of acres hitherto worthless, can now be cleared of lumber and fuel, and will make the fortune of the proprietor.

ETHERIZATION OF A LION.—A most novel operation was performed at South Boston, recently. Francis Alger, Esq., has in his possession, at his residence in South Boston, a lion about six months old, of the species known as the American lion, and brought a short time since from South America. The lion, as it has increased in size, has grown quite ferocious, and it was deemed advisable to remove his claws, which were very sharp, to prevent him from doing injury to those who might approach his cage. To accomplish this end, Dr. Charles T. Jackson administered ether to him. At first he was quite cross and snappish, and some difficulty was experienced in getting a sponge to his nose. At last, however, a soothing impression was made, and after a pound and a half had been administered, he became very docile, and slept quietly for twenty minutes. In the meantime his claws were removed with a pair of sharp pinchers, and when his lionship awoke from his trance, he found himself deprived of his most formidable weapons of defense. The lion soon recovered his wonted agility, and is now as lively as ever. It is probable that it will be necessary to cut off his teeth, before he will be considered a safe pet.

EMIGRANTS OVERLAND TO CALIFORNIA.—From an account kept at Fort Kearney, from the time the first emigrants passed until June 11, it appears that the follwing number of emigrants had passed on their way to California, viz: 16,362 men; 3,242 women; 4,266 children; 5,225 wagons; 6,538 horses; 4,606 mules; 1 hog; 59,392 cattle; 10,523 sheep; from 100 to 150 turkeys; 4 ducks and two Guinea fowl. Besides this number of living beings on the road, it is known that very many more were on the route North, those leading out from Council Bluffs and old Fort Kearney.

ANOTHER SHIP-RACE PROPOSED.—The Boston Atlas states that two or three Boston ship owners have sent a challenge to the ship owners of Great Britain, somewhat to the following effect:—

The Boston parties will produce a ship, not less than 800, nor over 1,200 tuns register, capable of stowing 50 per cent. over her register, to compete in speed with any vessel of the same capacity, now built, or which may hereafter be built in Great Britian. In other words, (the register limits specified above taken into consideration,) the object of the challenge is to decide which of the parties can obtain the highest rate of speed from the same cubic capacity of model, the winning party to receive £10,000. The length, breadth, &c., are left to the option of each party. A vessel of this model will be a fair medium between our clippers and packet ships, and be well adapted to the East India Trade. The proposed race is to be a voyage to China; but this, of course, may be modified or changed, according to circumstances.

THE TOMB OF GENERAL HARRISON.—The editor of the Cincinnati Nonpareil having visited North Bend, speaks thus of General Harrison's tomb: "On a recent visit to the tomb of Harrison, situated on one of the most beautiful sites in the Western country, at North Bend, we were pained at beholding the little attention bestowed upon the ground covering the last resting place of the old hero. The lot selected, in which are deposited the remains of 'Old Tippecanoe,' is enclosed around the base in a circular form, with board fence, roughly whitewashed. The long grass has all been trodden down, shrubbery broken, trees cut, and even the wooden door leading to the vault has been defaced and mutilated, while the rough bricks on each side of the mound have been loosened and scattered over the ground for yards around. The earth on the mound has been ploughed up, as though the hogs had been rooting there. The tomb, and all the once beautiful and enchanting scenery, have lost all their interest, and a visit to the spot is now any thing but pleasant. Thus expressing ourselves, we only echo the general feeling of all who have visited the burial place this Spring.

NARROW ESCAPES.—It will be remembered that the walls of the building occupied by the Buffalo Republic fell in a few days since, burying compositors and materials beneath the ruins. The Republic, in connection with an account of the affair, notices the following narrow escapes incurred by one individual: "During the last month, while engaged in adjusting the machinery of the power-press in the office of the Hudson Observer, Ohio, the engineer, not perceiving his position, turned on the steam. He was struck by a piston of the machinery, and by the merest chance was saved from being crushed to death. It so happened that he was on board the Forest City last Wednesday, when her larboard flue exploded, and was thrown a distance of thirty feet. He again escaped injury. The first day that he commenced working in our office, the roof fell upon him, and he was saved by being underneath the sky-light when the roof fell."

ORSON HYDE ON THE RAPPINGS.—Elder Orson Hyde, the Mormon prophet of these latter days, has favored the public by a statement of his views on "spiritual manifestations." He says, in a manifesto: "If all people will repent and be baptized in water for the remission of their sins, and be confirmed by the laying on of the hands of the Apostles of the Church of God, the rappers will cease their noise, and the Misses Foxes will go home, get married, guide their domestic household affairs, rear up families to honor their country and their God, neither of which or of whom will call upon them to leave their homes to encounter the opposition of the world, or expose their fair forms and features to the vulgar gaze, or to the rough passage of an itinerant life, and their finer feelings to the mortification to which their public career must subject them, if they possess that retiring modesty which is so ornamental to their sex."

GRAPE CULTURE IN THE UNITED STATES.—The first largely successful experiment at wine making in this country, was at Cincinnati; developed only a few years ago, chiefly under the auspices of Mr. Nicholas Longworth, an old and wealthy citizen of Ohio, and enthusiastically devoted to the grape culture. It has now grown into a business of public importance and large private profit. There are 1200 acres in cultivation, within a circuit of a few miles round Cincinnati. The annual produce is now about a million and a half of bottles of pure native wines, equal to the finest Hocks, Champagnes, and Red Wines of Germany and France. Mr. Longwoith's Catawba Champagne is the most generally known at the East, of the Cincinnati vintage. Its popularity has so steadily increased as to create a demand much beyond the ability of Mr. L. to supply.

THE BIRTHPLACE OF GREAT MEN.—Gen. Lewis Cass was born in the town of Exeter, New Hampshire. Daniel Webster was born in the town now called Franklin, formerly Salisbury, in Merrimack county, N. H. D. S. Dickinson, of New York, was born in Merrimack county, as well as John A. Dix. Gen. Franklin Pierce is a native of Hillsboro', Hillsboro' county, and is a lineal descendant of the family of Percys and the Duke of Northumberland, the title being now extinct. Judge Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, was also born in New Hampshire, but shortly after his birth his father removed to Vermont, where, as is well known, the representative of "Young America" learned a cabinet maker's trade.

THINNESS OF A SOAP BUBBLE.—A soap bubble, as it floats in the light of the sun, reflects to the eye an endless variety of the most gorgeous tints of color. Newton showed that to each of these tints corresponds a certain thickness of the substance forming the bubble; in fact, he showed in general, that all transparent substances, when reduced to a certain degree of tenuity, would reflect these colors. Near the highest point of the bubble, just before it bursts, is always observed a spot which reflects no color, and appears black. Newton showed that the thickness of the bubble at this black point was the 2,500,000th part of an inch! Now, as the bubbles at this point possesses the properties of water as essentially as does the Atlantic Ocean, it follows that the ultimate molecules forming water must have less dimensions than this thickness.

FAMILY RELIGION.

A Report prepared for, adopted by, and published at the request of the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association.

The Committee appointed to present a "Report on Family Religion," in casting about for the boundaries of their duty—as they cannot be persuaded that the motion by which they were appointed was passed on the assumption, or even with the admission, that we are to look to the family for a religion peculiar to that relation—conclude that any thing relating to the proper development of the Religion of Jesus Christ in the Domestic Circle, or the evils that legitimately follow a neglect of its cultivation in that department of life, will lie within the limits of the field assigned them.

Though religion, as exhibited in the Gospel, presents a combination of beauty, harmony, glory, and power, sufficient to command the admiration of the universe, the display of which would constitute an exhibition worthy of so vast an assemblage, yet it is evident, that God was actuated by a higher motive, in elaborating its essential elements, and so adjusting and combining them as to bring the whole into operation. That motive is stated by Christ himself, when he says, that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Without the operation of this system, of which this inestimable gift is a part, the inevitable fate of the human family must have been to perish; and religion is doing the great and glorious work to which it is ordained, when it is transforming poor, polluted, perishing sinners, into the likeness of Christ, and making them heirs of an "inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away."

Though the work of regeneration is entrusted alone to the Holy Spirit, that arrangement by which the disciples of Christ are constituted instruments in the conversion of souls, is a conspicuous vindication of the wisdom and beneficence of God. It seems exceedingly fit, that those whose feet have been taken from "the horrible pit and miry clay," should be sent on an errand of expostulation to those whose "steps take hold on death."

God has sanctified a variety of relations or offices among men to, and instituted others for, the purpose of promulgating the principles of religion, and bringing their beneficent operation to bear upon the hearts and consciences of those who are exposed to death. These offices have been appropriated or constituted at such periods in the lapse of time and progress of human society, as marked their adaptation and necessity. The light afforded by the Scriptures upon this subject renders it evident, that the very first appropriation of office to this work was that of the Head of the Family. Thus, we see Abel acceptably officiating in behalf of himself and his family in the offering of "the firstlings of his flock" to God. Indeed, during the whole antediluvian age, this seems to have been almost exclusively the means of expounding religion and leading in its ceremonies. Noah is said to have been a preacher of righteousness—an expression which might justify the inference that he publicly expounded the principles of righteousness; but the history of that time shows that, with all his preaching, none were impressed with the importance of his mission but the members of his own family; and the strong presumption is, that his influence over them was not so much the result of his public preaching, as of that private instruction which he had bestowed upon them from their childhood. The propriety of this arrangement is explained in the fact, that the social element in our nature was first developed in the family. In that early age of the world and crude state of society, people associated together, mainly, by families. Hence children, having been instructed in religion by their parents, as families gathered around them, in their turn became teachers.

The addition of other offices for communicating religious istruction does not seem to have been made on account of a want of adaptation of this to the object in view, but simply because the change in the aspect of human society afforded opportunity for them to be useful. Nor does it appear, that the subsequent supply of all these other provisons for promoting piety at all abated the responsibility of parents and heads of families in this respect. The expression, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it," (Prov. xxii. 6,) made long after the establishment of the Jewish Priesthood and Church, shows that this ancient obligation was unabated at this time; and the language of the Apostle, "Ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath, but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," (Eph. vi. 4,) shows that since the full establishment of the Gospel Ministry and Church it remains in full force.

Observation has shown many, to their deep sorrow, and will show any who are willing to direct their attention to the subject, that the faithful performance of this duty of Christian parents and guardians cannot now be neglected without the most disastrous results. If the faithful Pastor meets with difficulty in his efforts to secure the respect, the confidence, or the attention of the precious youth of his charge, or if his heart is wrung with the development of juvenile criminality in the neighborhood, it will generally be in the case of those children who do not have proper religious instruction at home. If the solemnities of the house and worship of God are disturbed by audible talking and laughter without, and the careless tramp of feet, the exhibition of grotesque movements, or the exchange of significant glances within, the offenders can generally be traced to families where religious instruction is neglected. Mark the lad who indulges in taking the name of God in vain, and his home will often exhibit boards for checkers or chess, or miniature cannon, or other means of dissipation, but no family altar. Notice the Miss, who, in the house of God, tosses her head with affected airs; deliberately passes upon the fashion, the fit, and the quality of every dress; and has an ear for every sound but that of the voice of instruction. Follow her to her home. You may find the wardrobe hung or piled with gewgaws; the parlor, perhaps, is furnished with a piano; the center table, likely enough, is strung with trashy and corrupting works of fiction; but there is no clasped Bible, bearing, within, her own name, and a mother's prayer for God's blessing upon its thorough search, and the stainless track of a chrystal tear that fell unbidden from that mother's cheek, as her hand wrought the inscription, and her heart throbbed with solicitude for the salvation of her child.

The consequences of neglect in this respect, have come home upon us, as a people, with fearful weight. Whence came that multitude, who, overcome by the attractions of business or matrimonial alliance, or by a shame of their own singularity, have forsaken the "Sabbath of the Lord our God?" The answer is, from those families around whose hearth the light of religious instruction did not shine in the time of their chilhood and youth. There is, perhaps, scarcely a society amongst us, that has not, in this way, to a greater or less extent, been made the sport, not of overpowering conscientious conviction, but of contending interest. And the picture is still more startling, when we look at the descendants of those families who have placed themselves in an isolated position. Were these scattered prodigals at once transformed into faithful and efficient advocates of the truth, which they have repudiated for the want of that deep impression of it on the heart which is the result of early faithful parental training, there would be scarcely a locality in our wide-spreading country where their voice would not be heard. Indeed, places are known, where, if those who have abandoned the Sabbath, with their descendants, should return to its observance, the effect would be to almost revolutionize the society.

Again: Whence came those, in the church, who have their fallacious notions, of which no argument or truth can relieve them?—notions which not only render them unfit for any useful service, but form unsightly excrescences upon their religious character—excrescences upon which they are liable to receive many a painful thump, and with which they are liable to graze many of the tender interests of religion? Whence came those who are most frequently objects of distressing solicitude to the church, and subjects of discipline in it—who, when involved in difficulty, most obstinately resist efforts for its adjustment? And those whose sordid dispositions are a constant weight on the benevolent operations of the church, extending even to the support of the Gospel at home? And those who, by a loose walk and a groveling conversation, are most frequently heaping reproach upon the religion which they profess? The answer is, they came from domicils unused to echo the voice of prayer and religious instruction.

These evils, and many others equally hurtful to the interests of religion, are of frequent occurrence, even where abundant provision is made for the public exercises of instruction and worship; but they rarely implicate those who have been the subjects of proper religious training at home.

This arrangement for communicating religious instruction was laid too deep in that consummate wisdom which wrought out the whole plan of salvation, to be superseded by any other. The completeness of its adaptation to the work of impressing upon the mind the truths of religion, and of leading the soul to God, is a sufficient vindication of this proposition; to show which is the next thing in order.

1. All those arguments which tend to show the importance of an early commencement of religious instruction with children, with an unerring aim, indicate parents as its Heaven-appointed agents. Who is so favorably situated to seize these advantages for successful effort? The first years of their children's existence are spent almost exclusively in their society; and they are continually making impressions upon their minds, even without an effort. Is it reasonable to suppose, that such an opportunity to give direction to their minds came without design? Or that it is attended with no responsibility? These are questions which it would be proper for Christian parents seriously to ponder.

That it is of the utmost importance to the success of religious instruction that it be commenced while the subject of it is young, appears—

(1.) From the fact that the mind in infancy is comparatively blank, and, like an unsullied sheet, in a favorable condition to receive the desired impression. Later in life there are apt to be other impressions fixed there, the removal of which is essential to the distinctness of those which it is desirable to make. The loss in waiting is sometimes almost or quite irreparable, on account of the tenacity with which corrupt impressions adhere to the mind. Even under the most rigorous application of self-discipline, propelled by a truly Christian spirit, it has been found impossible to entirely eradicate them. It has been a cause of regret, which many good people have carried through life, that their minds are often the runways for thoughts that have their origin in early corrupt impression, made there by the presentation of ideas, which they had not been prepared, by earlier religious training, to repulse with disgust—impressions which they have tried in vain to obliterate.

(2.) The young mind, besides the negative or blank state so favorable to distinct impressions, almost invariably exhibits a positive thirst for those materials which are calculated to produce them. Let not those parents who are postponing their religious instructions for their children to "get old enough to be benefited by them," think that their minds will wait their tardy movements. The appetite that is denied the means of gratification at home, will seek it abroad; and the child that goes forth, prompted by its clamorous cravings, is as indifferent as to what it carries to the heart, as it was in infancy as to what it carried to the mouth. The motto, "First come, first served," was never more forcibly exemplified, than in the operations of the juvenile mind. Oh! how lamentable, that so many Christian parents should neglect, often fatally neglect, to supply these early but indiscriminate cravings with the cooling water of life, and leave them to be aggravated by quaffing the exuding ichor of moral turpitude. This is not an imaginary evil, but a living, veritable fact, occurring with appalling frequency.

(4.) Finally, this process should be commenced with children while they are young, because that is the only time at which it can be commenced with any degree of certainty that it will prove successful. For, teachable and impressible as they are in early life, they are very liable, subsequently, to become otherwise. However exclusively they may, at first, be under the influence of those who are responsible for their instruction, if it is neglected, they will most assuredly go beyond its reach. No tongue is sufficient to tell the agony of many parents, who, having neglected the religious interests of their children through all the years of their trustfulness and impressibility, when, on warning them of impending danger, they discover that they have gone immeasurably beyond the reach of their expostulations. Sometimes the reflex influence of this neglect, when it proves fatal to its object, is still more appalling—proceeding so far as to shake a faith which had withstood every other test. A thrilling illustration of this occurred in the case of a worthy Deacon, who has recently been called to his account. He had a numerous family of children, a number of whom had embarked for themselves upon the voyage of life, without the anchor of Christian hope; and, perhaps, it was their father's worst fault, that he had not, from their childhood, pursued a course of religious instruction, sufficiently searching and faithful to lead them to appreciate its value; though in his house there was an altar, around which, after the reading of a portion of Scripture, the family daily kneeled, while he offered upon it a prayer to God. Among the children who had reached their majority, was a promising son, who had just become established in business; and in the prospect that flattered his father, the hope that he would, some time, become a Christian, was no small item. But he was attacked with a fatal sickness. In vain the best medical skill within reach was called. His father watched, with anxious solicitude, the progress of the disease, but to see him sink, and die, without an abatement of the delirium which had deprived him of reason at an early stage. The father grieved at the sight of young life suddenly extinguished—that the family circle had been invaded, and one of its number had fallen; but, at the thought that his son was lost, lost forever, he was inconsolable. The legions of agony and unreconciliation charged upon him; he fled before them to seek a refuge, until he stood upon the threshold of that enchanted castle, upon whose front is emblazoned the sentiment, "All men will finally be holy and happy." But, fortunately, the hand that had chastened followed him to that dangerous retreat, and kindly led him back to the strong-hold of safety.

2. The adaptation of this instrumentality to the object in view, is pointed out by the certainty with which children, at first, go to their parents for the solution of every perplexing question. Few have failed to notice this tendency, or escaped difficulty in preserving their equanimity, when subjected to the ordeal of the oddity and originality of these queries, and the frankness and confidence with which they are stated. This course in children is as natural as it is for them to look to the same source for bread; and gives to parents almost an entire monopoly, both of the development and supply of inquiry; and if they as forcibly felt their responsibility in the one case as they do in the other, it would result in as faithful effort to supply their offspring with religious instruction as is generally made to supply them with earthly sustenance. Who can doubt that such a state of things would do more to diminish the number of those who die in impenitence, than all the more public means of grace, directed, as they mainly are, to the reformation of people of adult age?

3. All those feelings of tenderness, solicitude, and love, which parents cherish for their children, with equal certainty mark this relation as one affording incalculable encouragement of success. It is evident that whoever would be successful in winning souls to Christ, must make them objects upon which all these feelings center. But who is capable of such yearnings of soul for famishing sinners, as those who have watched over them from their infancy, and been sympathizing sharers of their every sorrow? [Remainder next week.

PRAYER.

BY A PATIENT IN HANWELL LUNATIC ASYLUM.

O thou! the God of light and life,
Protect me with thy arm,
For all is dark within my soul,
Disquiet and alarm.

Why is it thus, my God, that I
So desolate should be?
Thy sun that shines on others seems
To have no ray for me.

Why still on me thy chastening hand
This instant dost thou lay?
Why thus my lovers and my friends
Removest thou away?

The eyes of those are closed in death
Who erst my cares beguiled;
Thou took'st not one but both away,
The mother and the child.

I had no other father, Lord,
In youth but only thee,
And, till I sinned, I own thou wert
Most bountiful to me;

And now that I am penitent,
And worn with grief and care,
O! leave me not without thine aid,
Nor leave me to despair.

THE GOLD SOVEREIGN.

The story of the gold sovereign, related to me by Judge N., a gentleman of wealth and influence in western New York, is well worth repeating—not for artificial interest, which it does not contain—but for the admirable lesson it conveys to young persons commencing life.

When I was only eight years old, said Judge N., my father and my mother being poor, with half a dozen children better than myself to take care of, I was given to a farmer in the town of F., who designed making a plow-boy of me, and keeping me in his service until I was of age.

Well, I had not a very gay time in Deacon Webb's service; for although he was an honest deacon, and a tolerable kind man in his family, he believed in making boys work, and understood how to avoid spoiling them by indulgence.

So I had plenty of work to do, and an abundant lack of indulgences to enjoy. It was consequently a great treat for me to get the enormous sum of one or two pennies into my possession, by any sort of good fortune—a circumstance of such rare occurrence, that at the age of eleven I had learned to regard money as a blessing bestowed by Providence only on a favored few.

Well, I had lived with Deacon Webb three years before I knew the color of any coin except vile copper. By an accident I learned the color of gold. That is the story I am going to tell you.

One Saturday night Mr. Webb sent me to the village store on some errand; and on returning home, just about dusk, my attention was attracted by a little brown package, lying on the road side.

I picked it up to examine its contents, without the least suspicion of the treasure within. Indeed, it was so light, and the volume of brown paper appeared so large, that I undoubtedly suspected that I was the victim of an April Fool, although it was the month of June. I tore open the folds of the paper, however; and, discerning nothing, I was on the point of throwing it into the ditch, when something dropped out of it and fell with a ringing sound upon a stone.

I looked at it in astonishment. It was yellow, round, glittering, too bright and too small for a penny. I felt of it, I squeezed it in my fingers, I spelled out the inscription; then something whispered to me that it was a gold coin of incalculable value, and that if I did not wish to lose it, I had better pocket it as soon as possible.

Trembling with excitement, I put the coin in my pocket. But it would not stay there. Every two minutes I had to take it out and look at it. But whenever I met somebody, I was careful to put it out of sight. Somehow, I felt a guilty dread of finding an owner to the coin. Provided I found none, I thought it was honestly mine, by right of discovery; and I comforted myself with the sophistry that it was not my business to go about the streets crying, "Who's lost?"

I went home with the gold in my pocket—I would not have had the deacon's folks know what I had found for the world. I was sorely troubled with the fear of losing my vast and incalculable treasure. This was not all. It seemed to me that my face betrayed my secret. I could not look at any body with an honest eye.

These troubles kept me awake half the night, and projects for securing my treasure by a safe investment, the other half. On the following morning I was feverish and nervous. When Deacon Webb, at the breakfast table, said,

"William!"

I started and trembled, thinking the next words would be—

"Where is that piece of gold you have found and wickedly concealed, to keep it from the rightful owner?"

But he only said,

"I want you to go to Mr. Baldwin's this morning, and ask him if he can come and work for me to-day and to-morrow."

I felt immensely relieved. I left the house and got out of sight as soon as possible. Then, once more, I took the coin out of my pocket, and feasted on its beauty. Yet I was unhappy. Consciousness of wrong troubled me, and I almost wished I had not found the sovereign. Would I not be called a thief, if discovered? I asked myself. Was it not as wrong to conceal what I had found as to take the same amount originally from the owner's pocket? Was he not defrauded the same?

But then I said to myself—

Why, if I don't know who the loser is, how can I give him his money? It is only because I am afraid Deacon Webb will take it away from me, that I conceal it; that's all. I would not steal gold; and if the loser should ask me for it, I would give it to him. I apologized thus to myself all the way to Mr. Baldwin's house, but after all it wouldn't do. The gold was like a heavy stone bound to my heart. It was a sort of unhappy charm, which gave an evil spirit power to torment me. And I could not help thinking that I was not half so well pleased with my immense riches as I had been with a rusty copper which I had found some weeks before. Nobody claimed the penny, although I kept my good fortune no secret; and I had been happy as a king, or as a king is commonly supposed to be.

Mr. Baldwin was not at home, and I returned to the deacon's house. I saw Mr. Wardley's horse standing at the gate, and I was terribly frightened. Mr. Wardley was a constable, and I thought he had come to take me to jail. So I hid in the garden until he went away. By that time reason began to prevail over cowardice, and I made my appearance at the house. The deacon looked angrily at me.

Now, thought I, feeling faint, he's going to accuse me of finding the gold.

But he only scolded me for being so long about my errand. I never received a reprimand so willingly. His severe words sounded sweet, I had expected something so much more terrible.

I worked all day with the gold in my pocket. I wonder Deacon Webb did not suspect something, I stopped so often to see if the gold was really there; for much as the possession of it troubled me, the fear of losing it troubled me scarcely less. I was miserable. I wished a hundred times I had not found the gold. I felt that it would be a relief to lay it down on the road side; again I wrapped it in brown paper just as I had found it. I wondered if ill-got wealth made every body so miserable.

At night I was sent again to Mr. Baldwin's, and having found him, obtained his promise to work at Deacon Webb's on the following day.

It was dark when I went home, and I was afraid of robbers. I never felt so cowardly in my life. It seemed to me that any body could rob me with a clear conscience, because my treasure was not mine. I got home, and went trembling to bed.

Mr. Baldwin came early to breakfast with us. I should tell you something about him. He was an honest, poor man, who supported a large family by hard work. Every body liked him, he was so industrious and faithful; and besides making good wages for his labor, he often got presents of meal and flour from those who employed him.

Well, at the breakfast table, after Deacon Webb had asked the blessing, and given Baldwin a piece of pork, so that he might eat, and go to work as soon as possible, something was said about the "news."

"I suppose you have heard about my misfortune," said Mr. Baldwin.

"Your misfortune?"

"Yes."

"Why, what has happened to you?" asked the Deacon.

"I thought every body had heard of it," replied Baldwin. "You see, the other night when Mr. Woodly paid me, he gave me a gold piece."

I started, and felt the blood forsake my cheeks. All eyes were fixed upon Baldwin, however, so my trouble was not observed.

"A sovereign," said Baldwin, "the first one I ever had in my life; and it seemed to me that if I should put it in my pocket, like a cent, or a half-dollar, I should lose it. So, like a goose, I wrapped it in a piece of paper, and stowed it in my coat pocket, where I thought it was safe. I never did a more foolish thing. I must have lost the coin taking out my handkerchief; and the paper would prevent its making any noise as it fell. I discovered my loss when I got home, and went back to look for it; but some body must have picked it up."

"Who could be so dishonest as to keep it?" asked the deacon.

I felt like sinking thorough the floor.

"I don't know," replied the poor man, shaking his head sadly, "he's welcome to it, whoever he is; and I hope his conscience won't trouble him more than the money is worth; though Heaven knows I want my honest earnings."

This was too much for me. The allusion to my conscience brought the gold out of my pocket. I resolved to make a clean breast of it, and be honest in spite of poverty and shame. So I held the gold in my trembling hand, and said—

"Is this yours, Mr. Baldwin?"

My voice was so faint that he did not hear me. So I repeated my question in a more courageous tone. All eyes were turned upon me in astonishment; and the deacon demanded where and when I had found the gold.

I burst into tears, and confessed every thing. I expected the deacon would whip me to death. But he patted my head, and said more kindly than was his wont—

"Don't cry about it, William. You are an honest boy, if you did come near falling into temptation. Always be honest, my son; and if you do not grow rich, you will be happy with a clear conscience."

But I cried still—for joy. I laughed, too, the deacon had so touched my heart. Of what a load was I relieved! I felt then that honesty was the best policy.

As for Baldwin, he declared that I should have the money for finding it; but I wished to keep clear of the troublesome stuff for a time, and I did—I would not touch his offer; and I never regretted it, boy as I was.

Well, I was the deacon's favorite after this. He was very kind to me, and trusted me in every thing. I was careful not to deceive him; I preserved the strictest candor and good faith; and that has made me what I am. When he died, he willed me five hundred dollars, with which I came here and bought new lands, which are now worth a great many sovereigns. But this has nothing to do with my story. That is told; and all I have to add is, I have never regretted clearing my conscience of Poor Job Baldwin's sovereign.

JEW AND CATHOLIC MARRIED.—A young Jew, in Paris, wished to be married some weeks since, to a young girl of the Catholic religion. The young lady applied to her pastor, who said he could not bless the marriage of a Jew. The pastor referred her to the Archbishop of Paris, who referred her to the Court of Rome. The Pope refused to authorize the marriage. They then turned to the other side. For want of a Catholic blessing on their marriage, the lady consented to receive that of the Jew. They applied to the Grand Rabbi; but he was not less exclusive than the Pope, and refused to bless the marriage of a Catholic. The Pope refused to bless the Jew; the Rabbi refused to marry the Christian; the young people were either prevented from marrying, or were to be married without a benediction. The uncle of the young bridegroom advised them, as the last resource, to address themselves to one of his colleagues, a Protestant pastor. M. Coquerel replied that he had in his heart prayers for the whole world, and, above all, for those who wish for them. So the young people were married. [English paper.

DECISION.

More than forty years ago, a young man was preceptor of Bradford Academy, who had just become interested in religion. He was invited to a social party to spend the evening. After tea the tables were prepared for card playing. This young man was very much tried when he saw this preparation. Several of the company were young ladies who were members of his school, and he felt a responsibility respecting the influence which he should exert upon them. He made up his mind that he would not engage in the amusement, and retired to another room. The young ladies asked, "Where is the preceptor?" They all gathered around him and entreated him to join them in card playing. He told them that he could not, and gave them his reasons. This afforded him an opportunity to enter into a free conversation on the subject of personal religion.

Among the young ladies present that evening was Harriet Atwood, who was afterwards Harriet Newell, of the first company of missionaries who went from this country. The faithful conversation of that young man resulted in her conversion. Through the blessing of God, an entire revolution was wrought in her feelings and purposes. She devoted herself to preaching the gospel to the heathen. She had it in her heart to do this work, but lived only to come in sight of heathen lands. Her memoir, prepared and published by Dr. Woods, has done a great work. She being dead, yet speaketh. Hundreds have been baptized into her name as well as imbued with her spirit. Her example will live, and continue to exert an influence, until earth's remotest nations shall have learned Messiah's name.

The young man who took this stand has been a successful pastor in New Hampshire more than forty years. The good accomplished by the decided stand which he took that night will never be fully understood until the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed. How important that Christians be decided! [Rec.

REMEMBERED EIGHTY-FIVE YEARS.

Luke Short, when about fifteen years of age, heard a sermon from the celebrated Flavel, and soon after went to America, where he spent the remainder of his life. He received no immediate impression from Flavel's sermon, and lived in carelessness and sin till he was a century in age. He was now a "sinner a hundred years old;" and, to all appearance, ready to "die accursed." But, sitting one day in a field, he fell into a busy reflection on his past life; and recurring to the events of his youth, he thought of having heard Mr. Flavel preach, and vividly recollected a large portion of his sermon, and the extraordinary earnestness with which it was delivered. Starting as if stung by an adder, he instantly labored under accusings of conscience, and ran from thought to thought till he arrived first at conviction of sin, and next to an apprehension of the Divine method of saving the guilty. He soon after joined a Congregational church in his vicinity, and to the day of his death, which happened in the one hundred and sixteenth year of his age, gave satisfactory evidence of being a truly converted and believing follower of the Saviour. Mr. Flavel had long before passed to his heavenly rest, and could not, while on earth, have supposed that his living voice would so long continue to yield its echoes as an instrument of doing good to a wandering sinner. Let ministers and private Christians, who labor for the spiritual well-being of their fellow-men, cast their bread upon the waters, in full faith that though they lose sight of it themselves, it shall be found after many days. THE HUNTER'S CONVERSION.

The Rev. Peter Conrad, a missionary of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, in Wisconsin, reports an interesting incident. During a severe rain storm, he heard a knock at his door. On opening it a man entered, who was from the head waters of the Kickapoo river, distant fifty or sixty miles. He was in the full garb of a hunter, dressed in deer skin, with fringe of the same on the seams and borders of his coat. Around his waist was a belt, and attached to this his hunter's knife in a sheath. Requesting a conversation with the missionary, he was invited into his study, where, with tears in his eyes, he acknowledged his errand—to inquire what he should do to be saved. The missionary soon perceived that the work on his heart was the work of the Holy Spirit, and that he was not far from the kingdom of God. Two days afterwards, with the burden of sin still on his heart, he went out into the woods and earnestly sought the blessing of forgiveness, and returned to the missionary's house, declaring with tears of gushing joy, that he had found Jesus Christ to be his friend. He remained for a time with the missionary, giving evidence of a real work of grace on his heart, and in conformity with his wishes was to be baptized before returning to his camp and companions in the deep forest. "This," said the missionary, "is the Lord's doing."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, July 15, 1852.

STATE OF THE DENOMINATION.

It is a solemn thought, that "judgment must begin at the house of God." What the end will be of those who compose the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, when the judgment shall have passed, it may not be easy to say; but no one, we presume, will accuse us of uncharitableness, if we say, they will "scarcely be saved." 1 Pet. 4: 17, 18.

The same inspired writer who teaches that the righteous will scarcely be saved, also informs us of a way in which we may have an entrance ministered to us abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of Jesus Christ. 2 Pet. 1: 11. It would seem, however, as if the most of us thought it quite enough to be saved "so as by fire." 1 Cor. 3: 15. But what if the fire consume us, ere the hand of mercy snatch us as a brand from the burning? Let those who are content to have just religion enough to get to heaven, think of this.

Three of our Associations have now passed their anniversaries for the present year; and what do we learn, from their statistics, of the state of the denomination? Alas! alas! We are progressing, but not in that which would be the life of the churches. We are advancing, but not in the work of subduing the world to Christ. We are "rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing." Probably, there never was a time, when we enjoyed greater prosperity in this world's good. But for all that, we are "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." Worldly-mindedness has eaten up our piety. With here and there an exception, our churches have diminished in numbers, instances of backsliding have multiplied, family religion is deplorably neglected, the power of the ministry is waxing feeble, and there seems to be a prospect, that God is about to send upon us that worst of all curses, "a famine, not of bread, nor of water, but of hearing the words of the Lord."

One of our ministering brethren, who has labored long and usefully, in a communication which, we suppose, was not intended for the public eye, expresses himself with much feeling on this point, and very appropriately. He will excuse the liberty we take in publishing a part of his letter. Our readers will ponder the solemn facts upon which he dwells, and ask whether it is not time to clothe ourselves in sackcloth, and beseech God to take away our reproach. T. B. B.

"I feel exceedingly distressed. There are several stand-points from which, for a long time, I have been trying to take observations, which should neither exalt our position unduly, nor unjustly depress it. And the result of these observations has been to greatly distress me.

"First, let us look, for one moment, into the condition of things as it respects the ministry. Our number is exceeding small. This itself is a circumstance of weakness, which is truly discouraging, when we consider the amount of labor demanded at our hands. Then, what a large proportion even of these are barely supporting a nominal existence. They have a name to live, but how feeble and inefficient are they. Of the number that are somewhat active, how many are crippled for the want of education, and that thorough mental training which is requisite for the development of one's self, and for extensive usefulness in this age of gigantic intellectual strife. But, farther, how dismal the fact that some, who have been reckoned among our most useful and successful ministers, are now, by the decisions of our ecclesiastical bodies, deposed or suspended—justly threatened with the ban of excommunication. O, 'how is the gold become dim, and the most fine gold changed!' This is sad. Our candidates for the ministry, too, where are they? Indeed, have we any? Our young men of talent are turning their attention in other directions. For some cause, few hear and reply to the voice of the Lord calling to this work, 'Here am I, send me.' Either their hearts are not sufficiently imbued with the love of souls, or spiritual weakness, or some other cause, holds them back. This is to me a source of great anxiety; and whatever the cause of this delinquency may be, I would that it might be sought out, and remedied.

"Again, look at our churches. Now, it does not satisfy me, to say that 'it is a general time of backsliding and apostasy.' I take no comfort in that thought. Look, I say, at our churches. Several of the strongest of them are bound, hand and foot, by dissensions and internal broils—strong and leading brethren arrayed against each other—and this too in the kingdom of peace! In some instances, even church is arrayed against church, and others so far sympathizing with these that they are but little better off. What a sin and burning shame is this! Other churches are affected with a disease little less to be dreaded —lukewarmness. A death-spell seems to have come over us; and so deep is this sleep, that even the thunders of Sinai do not disturb them! Or, if aroused somewhat, they immediately sink again to slumber, with the sluggards song upon their lips, 'A little more sleep'—'a little more slumber.' Hence, we have no revivals, or but comparatively few. Backsliders and apostates increase upon our hands, while sinners grow bold, and scoff at Zion and her King. Our sons and daughters, our pride, and the hope of the church, and strength of the state, are drinking in scepticism and infidelity, are becoming wanton, and refuse restraint. As for the counsels of the Almighty, they despise them; and as for his reproofs, they will not bear them. As for the gospel, they are not sensible that they need it, for they know not that they are diseased. Their depravity is so deeply intrenched in their natures, that its presence is not seen.

"Finally, our Home and Foreign Missions need replenishing and extending. But where are our materials for the work? We are limited and circumscribed, on the right hand and on the left. We have neither the men nor the means to accomplish the purposes contemplated.

"Now, I am satisfied that this imperfect and defective sketch is not in any particular overdrawn. If so, what shall we do? Shall we give up and die? O for faith in God!—for strong faith! I feel that I need this faith —faith mixed with ardent, undying love!—that can remove mountains—that finds its anchorage in the throne of the Eternal."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Oxford University—Education in England and Scotland—Achilli and Newman.

GLASGOW, June 25, 1852.

The Report of the Commission appointed to examine into the affairs of the University of Oxford, has at length been published. It consists of 800 folio pages, two thirds being occupied with documents and evidence. It proposes important alterations. The Commissioners are for abolishing the existing monopoly of the Colleges and Halls of the University, by allowing students to reside in Oxford without the expense of connection with those bodies. In regard to the Colleges, they urge the immediate necessity of opening the fellowships and scholarships, the number and value of the scholarships being at the same time increased. They suggest numerous alterations for improving the Government of the University, for the supervision of studies, the appointment of examiners, and the management of its public libraries. They however propose that celibacy should still continue to be a necessary condition for holding fellowships, with certain specified exceptions. Some professorships they would suppress, while they would also create new ones, and amalgamate others—the professors being distributed into four boards for the regulation of study:—1. Theology; 2. Mental Philosophy and Philology; 3. Jurisprudence and History; 4. Mathematical and Physical Science. Professors and Lecturers they would allow to receive fees, while college revenues should to a certain extent be also made available for the education of the University. All oaths imposed by college statutes, and all declaration against change in statutes, they would prohibit. Such alterations will not be carried into effect without much opposition from those interested in the continuance of affairs as they are.

The subject of Education excites deep interest, and is becoming more and more perplexed, in this country. An enmity at all religious instruction in the schools, by those who are open or concealed infidels, together with the discussions among Christians as to the nature of the religious instruction to be communicated, form serious difficulties in the way of Government. A year ago, the House of Commons voted £150,000 as the year's estimate, for Great Britain, of expenditure on this head — having advanced, in successive years, the grant from £20,000, the amount voted twenty years ago. The Prime Minister, Lord John Russell, then stated the principle of the Government to be, that instruction should not be divorced from religion, and yet that no child taught at any school favored or supported by the State, should be compelled to attend any religious instruction to which his parents conscientiously object. This, fair as it seems, is disliked by some; and in the early part of the present year, Mr. W. J. Fox moved for a Select Committee of the Commons to inquire into the state of the education of the people. His motion was rejected; and under the present Derby Ministry the annual vote was passed without modification. Since then, however, a Minute of the Committee of Privy Council, giving increased authority to the Episcopal Clergy and Bishops in the selection of the books, and religious principles of the teachers, has occasioned much apprehension and blame. Even the Evangelical party of the Establishment, as they are called, are so alarmed at the prospect thereby presented, as to be speaking of establishing separate schools. Government having, however, been severely taken to task in Parliament for concealing their purpose until after the estimates were passed, they have intimated that no action shall be taken on that Minute, until the Commons, being asked for the next grant, shall have opportunity of expressing formally their opinion.

In Scotland, the same question, and from the same causes, is alike perplexed. The parish schools are now regarded by Dissenters with more than former dissatisfaction, and the increase in the number of the Dissenters is giving them more influence in opposition to established institutions and usages, that were formerly not only respected, but even venerated. Lord Melgund introduced into the Commons a bill which would have considerably affected the existing power of the Established Church in regard to the schools—which, however, was rejected by a majority of 137 against 124. The Scottish Universities were also intended to be hand-maidens to the Established Church; and Tests are required to be taken by the several Professors appointed to the respective chairs. These were imposed in 1690, and require conformity to its doctrines and government. The growth of Dissent, among teachers, as well as among those whose children are to be taught, has caused this to be felt irksome; and last year, Mr. Cowan, (a Free Church man,) one of the M. P.s for Edinburgh, introduced a Bill for the abolition of these tests as regarded the Professors elected to chairs of Literature, Science, and Philosophy (without affecting that for Divinity.) This Bill was largely petitioned for by the towns and Town Councils—including those of Glasgow and Edinburgh. It was, however, rejected in the House of Commons; although by a majority of only 66 against 65, Sir G. Grey, a member of the then Government, having both spoken and voted in its favor.

In the present session of Parliament, the Lord Advocate for Scotland intimated his intention to move for a Committee of the whole House of Commons to consider the same subject; and Lord Melgund gave notice of a motion to insert a clause extending the provision to the tests taken by parochial schoolmasters. In the discussion on the 16th of February, reference was made to the notorious fact, that many of the existing Professors are not of the faith which the tests would seem to imply. Some who have subscribed the Confession of Faith, as required, are members of the Episcopal Church, and some are known to be very rarely in any church. Mr. Cowan intimated in this discussion, that of 20 candidates for the chair of Greek Professor in the University of Edinburgh, then vacant, including some of the most eminent men the country could produce, only four were legally qualified to be inducted. Although this new Bill also provided that "nothing contained in it shall affect the chairs of Theology, Divinity, or Church History," and was supported by numerous petitions, yet, as it proposed "to repeal all former statutes relating to the secular chairs," it was, on the division, April 28th, rejected by a majority of 170 against 157. These divisions indicate that probably ere long the measure will be carried.

After a long trial, in which several women swore in a manner that the Jury must regard as perjury, Dr. Newman has had a verdict recorded against him at the instance of Dr. Achilli for libel. The trial has excited much interest, not only on account of the position of the parties as converts, the one to the Romish faith, and the other to the Protestant, but from the known fact that great exertions were being made on the continent to procure evidence destructive of Achilli's character. Of all the numerous charges, most of them very infamous, the jury find only one to be true—that Achilli was suspended in 1841 by the Inquisition — which, he swears, was for holding the doctrine of justification by faith, and that he never was questioned for immorality. QUALIFICATIONS FOR THE MINISTRY.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

A few weeks since, I presented through the Recorder some thoughts on the theme contained in the heading of this article. The great object of that article was to show, that Christ and his Apostles regarded ability to teach as the great qualification for the minister. I am happy to find myself sustained in this position by a later writer, who (though he may sometimes preach) styles himself "A Layman." Of this position he says, "This is certainly the teaching of the Bible, as quoted by the writer." The Bible, with me, is the end of all controversy. I can not, therefore, harmonize the above confession of "A Layman" with his closing paragraph, in which he says, "We should aim at a thoroughly-educated ministry—a ministry 'apt to teach' the whole gospel; but it were suicidal to our best interests to make such qualifications a sine qua non of the ministry at present." If it be suicidal to adopt a Bible standard, I would much prefer to commit the suicide than to save my head by a time-serving policy.

I admire the zeal and eloquence with which "A Layman" advocates the blending of piety, zeal and perseverance with "aptness to teach," as qualifications for the minister. In this we agree. Over this lack in myself have I spent many a thoughtful hour. From the frequent allusions to our former article in this connection of his argument, it is possible that some may have supposed that we had taken the unhallowed position, that "piety and zeal and perseverance and eminent success" were not necessary to the ministerial character and calling. We fully adopt the whole characteristics of a model gospel minister, as given by the Apostle, 1 Timothy 3d chapter, as our standard. "A Laymen" will notice, by referring to these, that all of them, save "aptness to teach," belong as much, and as necessarily and appropriately, to "A Layman" as to "A Minister." Am I not right, therefore, in maintaining, that "aptness to teach" is a "sine qua non" to the minister. I have had nothing to do with it as "a variable quantity." Hair-splitting metaphysical definitions serve more to darken counsel than to enlighten. What the universal intelligence of the masses readily recognizes as "aptness to teach," needs no scholastic definitions to make plain. And there is such a uniformity of notion on this theory among ministers and people, that "A Layman" may quiet his fears "that we may never ordain another minister." Our ministry has many bright gems in its galaxy. There are young men, whose hearts burn with fervent zeal and exalted piety, who have "aptness to teach." From such as these may the destitute churches be supplied; and they fill the places vacated by the toil-worn ministers as "they ascend to their reward." Many of those who have stood for years on the battlements of Zion, and have been the chosen champions in many a well-fought battle for truth and righteousness, and have been "approved of God as his armor-bearers," have looked with anxiety upon those destined to be their successors, and sometimes have had occasion to say, "A good man has been spoiled to make a poor minister." I would that "A Layman" could have listened to the fervid eloquence and deep-toned piety of one of our aged ministers, as, in an ordination discourse, he showed that it was unto men that the word of reconciliation was committed—men who possessed the Bible qualifications for this labor.

Most of A Layman's article looks as if he were controverting our former article, but yet most of its sentiments are so in agreement with our own, that we are half inclined to construe the apparent difference as a necessary result of his well-wrought rhetorical copiousness in style, and not to a radical difference in sentiment.

I present other arguments, by which I wish to show the "true relation of 'aptness to teach' to other qualifications." "Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue." (1 Cor. xiv. 19.) "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." (2 Timothy ii. 15.) "And the things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also." (2 Timothy ii. 2.) "Whereunto I am appointed a preacher and an Apostle, a teacher of the Gentiles." (2 Timothy i. 2.) Read also the fourth chapter of second Timothy. Language could not more plainly show, that the Apostle Paul regarded ability to teach as the great qualification for the ministry. Nor may it be disputed, that his ability to teach gave him the great power he had as an Apostle. "For his letters, say they, are weighty and powerful." (2 Cor. x. 10.) "And he reasoned in the synagogue every Sabbath." (Acts xviii. 4.) "And he continued there a year and six months, teaching the word of God among them." (xviii. 2.) "And as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled." (Acts xxiv. 25.) And the same Apostle, in a most skillful manner, has drawn out, in the clearest possible arguments, the whole economy of the Gospel, in his several epistles. For skill in reasoning, aptness to teach, clearness and force of expression, he has no superior. Such was the man whom Jesus Christ placed at the head of the ministry, as an example, a teacher, and a guide of them that should come after him. Who shall say that aptness to teach was not the great weapon by which he conquered.

In my former article I used the term "exegetical." "A Layman" quotes it often, (as if it were not so important as my single use of it suggested,) and says, "It seems to me that Christ's notable sermon on the mount is not remarkably "exegetical." 'It seems to me' that he has not well consider it, if he so judges. There is not, in the whole compass of the New Testament, a purer and clearer exegesis of the principles and economy of religion, than in that sermon. "And he opened his mouth and taught them, saying, Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn, for," &c. And thus it continues, announcing a proposition and explaining it; every proposition being followed by an exegesis or explanation of it. Let me ask every reader of this article to take up that sermon and read it with a view to its "exegetical" character. At the end of the investigation, you will all agree with me, that for purity, clearness, and appropriateness of exegesis, it has no equal. It is the "masterpiece." So also is it with his no less notable sermon to his disciples, commencing with John 14th and ending with his prayer in the 17th chapter. The first sermon preached by an Apostle after Christ's ascension, when they were filled with the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, was an exegesis of the prophecies relating to the then existing events. Three thousand souls were added to the church as the fruits of that "exegetical discourse." Stephen's defense before the high priest was an exegesis of the former Scriptures relating to the things then transpiring, for which he suffered martyrdom. Philip's discourse to the eunuch was an exegesis of the passage the eunuch was reading. Paul's defense before Agrippa had as its prominent characterstic this exegetical character. And so, from beginning to end, is it with all the discourses recorded in the New Testament. I am therefore persuaded, that "A Layman" has not studied the teachings of Christ and his Apostles so much to learn the character of their teachings as the spirit by which they clothe them. Let us have both. The "Galilean fishermen" were sent to teach. With what zeal, and clearness of argument, and purity of exegesis, some of them taught, may be found in the "Acts of the Apostles." They dealt in "elaborate discussions," in "exegetical essays," and "had great aptness to teach," accompanied by the "out-gushing of deep-toned devotion." I would that all ministers now were like them. We then should have intelligent and spiritual laymen, and the church would accomplish its mission in the earth.

I said before, that men must be taught what to believe, and how to believe, before they can be persuaded to believe. I repeat it. And I insist still, under or out of my incog. (for it is said I cannot write so as to remain incog.) that zeal, and piety, and success even, without aptness to teach, do not qualify one for the ministry. If such are to be ordained, then some of the sisters would claim the rite first; and "A Layman" could not deny it. Our own churches to this day suffer from the former habit of ordaining all that came, without reference to their ability to teach and to feed the flock of Christ. We have hundreds of religious pigmies, because those who were placed over them by the rite of ordination could not teach and would not learn. Scores have left the denomination, because they were not well instructed by those having the oversight of them. We are weak and sickly, because our ministers are some of them so. By the time that we ought to have been men, we are babes, because we have not been fed. Mark the character of those who have come up under an intelligent ministry. They are the strength and glory of our denomination, and the men on whom we rely to give character and direction to our operations. An intelligent ministry can alone make churches intelligent. An intelligent and pious ministry will make an intelligent and pious church. And such a church shall shine in the world, and exert its power for the world's reformation. The truths that characterize us, of which we are the chosen guardians, can be defended and propagated only by those who are able to measure strength with the strong, and wisdom and learning with the wise and learned. In those who have aptness to teach, adorned with fervent piety, shall our enemies find "foemen worthy of their steel." And shall one who is unskilled in the doctrines of the Gospel, who has no ability to teach, no arguments with which to convince, and no eloquence to persuade, be entrusted with what might fill an angel's heart, and filled a Saviour's hands? Shall the Gospel of the Son of God be made an occasion of uninstructive harangues, and senseless declamations, because certain brethren think themselves called to preach? Ah! who is sufficient for these things? Could I have been permitted by the church to have remained in its bosom as one of its private members, and avoided the responsibilities of the ministry, happy, yes, happy should I have been. And I am constrained again to say, Many a good man has been spoiled and lost to the church to make a poor, inefficient minister. Let there be no more such sacrifices. A MINISTER.

ACADEMIC ANNIVERSARIES.

The Public Examination and Anniversary Exercises of DERUYTER INSTITUTE were held week before last. As no official notice of them has been sent us, we are only able to say what we gather from a private letter, that "the examination passed off very well," and that the compositions, declamations, and colloquy, were "quite interesting."

THE UNION ACADEMY, at Shiloh, N. J., held its Anniversary on the 5th inst. "A clear summer sky, and a gentle breeze, scented by the health-invigorating odors of meadows and harvest fields, with the cool and inviting shade of a beautiful grove, conspired to render the scene one of unsurpassed loveliness. No less than two thousand persons were in attendance, and the marked attention and the animated faces of the assembly, indicated that to them the occasion was truly 'a feast of reason and a flow of soul.'" Over forty pieces were read and spoken by members of the Institution, some of which elicited much applause, while all of them are said to have reflected credit upon the students and the school. The Annual Address was delivered by J. T. Nixon, Esq., of Bridgeton, his theme being "The intimate connection existing between the general diffusion of Intelligence and the perpetuation of our Republican Institutions." The address is spoken of by one of the West Jersey papers as "a chaste and finished production, appropriate to the day and the occasion." The Bridgeton String Band discoursed excellent music at intervals throughout the exercises. We are happy to learn that the institution has been in a flourishing condition during the past year, and that its prospects for the year to come are quite flattering.

The Fourteenth Anniversary of ALFRED ACADEMY was held on the 8th inst., in the new, large, and well-arranged Chapel, which, though not quite complete, is said to have answered the purpose admirably. Thirty of the students took part in the exercises. The Address to the Graduating Class was delivered by Prof. J. M. Allen. A friend who was present informs us that the exercises throughout were of a highly interesting and encouraging character—the only drawback being, that Prof. Kenyon, who has heretofore taken a prominent part in them, was this year prevented by ill health from doing so. Presuming that a full account of the anniversary will be furnished us at an early day by an eye witness, we add no more.

DEATH OF ELD. JOB TYLER.

A letter from Bro. Clarke Needham gives us farther particulars relative to the death of Eld. Job Tyler. It seems that he was taken sick in the latter part of December, soon after the vessel, in which he was a passenger for San Francisco, left Panama. He died on the 20th of February, near San Diego, at which place his remains were taken on shore and buried. A combination of diseases had reduced him very much, when his lungs became affected, and that, in the opinion of the physician on board, caused his death. His mind was unimpaired to the last, and he expressed perfect resignation to the Divine Will. A funeral service was numerously attended, on the 30th of May, in the neighborhood of Bro. Tyler's former residence in Michigan, when a sermon was preached by Eld. Asa Bennett, from Num. 23: 10—"Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

The letter from which we gather the above facts, states that Bro. Tyler's fellow passengers had a very hard voyage of sixty-three days from Panama to San Diego. For thirty days they were without bread, and for six days they had but half a pint of water each per day, and half a pint of musty flour and meal. While upon this allowance, they fell in with a brig, from which they obtained bread enough to give seven and a half biscuits each to the 130 persons on board. A supply of water was obtained from an island, but this failed them five or six days before reaching port. For the last four or five days they lived on parched beans, and when the ship made the harbor of San Diego, there was not a pound of provision left on board.

A JUDICIOUS HINT.—The editor of the Biblical Recorder, in referring to the large number of converts lately baptized by Rev. Mr. Elwell, adds:—

"We hope that bro. E. will call the attention of these new converts to the subject of religious periodicals. We shall be pleased to have some fifty, seventy-five, or even a hundred of these recently baptized persons become subscribers to the Recorder. Each revival of religion ought to increase our subscription list. We have a work to do among the Baptists, and we wish Baptists to help us to do it."

The force of this appeal (says the Christian Watchman) should commend it to pastors and active members in our churches. There are seasons when it becomes comparatively easy to increase the number of readers of religious newspapers. Times of revival are specially favorable for this object. We have received, of late, several new subscriptions which we have recognized as coming from young converts. The number of these, we have no doubt, might be considerably multiplied, if the matter were distinctly brought before the minds of those who are coming into the churches. And what more effective means of permanently forming the young Christian's character can be adopted, than the making him a constant reader of the best religious periodicals?

AIDING CANDIDATES FOR THE MINISTRY.—The American Education Society held a meeting in Boston, a short time since, at which the reports of its various officers were presented. It was stated that the receipts of the Society and its auxiliaries, during last year, amounted to $29,376; disbursements $32,066. The whole number of young men aided during the past year by the Parent Society and its auxiliaries, is 438. Of these the Parent Society assisted 294, of whom 181 were engaged in the study of theology, and 163 were in college. Of the 294 assisted by the Parent Society, 168 were from New England, 44 were from the Middle States, 74 from the Western States, three from Canada, and two from Constantinople. 61 new applicants have been admitted to the patronage of the society during the past year, and 31 have completed their course of theological study. The number aided by the Parent Society has been gradually on the increase for several years. In 1844, it was 230; in 1845, 218; in 1846, 238; in 1847, 246; in 1848, 275; in 1849, 285; in 1850, 294; in 1851, 277; in 1852, 294.

THE NEW BIBLE HOUSE.—The following account of the building now erecting in New York for the accommodation of the American Bible Society, was given on the occasion of laying the corner-stone:—

The building occupies the block of ground bounded by Fourth Avenue, Astor Place, Third Avenue, and Ninth-street, and is to be six stories high, with cellars and vaults. The front on Fourth Avenue is 198 feet 8 inches, on Astor Place 202 feet 10 inches, on Third Avenue 76 feet 11 inches, and on Ninth-street 232 feet 6 inches, forming a front on four streets of 710 feet 11 inches. The whole has an average depth of about 50 feet, leaving a large area in the center. The boilers are to be placed in the inner area or yard, so as not to expose the operatives to danger in case of accident. The whole establishment is so planned, that from the delivery of the paper in Ninth-street, it will proceed regularly through its various stages of manufacture, until it arrives in books in the depository, with but very little labor in hoisting from one story to another.

LIBERTY OF THE PPESS IN FRANCE.—The following document is interesting, as an illustration of the kind of liberty enjoyed by the press in France, and as a specimen of the style of one of the high public officers:—

"Sir:—I have received the Evangelical Bulletin of Lower Britanny, a newspaper published by you. I read in that paper, page 22, 'The first Sunday of February, five persons renounced the errors of Roman Catholicism in Canongate's Free Church of Edinburgh.' In acknowledging the receipt of the declaration you made to me of the establishment of your paper, I have conformed myself to the law, which did not allow me to prevent its publication; the law leaves me too the right to stop that publication, if it becomes an instrument of trouble. As soon as you give me an opportunity, I will make use of that right. The article above quoted indicates on your part a tendency to attack a religion which has an immense majority in the country, and might cause a discussion which I deem dangerous. I warn you, sir, that if you do not absolutely abstain from any allusion whatever of that kind, I shall not hesitate to make use against you of the power with which I am armed. RICHARD, Prefet du Finistère."

A COLORED STUDENT OF THE BIBLE.—In Wilmington, North Carolina, (says a correspondent of one of our exchanges,) some of us had the pleasure of an interview with "Uncle Moro," a native African, now eighty-three years of age, for forty-five years a slave, but whose time is mostly occupied in reading the Arabic Scriptures. He writes the language with an accuracy and beauty of penmanship which would be remarkable among our oriental scholars at any age, and his original version of the sacred text is highly instructive. May all our learned students of the Bible have as happy a home and as blessed a leisure in the decline of life as our sable uncle!

ALFRED ACADEMY.—A Catalogue of the Officers and Students of Alfred Academy and Teachers' Seminary, for the year ending July 8, 1852, has been issued. It covers thirty-two octavo pages, and gives the names of 395 students who have been in attendance during the past year. The Board of Instruction includes seven gentlemen and three ladies. The next term of the Institution opens on the third Wednesday in August.

CHINESE IN CALIFORNIA.—The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has resolved to establish a mission among the Chinese in California. Their numbers are rapidly increasing, and already they constitute an important class of the inhabitants. They can be reached by the minister of the gospel. Whatever difficulties may be thrown in their way for a time, we have no idea that their immigration to this land is to be permanently and finally arrested.

RETURNED MISSIONARIES.—The packet-ship Hendrick Hudson, from London, arrived at New York on the 29th of June, bringing, as passengers, the Rev. Lyman Stilson, of the Maulmain Burman mission, his four children, and two children of the Rev. E. A. Stevens, of the same mission; Mrs. C. Bennett and son, of the Tavoy mission; and Miss H. E. T. Wright, of the Maulmain Karen mission. These missionaries have all been under the patronage of the Baptist Missionary Union.

METHODIST BISHOPRICS.—The Methodist bishops have resolved to extend their official supervision to their churches in foreign lands. The mission churches in Africa are to be visited twice during the ensuing four years, by Bishops Scott and Baker respectively. The churches on the Pacific coast are to be visited also, by Bishops, Simpson and Ames.

WORSHIPING THE SUN.—The San Francisco correspondent of the Journal of Commerce says:—

"At present there are a few Persians in our city. They attracted considerable attention on the plaza last week, while engaged in worshiping the Sun.

Methodist Institutions of Learning.—A report on education, made to the late General Convention of the M. E. Church at Boston, gives a tabular view of the literary institutions which have come into existence in that connection. There are no less than eight colleges, with property and funds amounting to $494,063. The oldest of them, at Middletown, was founded in 1830. There are 46 academies and seminaries, the oldest of which is that at Wilbraham, founded in 1829, under the auspices of the lamented Wilbur Fisk. In 29 of these there are 4930 students, an average of 170 to each. The committee, of which Professors Whedon was chairman, say well in their report:— [Independent.

"Our work is not done when we have constructed a system of academies, and crowned them with colleges. We are not only to bring these advantages within reach of our young men, but we are to bring our young men into the actual use of these advantages. We must take hold of our young men, recall them to a sense of duty to the church and to God; they must be directed to the great importance of intellectual and moral cultivation, and if under proper inquiry they give proof of being moved by the Holy Ghost, and inspired by the sense of duty, let them assume the sacred calling; and we may hope thus to possess a ministry for the times. If, however, the intimations of Providence require their occupying a secular position, they will bless the church scarcely less by filling the ranks of a cultivated Christian laity."

Teachers and Matrimony.—A statement has been going the rounds, to the effect that out of 275 teachers transported from the East to the West by the Board of National Popular Education, 205 have been married. This statement is pronounced false, and the following is put forth as a correct account of the matter:—

"Fifty-five of the teachers are married. Of these, twelve are of the first class, sent out in the Spring of 1847; thirteen of the second class, sent out in October, 1847; six of the third class, sent in May, 1848; four of the fourth class, sent in October, 1848; five of the fifth, sent in May, 1849; seven of the sixth, sent in October, 1849; five of the seventh, sent in May, 1850, two of the eighth, sent in October, 1850; and one of the ninth, sent in May, 1851, who has married a teacher, and continues to teach. Six of the married are still teaching. A few of them have been married within the two years, during which it is understood that those sent out are to teach; though of these some have continued to teach through, and some even beyond the two years. Sufficient time, says Gov. Slade, has elapsed to show the practical working, in this respect, of our enterprise. The results of our five years' experiment, will, in the first place, serve to silence the objection sometimes made, that all our teachers will be married as soon as they reach the West; while at the same time it presents this incident of the enterprise in a light which challenges distinct attention, and calls for a consideration, in sober earnestness, of its true bearings."

New Enterprise in Theological Literature.—It is stated that a quarterly journal, to be entitled, "The Foreign Evangelical Review;" has been commenced in Edinburgh, which is to be filled wholly with articles taken from American religious quarterlies. The first nember contains Dr. Williams's celebrated article on the Conservative Principle in our Literature, Prof. Tappan's Theses on the Church, Prof. Park's Convention Sermon, &c. All the religious quarterlies of this country, past and present, are to come under contribution.

More Free Missions.—A Convention is called to meet at Chicago, on the 7th of July, of "all the friends of Free Missions, and the opposers of slaveholding fellowship," to form a Free Missionary Society for the Northwest. The Convention, it is proposed, shall "take such further action in relation to the anti-slavery cause, and the purification of the church from slavery, as may be judged expedient."

The Crops.—A trip as far West as Cherry Valley, Illinois, has just enabled us (says one of the editors of the N. Y. Tribune) to see a good portion of that State, as well as part of Michigan, Northern Indiana, and Ohio, with the Southern Counties of New York. Everywhere the Crops are in a backward condition, and are suffering severely from drouth. For nearly a fortnight little or no rain has fallen through this entire region, until Tuesday night, June 29, when there were some insufficient showers, and unless there is soon a copious fall of rain, the consequences must be serious. Indian Corn is everywhere very small and feeble; the best we have seen is in Tioga and Chemung Counties, N. Y.; and Wheat and other grains are far less advanced than is usual at the season. The Grass crop is also somewhat injured, but had got forward much better in the cold and wet weather of the spring, and suffers less accordingly. Potatoes are also looking comparative ly well.

The Case of Pereira.—The case of Manuel Pereira, colored British seaman, imprisoned at Charleston, S. C., on account of his bad complexion, has been brought before the House of Commons by Mr. Milnes, who inquired as to what Lord Derby's Cabinet had done or were doing to bring the matter to a favorable issue. Lord Stanley replied on the part of the Government, stating the facts in regard to the prosecution of the case before the Courts of South Carolina by Mr. Matthew, the British Consul, and also intimating the intention of the Government to carry the question before the Supreme Court of the United States for final decision as to the constitutionality of the law under which the imprisonment took place. At the same time, Lord Stanley referred to the late relaxations in the law of Louisiana upon the same subject, and expressed the hope that "the influence of public opinion would ultimately do away with all laws of this nature, and remove from one of the most enlightened nations of the world one of the greatest degradations that could be fixed on a civilized country." The steamer Troy ran upon a rock near Albany on Thursday night, and sunk. No lives were endangered, as the water was very shallow.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JULY 6.

In the Senate, the House bill to enable the Legislature of Indiana to dispose of the unsold saline lands heretofore conveyed to said State, was taken up and passed. A resolution offered by Mr. Weller, to refer to a Select Committee the charges filed against the Commissioners to run the Mexican boundary line, was taken up, and Mr. Weller made a furious attack upon Mr. Ewing, late Senator from Ohio, in reply to what Mr. E. had said of him (Weller) while he was on the Mexican Boundary. The subject was then postponed, and the Senate took up and passed five private bills.

The House, after considerable discussion, laid on the table the bill granting right of way and lands to Alabama to aid in the construction of a Railroad in that State from Girard to Mobile Bay. Mr. Olds, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported, with amendments, the bill to reduce and modify the rates of postage, which will be found in another part of this paper.

THIRD-DAY, JULY 7.

In the Senate, Mr. Atchison presented a petition from Missouri in favor of the organization of a Government for Nebraska Territory. A joint resolution was introduced to provide for and fix prices for the Public Printing. A bill in regard to the safety of passengers on steam vessels was discussed and ordered to be printed. The bill makes provision that steamboats shall be provided with all the modern conveniences and modes of escape in case of accident. It limits the number of passengers to the capacity of the boat, regulates the law of right to the channel in rivers, establishes a Board of nine Chief steam vessel Inspectors and Sub-inspectors in each collection district, provides penalties for all violations of its provisions, &c.

In the House, Mr. Houston made a speech opposing the Collins appropriation. The appropriation of $360,000 for the San Francisco Floating Dry Dock, as passed, and the House adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, JULY 8.

In the Senate, it was stated that the Free Land bill would be reported upon next week. The bill to establish a line of military posts 20 miles apart on the Overland Route to California, was debated, but postponed until Third-day. After some unimportant business, the Senate adjourned for want of a quorum.

In the House, Mr. Gray, from the Committee on Post-Offices and post routes, reported a bill authorizing the Postmaster-General to contract for the transportation of the mails semi-monthly in first class steamships between Jersey City, port of New York, and Galway in Ireland, via St. Johns, Newfoundland. The bill authorizes a contract with the lowest bidder for four years—the sum to be paid for such service not to exceed $10,000 the round trip. The Deficiency bill was taken up, and Mr. Jones of Tenn., made some criticism upon Kossuth's Hotel bill, but, after a rebuke from Mr. Cartter of Ohio, his motion to repudiate the appropriation was voted down. The Collins appropriation was debated, and a motion to reduce the amount was rejected, 61 to 76. No final vote.

SIXTH-DAY, JULY 9.

The Senate spent the whole day in talk about the bill amending the act providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam. Adjourned to Second-day.

In the House, the morning hour was spent in discussing the bill for the reduction of postage on newspapers. Some amendments were agreed to, but no final vote was taken. The Deficiency bill was then taken up, and debate followed upon the Collins steamers. Without coming to the question, the House adjourned.

SABBATH-DAY, JULY 10.

The Senate was not in session.

In the House, the morning hour was spent in debate upon the proposed reduction of postage. The principal difficulty appears to be to fix upon the minimum weight for newspapers. The bill did not reach a vote. Next came up the Deficiency bill, and a long debate ensued upon the Collins Steamers.

European News.

The steamer Canada, with European news to June 26th, arrived at Boston on the 8th inst.

There had been but little doing in the British Parliament.

The lovers of scandal in London have had a highly seasoned dish set before them in the trial of a libel suit brought by the notorious Dr. Achilli against the no less celebrated Dr. Newman. The former is an apostate from Roman Catholicism, and the latter from Protestantism. Achilli was charged with many acts of seduction and debauchery, time and place being sworn to by his alledged victims; he, on the other hand, making oath that he never saw the women in his life! A remarkable feature in the case was the introduction in the evidence of copies of proceedings against Achilli before the Inquisition, it being the first time since the Reformation that the records of that tribunal had been introduced into English Courts of law. The pleadings on both sides were noticeable for ability, and after three days of intense interest on the part of the public, the Jury brought in a verdict of libel proven on charge the 19th.

Captain Scoresby, the veteran Arctic Navigator, has published his opinion respecting the wrecks seen in the ice off Newfoundland—he expresses his decided conviction that the wrecks were not the remains of the missing discovery ships.

The new screw-schooner Isabel, which has been fitted out by Lady Franklin, assisted by the Geographical Society, and placed under the command of Capt. Inglesfield, will soon sail on another search for Sir John Franklin, through Jones and Smith Sounds, Baffins Bay.

The University of Oxford has presented a splendid gold salver to the American Bishops now on a visit to England.

The Legislatif Council of France continues to rebel against the President's dictations, and the funds have been affected in consequence.

Two hundred and fifty more political prisoners had arrived at Havre for shipment to the Colonies. The first detachment had arrived a Cayenne on the 10th May.

The Emperor of Brazil, having invited sixty of the Sisters of Charity to minister in the Brazilian hospitals, a number of the sisterhood are about to embark for Rio.

Letters from Toulouse state that the crops in that district were much damaged by a hail storm on the 18th June.

Letters from Rome say that the Pope has agreed to commute the sentence of death against the Englishman Murray in to hard labor at the galleys.

There is nothing later from Rangoon. The troops will probably remain there until after the rainy season is over, and should the war continue, additional forces will be sent from Bombay, Bengal and Madras.

The Nizam is said to have consented to cede part of his dominions to the British, in payment of his debts.

An extensive organization of Thugs has been discovered in the Punjaub; 500 have been arrested, and 120 now in prison have confessed their crimes.

Three Days Later.

The U. S. Mail Steamship Arctic, with Liverpool dates to June 30, three days later, arrived at New York on Sunday last.

In England, the only thing talked of was the dissolution of Parliament, which was to take place July 1st.

In London, June 30th, a rumor was current that an attempt was made to assassinate the Emperor of Austria at Grosswardien, near Pesth, but the assassin missed his aim, and immediately blew out his own brains.

In Greece, there has been a religious revolt, headed by a fanatic priest, caused by the recent understanding with the Patriarch of Constantinople for putting the Greek Church under his control. The revolt was soon suppressed.

The weather in Switzerland, at last accounts, was wet and cold, and numerous tourists were detained at Thun and Interlacken by a heavy fall of snow.

A dreadful fire has taken place at Bosnia Serai, in Bosnia, which has consumed upward of 6,000 houses and shops, exclusive of the Government Palace and other public buildings.

Speaking of the war in Burmah, an English paper says: It is now generally understood, that nothing more will be attempted in Burmah till after the rains, and that, contrary to previous expectations, the whole force will remain in the country, mostly on board the shipping, and that the war will be resumed with vigor the moment the season permits. The Indian papers are already beginning to hint at the probability of annexing the whole Peninsula.

SUMMARY.

A fatal accident occurred at Leonardsville, Madison Co., N. Y., on the evening of the 5th inst. While some young men and lads were amusing themselves in discharging a small piece of artillery, it burst, and a fragment of it struck Joshua Morgan, a young man about twenty-two years of age, on his head, killing him instantly. Mr. M. was a young man of industrious habits, and for whom nature had done much. He has left parents, and a large circle of domestic friends, to lament his loss.

The good people of Pawcatuck Bridge, R. I., celebrated the National Anniversary in a very rational manner, with a procession and speeches, a collation and toasts. "To the honor of the inhabitants be it known, (we copy from the Literary Echo,) that, though we were out all day and evening, in this vast concourse of people—it was estimated that there were over three thousand persons—we saw but one person whom we should suspect of having drank anything intoxicating; and, more remarkable still, we do not recollect of having heard an oath during the day."

The St. Paul's Pioneer gives an account of a thunder-storm which passed along the east side of Lake St. Croix, a few weeks since. A company of a dozen lumbermen were at work on the shore of Willow River at the time, and took refuge in their tent. The lightning struck their tent and killed two of their number, whose heads were resting on the ground. Three others were seriously hurt, the fluid ripping open the skin of some of them, like the riven bark of trees, from head to foot. But none, except the two whose heads were resting on the ground, were killed.

The Legislature of Massachusetts, at their last session, passed an act to the effect, that when any person shall be convicted of any crime punishable with death, he shall, at the same time, be sentenced to hard labor in the State Prison until such punishment of death shall be inflicted. And no person so imprisoned shall be executed in pursuance of such sentence within one year from the day such sentence of death was passed, nor until the Governor, with the advice of the Council, under the great seal, shall issue a warrant commanding execution to be done.

Four men, named Wm. Dyke, Geo. Tilley, John Mallory and Thos. Horan, were recently engaged in blasting rocks on the branch of the New York and Erie Railroad, in Orange County. A charge of powder had been placed in the rock, to which a match had been applied, but as the powder did not explode as soon as it was expected it would, the men ventured to approach the rock for the purpose of applying another match, when it suddenly exploded, and scattered stones in every direction, instantly killing Dyke and Tilley, and badly bruising and mutilating the other two.

On the night of June 2, the house of Edward McAnulty, Addison, Washington County, Wis., was burnt, with all its contents. Mr. McA. and wife and two children were in New York. Five children were left at home; three of them—the oldest daughter, twenty-one years old, and two boys, one three, the other five years old—perished in the flames. The other two children, with a young man living with the family, barely escaped through the window. It is thought the fire was the work of an incendiary.

A new telegraph line is to be constructed from Quebec to Detroit River, a distance of 850 miles; from which branches are to be extended into the interior in some cases, and to the frontier in others; of which the aggregate length will be 600 miles. There will be stations at all the ports of Lake Erie of any consequence.

A rail on the track of the Western Railroad, between Palmer and Warren, was so expanded by the heat, one day last week, as to be dislocated from its position. A freight train was thrown off the track in consequence.

A gentleman of Albany was recently in the city of Boston on business, and in the evening went to one of the theaters, which he left before the conclusion of the performance. Walking alone in the street, without paying much attention to localities, he suddenly was assailed from behind by some unknown person dexterously knocking his hat off, slipping a bag over his face, and seizing his arms, and running him through an alley and into a room some hundred or hundreds of feet in the rear. Here he was put on a seat, and his person searched with great deliberation. A roll of $160 in bills was all that was retained by the robber, who allowed his victim to depart on a promise to send more money to a certain address.

Arrivals at New Bedford bring accounts from the Cape of Good Hope to May 7th. The sixth Regiment had had a sharp encounter with a large force of the enemy, in which the latter were finally routed, with a large number killed. Andrea Bothnia, a leading Hottentot, has been indicted and is to be tried for high treason. Gen. Cathcart had been thrown from his horse and badly injured, but was recovering, and intended to lead a force of 1,000 men into the enemy's country.

Ralph Randolph Wormley, a Rear-Admiral in the British Navy, arrived in Utica, on Thursday, July 1, from Sharon, and having visited Trenton Falls, was intending to go West in the cars Friday afternoon. While procuring tickets at the depot, he was seized with an apoplectic attack, of which he died at Bagg's Hotel about midnight. He was 67 years of age, resided at Newport, R. I., four or five years. His wife was an American lady. She and her two daughters were with him.

A dispatch dated New Orleans, Monday, July 5, 1852, says: This morning, as the steamer St. James was returning from Biloxi, her boilers exploded, killing fifty passengers—including among them, Judge Isaac Preston, of the Supreme Court, Mr. Woolfe, the Corporation Attorney, and other prominent citizens, and many women and children, who were returning from watering places. The St. James, it is said, was racing at the time with a Mobile boat.

The Woolsey scholarship at Yale College, a prize, has been won by John Edward Todd of Pittsfield, son of Rev. Dr. Todd. The prize is $60 a year, during the College course, and is offered to the member of the Freshman Class who will pass the best examination in certain specified branches. Those who volunteer as competitors are subject to a severe and protracted test of several days, conducted in such a manner as to throw the student as far as possible on his own resources.

The Springfield Republican says that Horace Mann is to be President of Antioch College, Ohio, the corner stone of which was laid June 23d. This College is the result of a united effort of the whole denomination of people called New Lights, or Christians, throughout the country, and is now endowed with $200,000 in scholarships at $100 each. The buildings are being erected upon the most extensive plans, and when completed will be the largest and most imposing in the State.

As the train from Boston was passing a crossing about three miles above Athol, it came in contact with a horse and carry-all, driven by the daughter of Capt. James Adams, of Orange county, killing the horse instantly, and smashing the carriage to atoms. The carriage contained two young ladies and a little child. Singular as it may seem, neither was injured in the least.

There are at least 1,200 acres of vineyards around Cincinnati alone, giving employment to no less than 600 efficient laborers, at an annual cost of $20,000, and producing, in moderately favorable seasons, 240,000 gallons of wine. Most of those engaged in the culture of the vine have families to support. It is calculated that the wine interest in Hamilton county affords subsistence, directly and indirectly, to 10,000 industrious and sober people.

At a late Prussian Industrial Exhibition, Count Renard, a large proprietor of iron works, exhibited sheet-iron of such a degree of tenuity that the leaves can be used for paper. One of the finest sorts the machinery rolls is 7,040 square feet, of what may be called leaf iron, from a cwt. of metal. A book-binder of Breslau has made an album of nothing else, the pages of which turn as flexibly as the finest fabric of linen rags.

The Maysville Eagle says that Collins and Clark were sentenced to be hung in Greenupsburgh on the 25th, for the murder of Brewer and wife. Collins hung himself in jail two days before the appointed day of execution. Clark was officially hung by the Sheriff on the day appointed. An immense concourse of people, of both sexes, embracing passengers borne on nine different steamboats, and numbering many thousands, attended the execution of Clark.

We understand that Mrs. Tamar Davis, of Allawaystown, (New Jersey,) is preparing a work for the press, designed to be the counterpart of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," but illustrative of the condition and character of the Negroes in the Free States. The scene will be laid in New Jersey, where there are several villages occupied exclusively, it is said, by colored people.

The Boston Traveler learns that Mrs. H. B. Stowe received on the 7th, from her publishers, Messrs. Jewett & Co., the sum of. Ten Thousand Three Hundred Dollars, as her copy-right premium on three months' sales of Uncle Tom's Cabin. We believe that this is the largest sum of money ever received by any author, either American or European, from the actual sales of a single work in so short a period of time.

As a train for the East approached Rome, Oneida county, on Sunday, one of the cars, freighted with 103 live hogs, was found to be enveloped in flames. A spark had communicated to it, and before it was discovered, the fire had attained such headway that the car was nearly consumed, and every hog on board perished in the flames.

An evidence of the large amount of travel across Lake Erie, and especially by the Central Michigan line of steamers, is given by the Detroit Free Press of Monday. It says that the Mayflower reached that port on Saturday, from Buffalo, with 1003 passengers.

Our late anniversary has been celebrated on temperence principles in many parts of the country, and an enthusiasm is evinced in favor of the Maine Law which augurs well for its success.

Some two weeks ago, a boy of Nathan Rogers, of Williamsburg, L. I., about six years old, was run over by a cart loaded with stone. One wheel passed across his back and shoulders, breaking several ribs and the collar bone. He was taken up for dead, but soon regained conscionsness, and is now in a fair way to recover.

The editor of the New Orleans Picayune has lately seen a handkerchief made from the silk grass of Honduras, which, for fineness of texture and durability, far exceeds any linen he had ever seen. It was one of a number made in London from a sample of this very common grass in Honduras, Yucatan, &c. sent there by the gentleman who exhibited it as an experiment.

Webster Jellison, aged 16 years, Nehemiah Wentworth, 19, and Enoch Grant, 16, were drowned on the 2d inst. at Ellsworth, Me., in a small pond, whither they went to bathe. Grant got beyond his depth, Jellison plunged in to rescue him, and Wentworth to rescue Jellison. The alarm was given by some little boys, and the bodies were soon recovered, but too late.

In a storm which passed over Wilmington, Del., on the 6th inst., a barn about a mile from New Castle was blown down, killing three horses and severely injuring two men. There were about ten horses in the stables, but the rest escaped uninjured. The effects of the storm were felt more severely in the neighborhood of New Castle than in the vicinity of Wilmington.

The Native Americans held a National Convention at Trenton, N. J., on the 5th inst., at which they nominated Daniel Webster for President, and George C. Washington of Virginia for Vice-President.

The cars from Washington, with Secretary Webster and lady on board, were recently thrown off the track four miles the other side of the Reley House, causing considerable detention. Fortunately no person was injured.

A young couple who came to see the fireworks at New Haven on the 5th, left their baby asleep on the grass, where it was found by the police at a late hour. The next morning early the mother appeared and claimed her child.

A rattlesnake which had ten rattles was killed last Sunday in Milton, near Boston, Mass.

MARRIED,

July 5, by Eld. N. V. Hull, Mr. William W. Crandall, of Genesee, to Miss E. Euphemia Potter, of Alfred.

In South Kingston, R. I., June 13th, 1852, by Eld. H. Clarke, Mr. Wm. Hull to Mrs. Sarah Kinyon, both of South Kingston.

In Hopkinton, R. I., July 4th, 1852, by the same, Mr. Horace L. Crandall, of Hopkinton, to Miss Phebe L. Taylor, of Charleston, R. I.

DIED,

In DeRuyter, N. Y., on Third-day, July 6th, suddenly, Mrs. Mary Maxson, widow of the late Caleb Maxson, in the 84th year of her age. Mrs. Maxson made profession of religion in Newport, R. I., in the year 1806, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church of that place, then under the pastoral care of Eld. Wm. Bliss, and was married the same year. After several years residence in Newport, and afterward at Hopkinton, she removed to Cortland Co, N. Y., and united with the church at Scott, and subsequently with the church at Schenectady, and the church at DeRuyter, where she retained membership to her death. Having resided at different locations, she had acquired an extensive acquaintance, and has been much respected as a sincere Christian. She died in the hope of the Gospel. This announcement of her death will probably be the first intelligence that will reach her far distant children.

At Friendship, Allegany Co., N. Y., June 4th, 1852, Miss Luanna Crandall, daughter of Abram Crandall, aged 44 years. She had been for several years a worthy member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Friendship.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Notice.

THE Executive Board of the American Sabbath Tract Society have employed Bro. E. P. Larkin to visit the churches in behalf of the Society. Bro. L. will act as agent for the Society's publications. It is hoped that every family will take this opportunity to procure for its library a bound volume of our Tracts on the Sabbath, and a copy of Carlow's Defense of the Sabbath.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Miscellaneous.

Cheap Postage.

The following is the bill reported by Mr. Olds in the House of Representatives on the 6th inst. :—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, the postage upon all printed matter passing through the mail of the United States, instead of rates now charged, shall be as follows, to wit: Each newspaper, pamphlet, periodical, magazine, book, bound or unbound, circular, catalogue, and every other description of printed matter unconnected with any manuscript or writing, and of no greater weight than two ounces, shall be charged with one cent postage, and one cent for each additional ounce, or fraction of an ounce, for any distance under three thousand miles, double those rates. All newspapers and periodicals, not weighing over one ounce, published regularly as often at once in three months and sent from the office of publication to actual subscribers, shall be chargeable only one-half the foregoing rates. The postage upon all printed mailable matter shall be prepaid at the office where it is mailed or paid quarterly in advance at the office of delivery, otherwise double the foregoing rates shall be charged thereon.

Sec. II. And be it further enacted, that books, bound or unbound, not weighing over four pounds, shall be deemed mailable matter, and all printed matter chargeable by weight shall be weighed when dry. The publishers of newspapers and periodicals may send to each other from their respective offices of publication, free of postage, one copy of each publication; and may also send to each actual subscriber, inclosed in their publications, bills and receipts for the same, free of postage. The publishers of weekly newspapers may send to each actual subscriber within the county where their papers are printed and published, one copy thereof, free of postage.

Sec. III. And be it further enacted, that no newspaper, periodical, magazine, or other printed paper or matter, shall be entitled to be sent at the rates of postage in this act specified unless the following conditions be observed:

1. It shall be sent without any cover or wrapper, or in a case or wrapper, open at the ends, or sides, so that the character of the matter contained therein may be determined without removing such wrapper.

2. There shall be no word or communication printed on the same after its publication, or upon the cover or wrapper thereof, nor any writing or marks upon it, nor upon the cover or wrapper thereof, except the name and address of the person to whom it is to be sent.

3. There shall be no paper or other thing inclosed, or with such printed paper, and if these conditions are not complied with, such printed matter shall be subject to letter postage, and all matter sent by mail from one part of the United States to another, the postage of which is not fixed by the provisions of this act, shall, unless the same be entitled to be sent free of postage, be charged with letter postage.

Sec. IV. And be it further enacted, that if the publisher of any periodical, after being three months previously notified that his publications is not taken out of the office to which it is sent for delivery, continue to forward such publication in the mail, the Post-master to whose office such publication is sent, may dispose of the same for the postage, unless the publisher shall pay it, and whenever any printed matter of any description, received during one quarter of the fiscal year, shall have remained in the office, without being called for during the whole of any succeeding quarter, the Post-Master at such office shall sell the same, and credit the proceeds of such sale in his quarter's accounts, under such regulations and after such notice as the Post-Office Department shall prescribe.

Sec. V. And be it further enacted, that so much of the second section of this act, entitled, "An act to modify and reduce the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 31, 1851, in relation to the postage or free circulation or transmission of newspapers, periodicals, and other printed matter, and all other provisions of law inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed.

Fascination.

Borrow, in his new work, "Lavengro," relates the following curious incident, connected with the power of fascination :—

"It happened that my brother and myself were playing one evening in a sandy lane; our mother was at a slight distance. All of a sudden, a bright yellow, and to my infantile eye, beautiful and glorious object, made its appearance at the top of the bank, from between the quickset, and gliding down, began to move across the lane to the other side, like a line of golden light. Uttering a cry of pleasure, I sprang forward and seized it nearly by the middle. A strong sensation of numbing coldness seemed to pervade my whole arm, which surprised me the more, as the object to the eye appeared so warm and sunlike. I did not drop it, however, but holding it up, looked at it intently, its head dangled about a foot from my hand. It made no resistance; I felt not even the slightest struggle; but now my brother began to scream and shriek, like one possessed. 'Oh! mother, mother!' said he, 'the viper!—my brother has a viper in his hand!' He then, like one frantic, made an effort to snatch the creature away from me. The viper hissed amain, and raised his head, in which were eyes like hot coals, menacing, not myself, but my brother. I dropped my captive, for I saw my mother running towards me; and the reptile, after standing for a moment nearly erect, and still hissing furiously, made off and disappeared. The whole scene is now before me as vividly as if it occurred yesterday—the gorgeous viper, my poor dear frantic brother, my agitated parent, and a frightened hen clucking under the bushes—and yet I was not three years old.

"It is my firm belief that certain individuals possess an inherent power, or fascination, over certain creatures; otherwise I should be unable to account for many feats which I have witnessed, and, indeed, borne a share in, connected with the taming of brutes and reptiles. I have known a savage and vicious mare, whose stall it was dangerous to approach, even when bearing provender, welcome, nevertheless, with every appearance of pleasure, an uncouth, wiry-headed man, with a frightfully-seamed face, an iron hook supplying the place of his right hand, one whom the animal had never seen before, playfully bite his hair, and cover his face with gentle and endearing kisses; and I have already stated how a viper would permit, without resentment, one child to take it up in his hand, whilst it showed its dislike to the approach of another by the fiercest hissing. Philosophy can explain many strange things, but there are some which are a far pitch above her, and this is one."

Life in a Powder-Mill.

Dickens thus describes a visit to the Powder-Mill of Hounslow, near London :—

"In this silent region, amid whose ninety-seven work-places no human voice ever breaks upon the ear, and where, indeed, no human form is seen, except in the isolated house in which his allotted task is performed, there are secreted upward of two hundred and fifty work people. They are a peculiar race, not of course by nature, in most cases, but by the habit of years. The circumstances of momentary destruction in which they live, added to the most stringent and necessary regulation, have subdued their minds and feelings to the condition of their hire. There is seldom any need to enforce these regulations. Some terrific explosion here, or in works of a similar kind elsewhere, leaves a fixed mark in their memories, and acts as a constant warning. Here no shadow of a practical joke, or caper of animal spirit, ever transpires; no witticisms, no oaths, no chaffing, or slang. A laugh is never heard; a smile seldom seen. Even the work is carried on by the men with as few words as possible, and these uttered in a low tone. Not that anybody fancies that mere sound will awaken the spirit of combustion, or cause an explosion to take place, but that their feelings are always kept subdued. If one man wishes to communicate any thing to another, or to ask for any thing from some body at a short distance, he must go there, he is never permitted to shout or call out. There is a particular reason for this last regulation. Amid all this silence, whenever a shout does occur, every body knows that some imminent danger is expected the next moment, and all rush away headlong from the direction of the shout. As to running toward it to offer any assistance, as common in all other cases, it is thoroughly understood that none can be afforded. An accident here is immediate and beyond remedy. If the shouting he continued for some time, (for a man might be drowning in a river), that might cause one or two of the boldest to return; but this would be a very rare occurrence. It is by no means to be inferred that the men are selfish and insensible to the perils of each other; on the contrary, they have the greatest consideration for each other, as well as for their employers, and think of the danger to the lives of others, and of the property at stake at all times, and more especially in all the more dangerous "houses." The proprietors of the various gun-powder mills all display the same consideration for each other, and whenever any improvement tending to lessen danger is discovered by one, it is immediately communicated to all the others. The wages of the men are good, and the hours very short; no artificial lights are ever used in the works. They all wash themselves—black, white, and bronze—and leave the mills at 3½ in the afternoon, winter and summer.

Beet Root a Substitute for Potatoes.

Beet root can not be too much recommended to the notice of mankind, as a cheap and salubrious substitute for the now failing and diseased potato. Hitherto the red kind has only been used in England as a pickle, or as a garnish for salad; even the few who dress it, generally boil it, by which process the rich saccharine juice is in a great measure lost, and the root consequently rendered less nutritious by the quantity of water which it imbibes, as well as by parting with the native syrup, of which it is thus forcibly deprived; it is, therefore, strongly reccommended to bake instead of boiling them, when they will be found to afford a delicious and wholesome food. This is not an untried novelty, for both red and white beet root are extensively used on the continent; in Italy particularly, they are carried about hot from the oven twice a day, and sold publicly in the streets; thus they are purchased by all classes of people, and give to thousands, with bread, salt, pepper, and butter, a satisfactory meal. There are few purposes for which baked, or even roasted, or fried beet root, would not be found preferable to boiled. If these roots were as universally cultivated in England for human food, as they are on the Continent of Europe, and sold as cheap as they might easily be, many a poor person would have a hearty and good meal, who is now often obliged to go without one; and now that the potato crop is again failing, the above information can not but be of infinite service, if generally known, for there is a good deal of beet in the country, although planted or sown for the use of cattle.

Effects of Night Air.

An error, which exerts a most pernicious influence, is the belief that the night air is injurious; this opinion hinders the introduction of ventilation more than all other errors together. Now there is not a particle of proof, nor have we any reason whatever to believe, that the atmosphere of oxygen and nitrogen undergoes any change during the night. But there are certain causes in operation at night, which are known to exercise over us an injurious influence. We will investigate them to see if closed doors and windows will shut them out or stop their operation.

First, it is known that there is a slight increase of carbonic acid from plants during the night, but this poison is generated in much larger quantity from the lungs of animals, and accumulated immensely more in close rooms than in the open air. It is therefore certain that nothing is gained in this respect by refusing ventilation.

The next difference between night and day, to be noticed, is the fact that sunlight exercises a most important influence on plants, and also on animals; but it is evident that shutting out fresh air will not restore its rays.

Another fact is, that all bodies, animate or inanimate, exposed at night to the direct rays of a clear sky, radiate heat with great rapidity, and their temperature is quickly and greatly reduced; and it is well known that it is dangerous to the health of men for the temperature of their bodies to be rapidly and greatly reduced. But persons sleeping in a ventilated room, even if windows are open, are not exposed to the direct rays of the clear sky, (and the law does not apply to any other combination of circumstances;) therefore this frequent source of injury to persons exposed does not reach those in a sheltered house.

As to the injury to be feared from a cold current of air, I would observe that it is gross carelessness for any one to expose himself to this danger, night or day, whether the house is ventilated or unventilated. I believe there is not known any other cause which can be supposed to produce any special injurious effect at night, and the least reflection will show that not one of those mentioned can by any possibility injure a person more in a ventilated than in an unventilated house. It therefore follows that the objection of the night air being injurious is entirely futile. The pure atmosphere has nothing to do with causing the death of persons exposed at night within the tropics; nor does it produce the cough of the consumptive and asthmatic, nor the languor and misery which the sick so frequently experience.

These and other sufferings, experienced more particularly at night, are caused by carbonic acid, absence of sunlight, rapid reduction of temperature, the night being saturated with moisture, &c., and not by that without which we cannot live three minutes. It is absurd to suppose that fresh air supports our life and destroys our health at one and the same time. The same thing cannot possess the utterly incompatible character of good and evil, of supporting life and destroying it.

Root Crops.

It is a matter of surprise, when we consider the adaptation of our soil and climate to the raising of most kinds of root crops, and the acknowledged value of these crops when judiciously employed in feeding and fattening animals, that so little attention is paid to them by our farmers generally. It is pretty well understood that there has been a falling off in root culture, in this State, within the last ten or twelve years. The prevalence of the potato rot has, during that period, rendered this crop very uncertain; and it is not now, as formerly, raised to any great extent as food for swine and other domestic animals. We should suppose, under this state of things, that the farmers would at once adopt a substitute or substitutes for the potato from among the root crops that can be raised with certainty and profit, but they have neglected to do it. The parsnip, carrot, beet, and turnip, may all be used to advantage as food for swine and other stock; and we are confident that some, if not all of them, may be raised and fed out to greater profit than the potato, even in its best days. The cost of seed for the former is very much less than for the latter, and the yield, per acre, is generally much greater.

A supply of roots, to be fed in winter to your horse, cattle, and sheep, not only saves hay, but also promotes the health, thrift, and comfort of your animals. No good farmer should neglect to provide an adequate supply of roots for this purpose, and now is the time to make the necessary arrangements for accomplishing the object. Prepare the ground and put in the seed at the most suitable time. The parsnip and carrot should be sowed immediately; the beet, early in June; the ruta baga turnip, about the middle of that month, and the English turnip may be sowed during the month of July.

We consider that all these crops are worthy the attention of farmers, although some, of course, are better adapted for particular locations and uses than others. The carrot is excellent for all kinds of neat stock, and for horses some consider it preferable to oats. The parsnip, it is said, is preferred by swine to any other roots, and they fatten rapidly on them, the flesh being firm, and the meat of excellent flavor. In the Island of Guernsey, this root is cultivated very extensively for all kinds of stock, and with excellent success. The beet is nutritious and valuable. The sugar beet contains a large amount of saccharine matter, and is considered the best among the root crops for promoting a flow of milk in milch cows. The value of the ruta baga is well known. For feeding and fattening neat cattle, and even swine, they are valuable; and they answer an excellent purpose when fed regularly and systematically to cattle while kept up on hay, during our long winters.

The cost of raising carrots, parsnips, beets, and ruta bagas, is about the same, per acre. There will probably be more difference in the cost of harvesting. It requires considerable labor and care properly to thin and weed the plants, in the early stages of their growth, but on the whole we do not consider the culture difficult.

Mohammedan Mode of Dunning.

In civilized countries the collection of "bad debts" is attended with considerable difficulty. The Mohammedans, however, have a method of managing a reluctant creditor which is at once simple and efficacious. It is thus described by a recent traveler: "Meeting a person in any spot, to whom you wish to apply the khatt, you exclaim, 'The Sultan detains you here.' He instantly stands still; and, without bond or guard, remains there until delivered. The khatt is prescribed for slight faults, and for debt. When a creditor has several times met his debtor and asked for his due, and the debtor, while recognizing the debt, puts off payment, the creditor can, at discretion, stop his man, make him sit down, and then, with the point of his lance, he traces on the ground a circular line, saying, 'In the name of Allah and the Prophet! in the name of the Sultan and the mother of the Sultan! in the name of the tena, (a particular office,) supporters of the state, thou shalt not leave this circle until thou hast paid thy debt.' The debtor is obliged to remain enclosed and sitting in his khatt until some one intercedes with the creditor, and he consents to release the prisoner. If the creditor remains inflexible and inexorable, the prisoner remains in his khatt until he pays his debt. If, breaking the bounds, he crosses the line, and the creditor complains to the Sultan, the fugitive is pursued, taken wherever he is found, and severely punished."

The Overland Emigrants.—According to the Occidental Messenger the number of men, women, children and animals that have gone out upon the plains for Salt Lake and California, from May 1 to June 12, is as follows: Men, 16,362; Women, 3,242; Children, 4,266; Wagons, 5,325; Horses, 6,538; Mules, 4,686; Hogs, 1; Cattle, 59,392; Sheep, 10,523; Turkeys, 150; Ducks, 4; Guinea Fowls, 6. This does not include those going out by Council Grove and Kanesville. A great deal of sickness has taken place among these wanderers, with many deaths. A considerable number of emigrants have come back after having gone from four to five hundred miles into the wilderness.

The Plea of the Fugitive.

We recently chronicled the arrest and removal to the South from Harrisburg, Pa., of a fugitive slave named James Phillips. The following letter to his wife presents vividly the feelings of a man in his circumstances.

Richmond, June 20, 1852.

Dear Wife,—I will now write to you to inform you where I am and my health. I am well, and I am in hopes when you receive this it may find you well also. I am now in a trader's hands, by the name of Mr. Branton, and he is agoing to start South with a lot of negroes in August. I do not like this country at all, and had almost rather die than to go South. Tell all of the people if they can do any thing for me, now is the time to do it. I can be bought for $900. Do, pray, try and get Brant and Mr. Byers and Mr. Weaver to send or come on to buy me, and if they will only buy me back, I will be a faithful man to them so long as I live. Show Mr. Brant and Mr. Weaver this letter, and tell them to come on as soon as they possibly can to buy me. My master is willing to sell me to any gentleman who will be so kind as to come on to buy me. They have got poor James Phillips here with leg irons on, to keep him from getting away; and do pray, gentlemen, do not feel any hesitation at all, but come on as soon as you can and buy me. Feel for me now or never. If any of you will be so kind as to come on to buy me, inquire for Cochron's Jail. I can be found there, and my master is always at the Jail himself. My master gave me full consent to have this letter written, so do not feel any hesitation to come on and see about poor James Phillips. Dear wife, show it to these men as soon as you get it, and let them write back immediately what they intend to do. Direct your letter to my master, William A. Branton, Richmond, Va. Try and do something for me as soon as you can, for I want to get back very bad indeed. Do not think any thing at all of the price, for I am worth twice that amount. I can make it for any person who will buy me, in a short time. I have nothing more to write, only I wish I may be bought and carried back to Harrisburg in a short time. My best love to you, my wife. You may depend I am almost a dying to see you and my children. You must do all you can for your husband. Your husband,

James Phillips.

To Mrs. Mary Phillips, in care of Mr. Brant.

Haynau as he is.—Mr. Locke, of the Savannah Republican, in one of his recent letters from Europe, says :—

"We had as a cure guest at Græfenburg, during the two or three months of last winter, a celebrity—no less a person than Gen. Haynau, whose long moustaches call to mind Perkins & Barclay's brewery. He may be now 60 years of age. His step is feeble, his beard and moustache white, and his mouth has constantly a mumbling kind of nervous action. He came to Græfenburg with dropsy in his feet, and went away cured—or apparently so. He is a man of iron nerves—cruel and relentless, and to the credit of the Austrian officers, it should be said, generally detested. He is by birth an illegitimate son of the Duke of Hesse Cassel. Notwithstanding the cruelties he perpetrated in Hungary, he has bought an estate there for 100,000 florins, and if I am correctly informed, he is not disliked by his tenantry. After his campaigns in Italy and Hungary, he received 400,000 florins (some say 500,000) from the Austrian Government, which, however, declined conferring upon him the title of Field Marshal. The old soldier went through his cure most heroically though. He took 30 cold wet sheets a day, and would allow no fire in his room in December. His bath servant says he only paid him a florin a week. The cure guests generally pay 1½ florins a week for not one-fifth part the attention which he received."

Literary Success.—A very accomplished young lady, residing with her father in the country, who was reduced in circumstances about a year since, made up her mind that she must do one of two things, work as a seamstress or become an author! She preferred the latter, and composed a little work which had only a partial success, but she gathered courage even from that. Her second work, "The Wide, Wide World," was produced, and placed in the hands of the publisher, who gave her, conditionally, a very liberal contract; but the sale was slow for some months, and a loss appeared inevitable. Suddenly, however, public opinion decided in favor of the work, and Mr. Putnam has had the happiness of disposing of 20,000 copies, and paying over to the clever and intelligent authoress several thousand dollars. [Evening Post.

Gardening for Girls.—Some of the best writers in the country have advocated the importance of this subject, and the peculiarly healthful and strengthening influences that attend it.

Miss Beecher, in her work on Domestic Economy, recommends every father to "set apart a portion of his yard and garden for fruits and flowers, and see that the soil is well prepared and dug over, and all the rest may be committed to the children. These would need to be provided with a light hoe and rake, a dibble or garden trowel, a watering pot, and means and opportunities for securing seeds, roots, buds, and grafts, all of which might be done at a trifling expense. Then, with proper encouragement, and such directions as are contained in this work, every man who has even half an acre could secure a small Eden around his premises."

Henry Clay's Family.—Mr. Clay leaves but three sons, and no daughters. Only one of his family, Thomas, was with him when he died. He is the eldest, and a farmer, residing at Lexington, near Ashland. He is about 50 years old. James B. Clay, the second son, our late Charge to Portugal, is a farmer, engaged in heavy business near St. Louis. He is about 36. John, the youngest son, is about 30 years old, and resides at Ashland with his mother. Mr. Clay has had twelve children, and but three of the number survive him. It is said that he has left a competency for his family.

A Western reporter gives the following description of a conflagration: "The devastating element, unsatisfied with floods of water, belched forth its crimson tints and spread the fiery flag of devastation over entire squares, unchecked by the superhuman exertions of the firemen, who seemed like lost spirits in the halls of pandemonium as they flocked around the terrific spectacle."

Curious Will Case.—About the year 1848, Col. Sunderlin, a wealthy planter, residing near Memphis, Tenn., died, leaving a large estate. His will, drawn up a year before his death, and witnessed by a Judge of one of the Courts, divided his whole estate into two parts, devising one-half to his legitimate children, and the other half to ten children borne him by a mulatto slave. These colored children, previous to the making of the will, had been brought to Cincinnati, Ohio, and to Evansville, Indiana, and emancipated. The probate of the will was at once resisted by the white heirs, and appealed to the Circuit Court for trial. Every obstacle known to skillful practioners in the law, has been thrown in the way to defeat the will and defer the trial. At the last May term of the Court, however, the case came to a hearing, and the will was fully established.

Liability of Railroad Companies.—Charles Zedner and others, a few days since, brought an action against the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey, in the New York Superior Court, to recover the value of a box of clothing, placed in the freight cars at Plainfield, N. J., to be delivered to plaintiff at N. Y., taken to the company's office there on a Saturday afternoon, in December last, placed in the freight room, and stolen between Saturday night and Monday morning. The defendant contended that it was placed in the freight-room by plaintiff's direction and remained there at his risk. Verdict for plaintiff, $311, being the value of the contents of the box.

Cost of Railroads.—The St. Louis Intelligencer makes the following rough estimate of the cost of the Western Roads now in progress of construction, together with those that will probably be contracted for within a year or less :—

Great Central Illinois, $16,000,000; Ohio and Mississippi, Illinois, Indiana and Ohio, $9,000,000; Springfield and Alton, Illinois, $1,500,000; Galena and Chicago, Illinois, $4,000,000; Rock Island and Peru, Illinois, $2,000,000; Alton and Terre Haute, Illinois, $3,000,000; Indianapolis and Terre Haute, Indiana, $3,000,000; Pacific and Branches, Missouri, $6,000,000; Other and lateral roads, $10,000,000. Making $45,500,000.

VARIETY.

A man lately started on a truck from the foot of Plane No. 1, on the Portage (Pa.) Railroad, to go to Johnstown, followed closely by a section boat. He seated himself on a keg of powder, and let his truck run at a pretty good gait. A mile or two below the Plane, a wagon loaded with wood, in hastening across the track, dropped a cord wood piece, which threw the truck off, and the man and powder on the track side—the powder bursting open by the fall. The section boat passed over him, literally crushing him to death; at the same time, in striking the truck, by some means or other, ignited the powder, and the man was completely blown up!

As two young ladies in the Texas district school, at Cincinnati, were passing along the street in the western part of the city, a frightened horse came dashing along the sidewalk. Their first impulse was to jump aside into the street, but seeing two small children jogging along directly in the path of the furious animal, each of them seized a child, just as the horse came upon them; one of the ladies struck the horse over the head with her umbrella and turned him aside just sufficently to allow them to escape unhurt. The umbrella was broken by the force of the blow.

The new Insane Hospital at Taunton, Mass., is to cover an area of 26,520 square feet, not including the two courts formed between the wings. The front will be 358 feet long by 40 wide; the main projection from the center 50 by 60 feet, and there will be three wings running back north, 200 feet by 40 wide. A large dome is to be placed over the center of the main building, and two smaller ones from the center of either wing. The whole building is to be three stories high, and from the top of the spire of the large dome to the ground it will be 116 feet.

Munroe & Francis, printers and publishers, is the oldest firm in Boston; it was formed in 1800. These two gentlemen—one seventy years of age and the other seventy-two—have lately published a volume of three hundred pages, the types for which were all set with their own hands. They are gentlemen of property, but pursue these habits of industry as the most agreeable manner in which they can pass the time of their "green old age."

A Committee appointed by the agents of Lowell (Mass.) Mills, to test the relative merits of resin and sperm oil for purposes of lubrication, report that on looms and other machinery of heavy bearings, one-half less powder is required with a mixture of rasin with its bulk of pure sperm oil, than with sperm alone and that its substitution will effect an annual saving of ⅜ of the quantity of sperm oil required in the Lowell Mills.

Numerous are the persons fond of tracing up relationship—when they have ascertained them to be in particularly easy circumstances. Jones visited the house of an opulent old gentleman in the southern part of the State, and passed a month with him on the strength of his being a step-uncle-in-law.

Whenever you get a black eye by a fall, or from running against the bed-post, apply a cloth wrung out of very warm water, and renew it till the pain ceases. The heated moisture liquefies the blood and sends it back to the proper channels. Use warm or hot, never cold water, to apply to the bruise.

A few days since, while an unfeeling boy, who resides in Old Cambridge, was engaged in the cruel sport of robbing birds' nests, he was attacked by a robin, whose nest he had just robbed of its young, who flew at him and came near picking out one of his eyes.

Purpose is the edge and point of character; it is the superscription on the letter of talent. Character without it is blunt and torpid; genius without it is bullion—splendid and uncirculating.

It costs the people of the United States fifteen millions of dollars a year for newspapers and other periodicals—the army and navy cost twice as much. Which is the best investment?

One of our exchanges says that the summer bonnets are as light and airy as some of the pretty heads they adorn.

FAMILY RELIGION.

A Report prepared for, adopted by, and published at the request of the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association. [Concluded.

It is apprehended, that objections and excuses will be urged to this view of the subject, by those who are aware of their want of conformity to it. To anticipate and answer some of these objections, will be [illegible] object next in order.

Some will say, they are not competent to instruct their children. Cases [illegible] not uncommon where parents, on this ground, claim exemption, even from vocal prayer in the presence of the household. That many are lamentably deficient in this respect, is too true to be doubted. One reason is, they were neglected in early life. Certainly, they are not responsible for the use of information which they never had the means to acquire; but the fact that their store is meager, so far from being a good excuse for withholding it from its proper use, is a strong reason why they should use it the more zealously. Who ever heard it argued, that because a man received a portion from his parents, comparatively small, he should sink it in the sea, and let his children beg their bread or starve? The proper exercise of one's ability to teach, is directly calculated to enlarge it. But there is often a want of candor in urging this excuse; for those who do so, do not manifest a like want of confidence in their ability in other respects.

Others say they have no time to devote to such a purpose. Of these, some are wearing themselves out with unreasonable exertions "to lay up something for their children;" and in their eagerness to accomplish the object, they not only neglect their religious instruction, but by their baneful example infuse into their minds a spirit of indifference to the whole subject, which prepares them to bicker and wrangle with each other about the disposition of the paltry treasure, and renders their situation less favorable, even for earthly happiness, than if they had been left to their own resources. Others find their time and attention equally engrossed in the acquisition of the means of enabling their children to imitate, in style and expenditure, a public taste as destitute of discretion as their own. In this way, many parents furnish the means of pampering the vanity of their children, until, with its overgrown dimensions, like the victim of abnormal obesity, they are unable to enjoy their own society. Thus, such plans, even when successful, defeat even the worldly object sought. If, therefore, they are unwisely laid in this respect, what must they be in the light of their influence upon the future destiny of those in whose behalf they are prosecuted? Others, still, denying these charges, complain of a want of time to devote to the religious training of their children, because it is all consumed in the labor necessary to supply the primary wants of food, clothing, and shelter. Let such be asked, if the eternal destinies of the soul involve interests so vastly inferior to those connected with this hand-breadth of physical existence, as to possess no claim for a share of the time so exclusively appropriated to their interests?

Others excuse themselves from the discharge of this duty, because it is so embarrassing, both to them and their children. But neither party was embarrassed when the prattling child asked the parent whether "God had any house up in the sky," or "who made his clothes," unless it was told to "stop asking such foolish questions, and go away." If so, and the next time the two met on the subject was when the inquirer, having taken many a corrupting lesson, of a more willing teacher, had grown to an impulsive youth, no one need wonder if both parties were embarrassed.

Others do not bring the subject before the minds of their children, because "they do not want them to come out in religion till they get old enough to live it." They "have seen so many children backslide," that they "think they had better be let alone." What! children too young to repent of their sins?—too young to love God?—too young to become heirs of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ? What ideas to guide a Christian parent in the discharge of duty! There is a cause why so many children that profess religion early, fall out by the way, which the objection does not reach. There is not that amount of Christian labor bestowed upon them which they need to put them on their guard against the assaults of temptation; and it is feared, that an unwillingness to become responsible for such care and exertion, is in many instances the strongest reason why parents would prefer to have them converted at a later period in life.

Others say their children despise their instructions when offered. That, no doubt, is true. But the parent ought not to be released from responsibility without a cross-examination. If those professors of religion, with whom the young have spent most of their existence, have entirely failed to exemplify it in their daily lives, we need not wonder that the sentiment is cherished, if it is not expressed—"Physician, heal thyself."

Finally, it may be objected, that this plan, though well enough in theory, is not practicable. To this, it is answered, that God has generally recognized his appointment in the case, by allowing those parents who make thorough effort for the purpose, to impress their own sentiments upon the minds of their children. Indeed, he has evidently refused to interfere with his appointment, even to prevent bad parents from stamping their errors and vices upon their children. It is admitted, that this influence is often opposed by others—sometimes for good, and at others the result is evil; but never to the subversion of the principle, that the parent, other things being equal, has a decided advantage in giving direction to the mind, of the child. The extent to which the descendants of those professing any form of religion come fully under its control, bears almost an exact proportion to the extent to which its principles are taught in the household. This is true of of Paganism. In those countries where it appears under any of its forms, the people are almost all under its control; and there is a corresponding extent of family training. It is equally true of Mohammedism. Even that class of persons who swarm about public houses and thoroughfares for employment, are generally devotees; and no emergency is sufficient to deter them from their religious performances. Here, too, we see a like care taken of the interests of religion in the family circle. Romanism furnishes another example. Who has failed to notice the extent to which the descendants of papists manifest their confidence in that faith; not merely in the zeal of their defense of its dogmas, but by compliance with such of its observances and ceremonies as will not allow of compromise? The fact is equally notorious, that the outlines of that penciling, which, when completed, constitutes the "mark of the beast," is wrought by parental hands.

It may be said, that these systems, which do not strike at the root of depravity, are more easily impressed upon the mind. But let it be remembered, that none of these systems are without their exactions of self-denial. Such are their penances, their tortures, and their sacrifices of human life. It is difficult to see how the mind should imbibe the spirit of self-denial, when its demands, if fully met, can result in no earthly good, more than when it calls for action, the temporal benefit of which can be plainly seen, and which also offers equal promise of being acceptable to the object of worship.

It may be said, that the advocates of true religion, as taught in the Gospel, labor under the disadvantage of not being able to do the whole work of bringing others fully under its control. But if God had as little occasion to find fault with Christian parents for a neglect of the part assigned them in the conversion of their children, as they have to be troubled about the performance of that which He has put beyond their reach, they would have no occasion to complain of their disadvantage, compared with the heathen.

Some of the difficulties that lie in the way of success in this enterprise, have already been the subjects of incidental allusion; but attention is here called to a single one in addition—that is, deficiency in government. This parental function, when properly exercised, proves a powerful auxiliary to a judicious course of religious instruction; but when neglected, or misused, the result is often equally powerful in thwarting all its prospects of success. In its proper exercise, it is of the utmost importance that the parents should be united. In many respects, deficiencies in one can be comparatively remedied by faithfulness and perseverance in the other; but in this case, such a result is scarcely to be looked for. It may be regarded as too severe a criticism, to intimate, that the worst of these difficulties consists in a want of a complete development of Christian character; but it is feared that many, who, in this respect, would bear the scrutiny of public observation tolerably well, would, when submitted to the searching tests of the domestic circle, suffer decided loss. The subject of frequent and prayerful self-examination is earnestly commended to the attention of all those who have met with difficulties in this department of labor, in the hope that, seen in this light, they will give way to that earnest struggle of soul, and reliance on God, with which they are taught to labor for other attainments in Vital Piety, though they have proved invulnerable to every other means.

If the views here presented are any near approach to truth, how overwhelming the responsibility of Christian parents! In their keeping, to a fearful extent, is placed, not only the earthly interests, but the eternal destinies of those committed to their charge; and in their influence over them, they hold the power to control the prospective interests of Religion and the Church.

But when this responsibility is fully appreciated and met, a faithful panorama of the scenes that are opened affords a view of surpassing sublimity and grandeur. That scene, where the youthful parents kneel on either side of the cradle where sleeps their first born, while each breathes a fervent prayer in its dedication to God, and, rising, shake hands above that smiling emblem of innocence, as a pledge of fidelity to the solemn obligations which accompanied their welcome charge; that, where the mother takes by the hand her child, agitated and tearful, from emotions kindled by the burning words of instruction so often heard—words which have shed a glaring light on every folly—and leads the way to the closet, and there, prostrate before God, pleads the merit of a Saviour's blood in behalf of the sin-awakened object of her solicitude; that, where the whole family gather around the altar, to mingle their expressions of gratitude to God for the conversion of the last and youngest member; that, where venerable parents hear their children, from a position of eminence and usefulness, acknowledge, like Henry Ward Beecher of his Father, in the dedication of his admirable work, Lectures to Young Men; and the late lamented ex-President, John Quincy Adams, of his Mother, that to them, under God, they are indebted for all that they are, or hope to be; all these defy the chisel of the sculptor, and the limner's brush. But these are only the preludes of that ultimate gathering of faithful parents and all the redeemed of their children, to the latest generation, in the kingdom of God, when they shall, for the first time, see the full harvest of their labor.

THE WATCHER.

The following is from a forthcoming volume of poems by Mrs. E. C. Judson (Fanny Forrester.) It bears (says the Independent) the unmistakable marks of its Asiatic origin, describing the emotions of a true woman's heart, as she sat by the bedside of her dying husband, in the midst of scenes and sounds and airs so truly Oriental Sleep, love, sleep!

The dusty day is done.
Lo! from afar the freshening breezes sweep,
Wide over groves of balm,
Down from the towering palm,
In at the open casement cooling run,
And round thy lowly bed,
Thy bed of pain,
Bathing thy patient head,
Like grateful showers of rain,
They come;
While the white curtains, waving to and fro,
Fan the sick air:
And pityingly the shadows come and go,
With gentle human care,
Compassionate and dumb.

The dusty day is done,
The night begun;
While prayerful watch I keep,
Sleep, love, sleep!
Is there no magic in the touch
Of fingers thou dost love so much?
Fain would they scatter poppies o'er thee now,
Or with a soft caress,
The tremulous lip its own nepenthe press
Upon the weary lid and aching brow.
While prayerful watch I keep,
Sleep love, sleep!

On the pagoda spire
The bells are swinging,
Their little golden circles in a flutter
With tales the wooing winds have dared to utter,
Till all are singing
As if a choir
Of golden-nested birds in heaven were singing;
And with a lulling sound
The music floats around,
And drops like balm into the drowsy ear;
Commingling with the hum
Of the Sepoy's distant drum,
And lazy beetle ever droning near.
Sounds these of deepest silence born,
Like night made visible by morn;
So silent, that I sometimes start
To hear the throbbings of my heart,
And watch, with shivering sense of pain,
To see thy pale lids lift again.

The lizard, with his mouse-like eyes,
Peeps from the mortise in surprise
At such strange quiet after day's harsh din;
Then ventures boldly out,
And looks about,
And with his hollow feet
Treads his small evening beat,
Darting upon his prey
In such a trickey, winsome sort of way,
His delicate marauding seems no sin.
And still the curtains swing,
But noiselessly;
The bells a melancholy murmur ring,
As tears were in the sky;
More heavily the shadows fall,
Like the black foldings of a pall,
Where juts the rough beam from the wall;
The candles flare
With fresher gusts of air;
The beetle's drone
Turns to a dirge-like, solitary moan;
Night deepens, and I sit, in cheerless doubt, alone.

THINK TWICE.

"Did Horner pay the bill?" inquired Mr. Gilbert of his clerk, who had just come in.

The young man shook his head.

"Didn't pay it?"

"No, sir."

"What answer did he give?"

"He was angry, and said that he wished you wouldn't send after the bill any more—that when he was ready he would bring you the money, and not before."

"He said that, did he?" Mr. Gilbert spoke with considerable excitement of manner.

"Yes, sir. I never called on him that he didn't get out of patience, and say something unpleasant."

"Very well," replied Mr. Gilbert, in a menacing tone; "give me the bill. I'll collect it." And taking up his hat he left the store.

Within two or three blocks was the office of an alderman, and thither his steps were turned.

"Thank fortune, there's a short way to deal with men in these cases." Thus Mr. Gilbert talked to himself as he moved rapidly along.

"Not send my bill, indeed. Why don't he come and pay, if he's so nice in these matters? He doesn't mean to pay, that's the true reason. But he is dealing with the wrong man, and he will find this out before he is twenty-four hours older. He can bluff off a clerk, but will find a city bailiff a different sort of a customer."

Horner, the offender in this case, was a poor tailor, who had become indebted to Gilbert for groceries. The amount of his bill was sixty-six dollars—a very large sum for him, and far exceeding what he had supposed it would be. Sickness and the loss of a child had, some months previously, lessened his income, and also burdened him with unusual expenses. But for this, he would not have become indebted. Honest and sensitive, the debt worried him. Instead, however, of going to Mr. Gilbert, and asking him to let the obligation stand for a short time, until he could pay it off gradually, he kept away from him, and fretted himself with thinking over the unpleasant relation he bore to the grocer. As was to have been expected, the bill came in. The clerk by whose hands it was sent, made his demands in a style that Horner thought rude, if not insulting.

This was more in imagination than in reality.

"I can't pay this now," was the tailor's brief answer. He spoke with a troubled voice and countenance. The clerk interpreted his manner by the word anger.

"When will you settle it?" he inquired, with something peremptory in his voice.

"I can't tell," said Horner, in a short, quick tone of voice.

The clerk bowed and went away. His report did not please the grocer, who, in a few days, sent again for the money. The second demand came upon Horner while he was thinking of the bill, and hopelessly casting about in his mind for some means of paying it. Not possessing a great deal of self-control, he unwisely uttered an expression of impatience the moment he saw the clerk of Gilbert.

"Well, sir; what about that bill?" said the clerk.

"It's no use to keep calling on me," replied Horner; "as soon as I have the money, I will see Mr. Gilbert."

A third time the clerk called. Poor Horner was in a very unhappy state of mind. He had been thinking of little else beside the grocer's bill all the morning; in his mind was a nervous presentiment that he should have a visit that day from the collector. He was not in error. Even as the thought troubled him, open swung the door, and the messenger of Gilbert entered.

"See here, young man," exclaimed Horner, before the other had time to speak, "just tell Gilbert not to send that bill here again. It won't bring the money an hour sooner. When I am ready I will pay it, and not before."

The clerk turned off and left the shop, without a word of reply.

"That wasn't right, John," said the tailor's wife, in a tone of gentle reproof, after the lapse of five minutes. She wisely forebore to speak until time enough had elapsed for her irritable husband to regain a degree of self-composure.

"I know it wasn't," answered Horner, pausing in his work, and giving vent to his feelings in a heavy sigh. "I know it wasn't. But this constant dunning is hard to bear. He knows as well as I do, that he will get his money as soon as I can possibly earn it."

"No, John, not as well as you do," said the wife mildly. "He cannot see your thoughts."

There was a brief silence.

"Have you seen Mr. Gilbert, John?" inquired Mrs. Horner.

"No. But—"

The tailor hesitated. He saw what was in the mind of his wife, and he felt its force.

"Don't you think it would be better to see him and explain just how it is with you? I don't believe he would give you any trouble if you were to go. There is no telling what kind of messages his clerk takes to him. If he gives simply your words to-day, Mr. Gilbert will be angry, and there is no knowing what he might be tempted to do."

"I don't want to see him," replied Horner, "I can't bear to look into a man's face, if I owe him money."

The wife sighed, but did not answer. Both remained silent for some time. Horner's own mind soon suggested all that his wife wished, but hesitated to say. It was but right for him to see the grocer, explain to him fully his position, and after assuring him of his honest intention to pay every dollar of the debt, ask of him a liberal extension of time.

"I will see him," said he at length, pausing suddenly in his own work, and getting down from his table. In a little while he was ready to go out, when he started forth to see his creditor.

In the meantime Gilbert had kept on his way toward the alderman's, fully resolved to hand his debtor over to the tender mercies of the law. He was within a few doors of the office when he met a friend.

What's the matter?" inquired this individual, "you look as if you were going to sue somebody."

"Just what I am about doing," replied the grocer.

"Ah, indeed! Who is the hard case that requires such a stringent measure!"

"Horner, the tailor. You know him, I believe."

"Yes, very well. But you are not going to sue him?"

"Indeed I am."

"How much does he owe you?"

"Sixty odd dollars."

"I'd think twice before I troubled poor Horner," said the other, shaking his head.

"He sends me only insulting answers," replied Gilbert. "I've dunned him for his indebtness until I am tired."

"Perhaps you have dunned him too hard. He is sensitive and irritable."

"No, I've only sent three or four times. This morning he returned for an answer that he would pay me when he was ready, and not before."

"And on the spur of the moment you have determined to put the account in an alderman's hands."

"I have."

"Too hasty, friend Gilbert. In all matters of this kind it is better to think twice. Remember that Horner had sickness and death in his family. These I know have thrown him back. Here lies the cause of slowness in paying. But surely these things ought to entitle him to consideration. He is honest; I am certain of this."

"I did'nt think about his sickness and the loss of his child," said Gilbert, in a modified tone. "But this is no justification for the rude, unsatisfactory answer he sent to my application for money."

"Of course not. But every man cannot, al all times, control his feelings. An honest mind often feels a quick sense of indignation, when a demand is made for a debt where present inability to pay exists. This is no doubt the case with Horner. Honest in his intention, he felt your repeated applications as questioning that honesty, and he could not bear the imputation with becoming patience."

The two men separated. Gilbert had thought twice; and instead of going to the magistrate's office, returned to his store. There, a little to his surprise, he found the tailor waiting him. They met with some reserve and embarrassment, but Horner said, in a moment or two, and in a subdued voice—

"I am sorry, Mr. Gilbert, to have kept you out of your money so long; nothing has prevented my paying you but inability. I have had sickness and trouble, or it would not be with me as it is. I felt worried when your clerk called to-day, and sent you an improper message. Let me recall that. And now, I will tell you the best I can do. If you will take from me five dollars a month until the whole bill is settled, I will faithfully pay you that much, and more if it is possible."

"Perfectly satisfactory," replied Gilbert, in a voice so cordial that it sent the blood bounding through the veins of the unhappy tailor. "If you had only made this proposition before it would have been cheerfully accepted."

When the two men separated, each was wiser and each felt happier. The tailor kept his engagement, and the grocer not only received his money, but retained a good customer. So much for sober, second thoughts.

ELIGIBILITY TO CIVIL OFFICE.

The following exhibition of sound doctrine upon the subject treated of, is from the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser of June 30th. We deem it well worthy of a place in a religious newspaper, and we hope it will receive a careful perusal. It may serve to clear the mist from before the eyes of some, who think that a man's religion has nothing to do with his politics.

> We have received half a dozen letters, inquiring whether Gen. Scott is or is not a Roman Catholic, and intimating that the answer will materially affect his vote, should he be nominated at Baltimore. We beg leave to answer all at once, that we don't know to what religious denomination Gen. Scott is attached. [Tribune.
>
> We agree with the Tribune, that this is a matter of no political concern to anybody. Were Gen. Scott a Roman Catholic, his real claims upon the popular support would be just as strong as they are now, and no stronger. Yet we wonder that the Tribune, which is so ready to communicate information when it possesses it, should not have satisfied its inquisitive correspondents by referring to a published letter of Gen Scott's, dated Nov. 10th, 1841, containing the following language:—
>
> I am happy to see by the Philadelphia National American that religion is to be excluded as a party element. Staunch Protestant as I am, both my birth and conviction, I shall never consent to a party or state religion. Religion is too sacred a thing to be mingled up with either. It should always be kept between each individual and his God, except in the way of reason and gentle persuasion; as in families, churches, and other occasions of voluntary attendance after years of descretion, or reciprocal consent. [Courier & Enquirer.

This subject has been freely talked about for some time, the Tribune's remarks having left a general impression that Gen. Scott is a Roman Catholic, or something very near akin thereto. The quotation made by the Courier, however, sets that matter at rest, and there is no room to doubt General Scott's Protestantism, while in the above letter, and by his conduct in Mexico, he has shown himself so liberal toward those holding another faith that his catholicity—we use the word in its proper sense—is equally placed beyond question.

The Tribune and Courier agree in the sentiment, that if General Scott had been a Roman Catholic, that would not have barred his real claims upon popular support. The constitution neither imposes special restrictions nor grants peculiar privileges to any religious faith. It would be folly, however, to suppose that such a fact would be overlooked by great numbers of the people, or to deny that the people would have a right to take that fact into consideration. Inasmuch as Protestantism and Popery are antagonistic, and as all history has shown that the exaltation of Popery is inimical to human liberty, it is by no means improbable, that those who are Protestants from conviction would hesitate about voting for a Roman Catholic for Chief Magistrate of this republic. Not that the candidate's religious faith formed a legal or constitutional impediment to his elevation—nor that there would be any desire among the people to abridge the Roman Catholic citizen of any civil right. Very far from it. But they would remember that the occupancy of the Presidential chair is no man's right; that the high office is the gift of the people. The citizen has the right to ask for it—to be a candidate—but it remains for his fellow citizens, after duly weighing his merits and demerits, to elect him or set him aside.

In making such a decision—in conferring the boon or withholding it—the individual citizen has the right to form his judgment upon either personal or political, moral or religious, grounds. The constitution no more prohibits the citizen from voting on religious grounds than it disqualifies him for any office for religious reasons. It leaves religion as a matter between man and his Maker, and the Papist on principle, or the Protestant from conviction, is as free to act up to his principles at the ballot-box as elsewhere. In the eye of the constitution and the law, Roman Catholics are very properly as eligible for the highest office as Protestants; and we for one devoutly trust that this may ever be the genius of our institutions. We would not abridge a hair's breadth the equal civil rights of all citizens. But the constitution never designed to interfere with the individual's sacred religious convictions. It intended sacredly to guard them and to insure their free exercise at all times, without hinderance or detriment; and if a man believes conscientiously that Popery is a system subversive of freedom and the rights of conscience, of course he has a perfect right to be influenced by that conviction at the ballot-box. Therein he wrongs no man. He simply refuses a favor, the solicitation for which necessarily implies that he possesses the right of refusal.

We make these remarks because a great individual right seemed to be assailed in the article of the Tribune, from which the Courier has quoted only a couple of sentences,—and something of the same kind is implied in the remarks of the Courier and Enquirer—not the right of the Protestant merely, or of the Roman Catholic only, for both are equal in all civic relations, but the right of the man, of the American citizen. The teaching of our cotemporaries would seem to be, that no individual can lawfully withhold his vote on religious grounds. That when a candidate for civic station appears before him for his support, he has no right to inquire of what religion he is. This we deny. The appointing power has always the right to judge of the qualifications of the person appointed, or soliciting to be appointed. If the appointed be chosed for other qualifications, then his religious sentiments are no barrier to his tenure of office. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States is a Roman Catholic. If General Scott, instead of being a staunch Protestant, had been a staunch Papist, he would have been no less constitutionally eligible for the Presidency, but whether "his claims to popular support would be just as strong as they are now," is another question, and depends upon circumstances. Protestantism and Roman Catholicism are not mere theories. They are substantive things—mighty principles—upon which the electors have a right to pass judgment, and which should be taken into account.

The constitution does not disqualify a Roman Catholic clergyman for the office of chaplain to either House of Congress. He has just as much right to that office as General Scott or Mr. Pierce to that of the Presidency, but "his real claims" upon the support of the members of either House are not regarded as so strong as those of clergymen of the Protestant faith. The House of Representatives and the Senate both exercise the right of refusing Roman Catholics for their chaplains, and the people have an equal right to refuse a Roman Catholic for Chief Magistrate, if they deem it expedient. The country might be placed in circumstances when the supremacy of one religious system or the other would be a matter of very serious moment, especially as, unlike Protestantism, Roman Catholicism is not simply and purely a religious system, but a vast temporal and political agency also. The constitution makes the people the judges of a man's qualifications for the Chief Magistracy—gives to them the power of selecting the person and conferring upon him the dignity—simply providing that religious tenants are no disqualification, so that they may, if they choose, elect a Roman Catholic, or one of any other creed, as seems best to them. The right of private judgment in such matters is secured to all parties without detriment to their political or civil privileges.

In our humble judgment, the staunch Protestantism of General Scott is a much stronger recommendation than the reverse would have been. We should have regretted had he been a bigot of any faith, for bigotry is hatefull at all times and under every garb. We all know, however, that General Scott is no bigot in religious matters, but a liberal, catholic gentleman. As such he will be acceptable to Romanists as well as to Protestants. But we would far rather see the genius of Protestantism in the ascendant than the genius of Popery, all history warning us of the tendency of latter to withhold knowledge from the people, to grasp at temporal and political power under the guise of spiritual sovereignty, and to enforce its religious dogmas by pains, penalties and thraldom. Nor for the sake of party triumphs would we blink the radical difference between the two systems, or subscribe to the dictum that the people have "no right to inquire into a candidate's religious opinions," especially with respect to the vital distinction between Protestantism and Popery. The constitution warrants no such dictum. It simply provides that whomsoever the people choose to make President shall not be disqualified for that office because of any religious views he may entertain. This is the sum and substance of its provisions, and it leaves to the givers of the office the right of private judgment as to the qualifications of him who solicits the gift.

CONVERSION OF REV. J. G. ONCKEN.

A striking illustration of the good which may be done by humble Christians, is given in the following anecdote, related at the recent meeting of the American Baptist Publication Society:—

Just before taking up the collection, the Rev. Dr. Belcher related an anecdote. In the last congregation he served in England, he had for regular hearers once on the Lord's day and on a week evening, two excellent persons connected with a Congregational church in a distant part of the town. Of this church, the good brother, a respectable mechanic, was a deacon. Both he and his wife were eminent for simple piety, fervent devotion, and quiet, untiring zeal. They had very small talents, but much religion. In their family boarded a young man, also a mechanic, of foreign birth, but now pursuing his calling in London. He knew nothing of religion, but was amiable and obliging, and greatly devoted to pleasure as the source of his happiness.

For some time after he began to live with them, when the Bible, morning and evening, was laid on the table, indicative of family worship, it was a signal for his leaving the room, but after a short time, influenced by the amiable spirit and manners of the worthy John Cottman and his wife, he occasionally stayed to observe this solemnity. One evening, he came home to dress, that he might visit a place of amusement, when the good deacon said, "I think you had better go with me, and enjoy pleasure greater than that which you are going to?'

"Where are you going?' was the inquiry of the young man.

"To the prayer meeting at our church," replied the good deacon.

"A prayer meeting, what is that?'

"Why, we meet to sing hymns, read the Scriptures, and to ask God to bless us."

The young man hesitated.

"You had much better go," said the good old lady, in her usual kind tone.

"So I will," was the reply.

He went, and in that meeting of some dozen persons, held in the vestry of the Congregational church, Maize Hill, Greenwich, did God open and soften his heart, and excited feelings which led him to the Saviour of sinners for pardon. Such was the early history of John G. Oncken, of whose labors, carried on in the spirit of martyrdom, they had heard so much, and in whose present persecutions they now took so fearful an interest. The speaker added, that could they have seen the weeping gratitude, the smile of almost rapturous joy, which he had seen on the face of the devoted Oncken, as they talked together in the city of London, of John Cottman and his wife, they would feel an increasing determination individually to labor for souls—would cherish even more interest in the labors and sorrows of our missionary brother, and add something more than they had previously intended to place in the collection boxes. The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, July 22, 1852.

FAMILY PRAYER.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

I have noticed, in the Recorder of June 3, a piece entitled "Denominational Sins;" and if it would not be considered out of place, I should be pleased to remark upon some things contained therein, particularly those which relate to Family Prayer.

In expressing your feelings of regret and mortification that your people so generally neglect family prayer, you make use of nearly the same words which I have heard used by ministers, when reproving their people for the neglect of the Sunday "Sabbath." You say, "Our people are grossly and criminally negligent of family prayer. We are ashamed to place it on record, knowing the opinion that will consequently be formed of us by all the pious, and perhaps the impious, of the land." Again, "There have been found among us those who not only would apologize for their neglect of this duty, but even endeavor to defend it." Again, "But we feel bound to protest, with uplifted hand, against this sin; yes, this denominational sin."

It seems to me, that the Scripture which you quoted (Matt. 18, 19) to prove family prayer to be a divine injunction, is in no wise applicable to that ceremony, as at present understood and performed; not a word said about family prayer, as such; no period when, nor form how, it should be offered; but only that they agree touching what they should ask—a consideration very seldom if ever fulfilled in family prayer. I think our Saviour was teaching the efficacy of prayer, and not the duty of a ceremony.

I have examined the other passage, (Jer. 10: 25,) and taking the whole text in view, I cannot imagine how you wish to use it; whether it is to prove that the families composing the Seventh-day Baptist Church are heathen, and strangers to God; or, that family prayer is obligatory on the heathen, and those who have devoured Jacob and eaten him up. If national prayer was practiced, the divine obligation could be proved by Psalm 79: 6, 7.

If the Scriptures do not enjoin family prayer, (which I sincerely think they do not,) then it is not a duty which we owe to God; and, if not a duty, the neglect of it cannot be "criminal," or a "sin." In 1 John 3: 4, it is said, "Whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law; for sin is the transgression of the law." Now, you have accused your people of committing sin, in doing, or not doing, that upon which the requirements and prohibitions of God are silent—when they have transgressed no law, but the law of the church; thus conveying the impression, that the requirements of the church and the requirements of God are identical. This impression prevails among all religious denominations. Catholics say (in their confession of faith) that they "believe in apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions;" that is, as I understand it, in their saving efficacy. Protestants are not willing to confess that they believe in ecclesiastical traditions, but they practice them, and then, by twisting the word of truth, and by putting forced and false constructions upon it, endeavor to make it appear that they are apostolical traditions. Witness the Sunday tradition. I think that alone is evidence sufficient to convince the Sabbath-keeper of the truth of the above assertion. I design the above remark to apply particularly to family prayer; and I think your scripture references, and the way you construe them, abundantly illustrative of the fact. But the remark, however, will apply with equal truth to the Sunday tradition, and a host of other traditions, forms and ceremonies, "which a blind superstition established and still venerates." The Sunday Sabbath, and family prayer, I believe, have their origin from the same source; to wit, Rome—the Mother of harlots; to whom it is said, "By thy sorceries were all nations deceived." They have undergone several alterations since their first establishment; the last of which was made about two hundred years ago, by the General Assembly of Westminster, and that of Edinburgh. The first of these institutions was remodeled, and made a Christian Sabbath; the other was enjoined on the head of every family, be to performed morning and evening, under the penalty of excommunication. They say, in the fourth paragraph of the Directory for Family Worship, "Seeing the ordinary performance of all the parts of family worship belongeth properly to the head of the family, the minister is to stir up such as are lazy, and train up such as are weak, to a fitness for these exercises." Now, in regard to the lazy and indolent of your people, I am confident you have fully discharged the duties of your office to them; but in regard to the weak, it may be necessary to catechize them, and, in some cases, to furnish them with a form of prayer, and so "train" them up to a "fitness to these exercises," that they may be saved from this "denominational sin."

From what I have said of family prayer, and because I think there is no Divine injunction for any stated, periodical prayer, I would not have you infer, that I am content to live without prayer; no, not by any means. But it is enough for me to know, that God has given the privilege to pray; and, that his word is pledged, that if I ask any thing according to his will, he will give it me. But God forbid that I should ever once go to him with a lie in my mouth, saying I want this, or I want that, when in fact I do not feel the want of either. This is lying unto the Lord—mocking the Most High. (Matt. 15: 8.) And this, family prayer is eminently calculated to cause us to do; and we ought to "shun every appearence of evil."

My sincere desire is, that all should study, with prayerful attention, the revealed will of God, to ascertain what are the actual requirements of our Heavenly Father, in contradistinction to the requirements of that man of sin, who "sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God." And every religious form, ceremony, and observance, not found in the Scriptures, depend on it, that it is not a requirement of God; but of that man of sin; it is the worship of the beast. It may be said to professed Christians now, as it was to the Jews, "In vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men." For the fullness, and perfection of the Scriptures, as a rule of action for the people of God, see 2 Tim. 3: 16, 17.

Yours affectionately,
ERASTUS CLARK.

Remarks.

We did not quote Matt. 18: 19 as directly enjoining family prayer. We quoted it to prove just what our correspondent admits that it proves, namely, the efficacy of concerted prayer; and then, by a just inference, we applied it to family prayer. Please open your eyes a little when you read.

Neither did we refer to Jer. 10: 25 as specifically enjoining the duty. We needed not our correspondent's exegesis, to show us that the families spoken of may refer to the heathen kingdoms, arrayed against Jacob, to devour and consume him, and to render his habitation desolate. But if a kingdom is guilty for not calling on God's name, is it not a just inference, that the families of which the kingdom is composed are guilty? What is a family, but a little kingdom, in itself? And as it is not said how large the kingdom must be, to become obnoxious to the Divine "fury," it is very fair to presume, that those little kingdoms called families are not altogether secure while they neglect to invoke the name of the Lord.

All that our correspondent says about the analogy of our reasoning to that by which the claims of Sunday to sanctification are supported, simply shows how easily he can confound things, which, in their very nature, are distinct. It is claimed for the Sunday observance, that it is a positive institution; whereas, for family prayer, we claim, simply, that it is a moral duty. Hence, the mere fact that it is not enjoined in so many words, is a weak subterfuge. A book designed for universal use, and for every variety of circumstances, in all ages of the world, could not enjoin every duty specifically. All it could do is just what the Bible has done, namely, to inculcate general principles, leaving the diversified application of these principles to the reason and concience. It is not directly enjoined, that if a man find a well-filled pocket-book in the street, he shall advertise for the owner. But it is certainly comprehended in the general duty of restoring to the owner that which he has lost. And thousands of instances, of a like nature, might be mentioned. Positive institutions stand on a different footing. We have a right to demand express precepts for them. There is no general principle laid down with regard to them, from which particular positive duties could be determined.

As for family prayer, it is deducible from the expressly commanded duty of bringing up children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; a duty, the performance of which lacks completeness, unless it is accompanied with prayer for the Divine blessing. It is argued from the example of Abraham, whose piety received this commendation, that he commanded his children and his household after him to keep the way of the Lord. Gen. 18: 19. It is argued from the instance of Joshua, who covenanted, not only for himself, but for his house, to serve the Lord. Josh. 24: 15. It is inferable from the fact, that God's design, in the institution of the family compact, was "that he might seek a godly seed." Mal. 2: 15. The fact that God is the author of the family compact—the institutor of it—argues the duty of the family, as such, to acknowledge and worship him. For if it be the duty of a single individual to pray daily to Him who is the author of his existence, it is a clear and just inference, that it is the duty of whatever compact, community, or organization He is the author of, to pray to him also. For an organized band of gamblers, or robbers, or murderers, to meet together daily for the purpose of invoking the Divine blessing, would be a monstrous profanation. Why? Because God is not the institutor of such an organization, but is every way opposed to it. But there is such a beautiful propriety in a church's meeting together for prayer, that we need no argument—the spontaneous suggestions of conscience are enough—to make us feel, that it would be wrong for it to do otherwise. We feel so because the church is an organization of God's own instituting. And is not the family quite as much so? Is it not God that setteth the solitary in families? Ps. 68: 6. Is it not He that "maketh the barren woman to keep house, and to be a joyful mother of children?" Ps. 113: 9.

These, then, are some of the general principles, from which the duty of family prayer follows, by just and necessary consequence. We will add, that if the want of an express precept for the "ceremony," as our correspondent is pleased to call it, proves that it is not a duty, then, by the same argument, it may be proved that even personal or individual prayer is not a duty. For, certainly, our Saviour's reference to it (Matt. 6: 5, 6,) cannot be regarded as an express injunction of the duty itself, any more than his reference to alms-giving and fasting, in the same connection, is to be regarded as expressly enjoining those duties. All that can be said of it is, that our Saviour recognizes it as a duty already known and acknowledged. The directness of his precept respects, simply, the manner of attending to the duty, namely, that it be secret.

The first passage of Scripture in which prayer is mentioned, is Abraham's prayer for Ishmael. Gen. 17: 18. The next is his intercession for Sodom. Gen. 18: 23. But even there, it is not mentioned as a duty which was before unknown; nor will any man of good sense undertake to say, that prayer was never, before that time, known as a duty. Indeed, whoever will examine, carefully, the different passages where prayer is spoken of, will find that in not a single instance is it alluded to in any other light than as a duty already known, confessed, and practiced. Whatever is commanded concerning it, respects either the time, manner, spirit, or some other circumstance with which the performance ought to be connected.

We are convinced, that neither our correspondent, nor any one else, will say that personal prayer was not a duty till the world was two thousand years old, notwithstanding the Scriptures make no allusion to it till that time. He knows, full well, that prayer was the duty of man, the very moment that he became conscious of his dependence and his wants. It was the duty of Adam, the first transgressor. It was the duty of Abel, a sinner saved by grace. It was the duty of Cain, who rejected that grace. To constitute it a duty, it was not necessary that it should be expressly commanded. And are not families as dependent as individuals? Are they not equally the subjects of want?

What shall be said of that form of prayer which our Lord taught his disciples? Matt. 6: 9—13. Is it not eminently a social prayer? It appears not to be designed for the closet, exclusively, for it is addressed to the Father by more persons than one. And that it was not designed exclusively for the church, is evident from the fact that it embraces a petition for daily supplies of food, and is designed to be daily offered; whereas, men cannot be assembled in the church every day. But how beautifully appropriate for the family! Struck with its appropriateness to the family circle, a certain writer has beautifully said, "What a live coal is applied to devotion, when the solitary my Father, and my God, is changed into the social our Father, and our God!" Do you not think so, too, Bro. Clark?

We have said, that we were "ashamed to place it upon record," that our people were so negligent of this great duty. We are still more ashamed, that any one can be found sufficiently daring to defend the sin, even to the extent of denouncing family prayer as having originated with the Mother of Harlots! Yet he "would not have us infer that he lives without prayer; no, not by any means." Verily, it is well that he has told us so. For, though it might be a breach of charity to think that every neglecter of family prayer neglects also his closet, we should certainly think, that any one who is very fervent in closet devotions would be kept from the sin of standing forth as a public vindicator of the evil we are laboring to correct. We will believe him, however; and we will add, that it is some little satisfaction to us, to discover that he feels it necessary to make such an announcement. It shows that he is not without his misgivings, whether the defense which he has put in will not, after all, be regarded, by the unsophisticated reader, as proceeding from a prayerless heart.

One or two plain questions to our correspondent, and we have done.

1. If you knew of a mother, who, in her anxiety for the eternal welfare of her little child, should retire with him to a suitable place, and there, placing her hands upon his little head, should implore the blessing of Heaven upon him, and should do this daily, morning and evening, would you not esteem her the more highly for it?

2. And as, where two are agreed as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them, if the father should unite with the mother in this exercise, would you think there was any thing amiss in it?

3. And if, in due time, God should give them another child to train up for heaven, and they should then take that one also into the prayer room, and for them both supplicate the mercy of God, would it not be right? Would it not be just what they ought to do?

4. And should a third child be added to the family, and then a fourth, and so on, can you think of any good reason why they should not all be taken into the prayer room together, that father and mother might together beseech God to be merciful, and bless them, and keep them from evil?

5. And if you knew of the head of a family, who daily practiced this course, would you, could you, find it in your heart, to go to him, and say, 'Leave off this practice, it originated with the mother of harlots?' T. B. B.

OUR CHINA MISSION.—By way of San Francisco, we last week received letters from brethren Carpenter and Wardner, dated at Shanghae, April 9, 1852. They and their families were well at that time, and were prosecuting their missionary work with zeal and cheerfulness. The following paragraph, is from a letter of Mr. Carpenter:—

"A short time ago, Rev. Mr. Jenkins, of the Methodist Mission, started for Nankin. He went as far as Lu Chou, where he was recognized, and could not proceed. He was treated with rudeness, but befriended by a gentleman with whom he passed a night and formed an agreeable acquaintance, and with whom he has corresponded since his return. Soon after his return, his colleague, Rev. Mr. Taylor, had his head shaved, a tail braded into his hair, put on Chinese clothes thoroughout, and started off altogether as a Chinaman. He did not stop at Lu Chou, but proceeded directly to Nankin. Thirteen miles of the distance he rode on a wheel-barrow, with two men, one to pull, the other to push. At one place he saw a nine-stored cast-iron miniature pagoda, about eight feet in diameter at the base. At Nankin, while about to ascend the porcelain tower, which is a nine-storied pagoda, built by a former Emperor, in honor of his mother, and said to be 329 feet high, he was interrogated by the priest as to his name and residence. His guide told the priest that he (Taylor) had read books so much that he had become mad, and that, if he should proceed with his questions, he would be torn in pieces. After that he was quiet. But I have not time for farther particulars now."

THE CANADA MISSION.—Eld. W. M. Jones is now on a tour of exploration in Canada, with a view to decide on the feasibility of establishing a Seventh-day Baptist mission there.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Dissolution of Parliament—Popery—The Riot—The Crystal Palace and Sunday.

GLASGOW, July 2, 1852.

Yesterday our Queen in person closed the proceedings of the present Parliament, the dissolution of which the Gazette had previously announced to be to day. Her Majesty, among other topics, intimates the entire suppression of the slave trade along the whole extent of the Bight of Benin, refers with satisfaction to our relation with other States, and concludes with prayer that those appointed by the constituencies as members for the ensuing Parliament (which will meet on the 20th August, the writs requiring a new act to be returned within 35 days after the dissolution,) may be such as will assist in upholding "the Protestant institutions of the country, and religious liberty, which is their natural result," and in promoting measures to educate the people, and to elevate their moral and social condition.

There is much need of a scriptural and decided opposition to the Papal system; for, probably there never was a period since the Reformation, in which greater, more persevering, or more determined efforts have been made for the overthrow of our religion and religious liberty. The provisions of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, which it cost the late Government so much labor to pass, have been repeatedly and openly violated, and very boldly in recent instances, by the so-called Cardinal Wiseman and the so-called Bishop of Beverly, in public documents issued by them. Their periodicals point to this as a matter of fact, justify it, and declare that the utter overthrow of Protestantism, under its every aspect, is their aim and their duty. The Pope having decreed the introduction of their cannon law amongst us, the effort is being made to assimilate their practices here with their arrangements in lands of greater darkness. They are multiplying their chapels, and introducing conventual buildings, and the long-unwonted sight is daily seen, even in the city of Glasgow, of habited nuns walking our streets, not shunning observation, but obtruding themselves in even an unseemly manner upon the public gaze, by a disregard of the established usages, found so convenient in threading the thronged thoroughfares of large towns.

The present week has produced a melancholy result from one of these violations of the law. The Catholic Emancipation Act, as it is termed, passed some twenty year ago, while it removed a number of restrictions under which Paptists had formerly been kept, still prohibited their processions in the streets, and their habited priests from appearing in public places. Both provisions have been repeatedly violated, and a proclamation was issued, recalling attention to them, with intimation that they should henceforth be enforced. On Sunday last, an annual procession of the children attending the Popish chapels of Stockport took place, headed by priests, which, although having few peculiar emblems, had excited attention as being thought contrary to this law. After some more private disputes between opposing parties, a party of Irish Papists, (of whom there are 14,000 in its population,) commenced breaking the windows of a Protestant school. This led to the assembling of a riotous mob, who, after demolishing a row of houses occupied by Irish, proceeded to destroy the pews and every thing within the Romish chapels, including pictures of their saints, and two organs, one of which is said to have cost £400. Two thousand persons being engaged, and the police incapable of quelling the riot, the military were called to their assistance, since which time the peace of the town has been maintained, although some of those whose houses were destroyed have been obliged to encamp in an adjoining wood. One hundred and twenty were taken prisoners, many of them more or less severely wounded. One Darby Searle, a stout young Irishman, who had wounded three or four with a pitchfork, having been with difficulty secured, was found to have had his skull fractured, and died in the care of the police the same evening. In reference to this melancholy affair, Mr. Walpole yesterday stated, in the House of Commons, that Government would, both in England and Ireland, discourage such processions as had a tendency to lead to such results. We are continually reminded of what must be the consequence, should Rome regain ascendancy in our land, by what is passing in countries under her sway. Tuscany again furnishes evidence on this point. At Florence, on the 8th of last month, a person named Madiai and his wife were tried for reading their Bible, and finding discrepancy between what it teaches and Popery inculcates. They have been sentenced to imprisonment, with the addition of hard labor in the case of the husband.

The fear that the re-erection of the Crystal Palace will prove an occasion for much Sunday desecration, as traditionists say, is being strongly manifested. At the meeting of the Brighton Railway, called to sanction proceedings in regard to it, when the motion to confirm an agreement with the Palace Company was put, a Mr. Cox proposed the insertion of a clause for keeping it shut on Sunday. The motion was, however, not even seconded, but was met with laughter and disapprobation. Having failed in this point, a deputation, (by whom sent I have not discovered,) consisting of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Winchester, &c., waited upon the Earl of Derby, to urge upon Government the expediency of adopting measures, when application would be made by the Palace Company for a charter, to prevent the building or the grounds being opened on Sundays to the public. As in not a few cases of late, his Lordship promised that in the event of application being so made, the question should have his best consideration. Several of the London journals have, as might have been pected, commented strongly on the attempt to prevent what will probably be deemed one of the most desirable of the objects aimed at—a place for Sunday amusement for the inhabitants of the metropolis. It is a significant fact, that the Lord Mayor of London declined to be one of the deputation referred to.

	ADDRESS to the Graduating Class,	Prof. J. M. Allen.

Gentlemen—14, 17, 18, 21, 22, 25, 28, 30.
Ladies—4, 8, 11, 12, 15, 16, 20, 23, 24, 26, 29.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

It was my happy lot to be present at the Fourteenth Anniversary of the Alfred Academy. I do not deem it necessary nor desirable to enter into a minute description of the very interesting exercises on that occasion. It is universally admitted, that the students of the Institution have never sustained their examination in the various departments with such perfect satisfaction. The past year has been one peculiarly successful to the Institution, and has very much contributed to elevate its finances to a position secure from every contingency. The Course of Instruction is now considered quite equal to the average of college courses.

In noticing the Anniversary Exercises, the first thing that claims attention is the circumstance that, instead of a contracted staging, more or less exposed to the scorching rays of the sun, and the numerous inconveniences incident to a crowded audience in the open air, we found ourselves conveniently seated in the spacious chapel of the new seminary building, which has just been erected to answer the increasing demands of the Institution. This temple of science is some one hundred feet deep by fifty-two feet front, three stories high, and is surmounted by a Spanish steeple, whose furbished spire and minarets reflect the first rays of Phœbus, climbing over the eastern hills. The whole is handsomely finished, in imitation of new red sand-stone.

Another improvement on the similar exercises of former years, was an arrangement by which all the performances were limited to a single session of from 10 o'clock A. M. to 2 o'clock P. M. I am fond of intellectual pleasures of this description, but I deem this Institution, in common with most others, to have been hitherto seriously in fault by crowding upon such occasions duties enough to wear out the patience of a large portion of the auditory.

I prefer to occupy the remainder of my space in making a few passing criticisms upon the exercises of the day.

And, 1st, I notice the "Salutatory," Latin, by Mr. Freeborn. It is seldom that we hear the Latin Language pronounced with sufficient distinctness to at all catch an idea of its meaning, even although it be from an author which we have carefully read; but we deem it due to Mr. Freeborn to say, that we never heard the Latin pronounced more distinctly.

2d. The "Introductory Essay," by Miss Pattengill, was appropriate, and well sustained.

3d. "The Token of Peace," by Miss McAlmont, was good poetry, but not of the highest order.

4th. "Popular Sympathy," by Mr. T. D. Thatcher, was one of the best speeches of the occasion, but fell somewhat below his effort of last year.

5th. "Youthful Aspirations," by Mr. Green, was excellently written, but we cannot say that Mr. Green did justice to himself or his production in its delivery. We regretted, at the time, that Mr. G. could not have spoken with an easier and more natural voice.

6th. "They sleep in the Dust," by Miss Campbell, we think, took the palm of the essays by the ladies. Miss C.'s reading had the rare quality of loudness sufficient to be heard, though her sentences were too similar in their construction, and were read with altogether too measured a cadence.

7th. We pass over "The next Twenty Years in the Political World," which, although quite well written, contained a spirit altogether too belligerent to be consonant with our peaceable ideas; and notice next in order "The Deluge," by Miss Green, which was decidedly excellent, and excellently read.

8th. "Truth," by Miss Martin, was one of the best finished and most judiciously ornamented essays of the occasion, and was read distinctly.

9th. "Unuttered Prayers," by Miss Wormley, was a sweet little poem, and did much credit to its author.

10th. The "Valedictory," by S. O. Thatcher, would have equaled any exercise of the occasion, had it not been for the introduction, which was hardly in keeping with the sentiment of the speech.

The Address to the Graduating Class, by Prof. J. M. Allen, was decidedly excellent, and will doubtless be long remembered by those to whom it was addressed.

We have a single word to say respecting the manner in which the young ladies read their essays. We cannot tell why it is that those who, on other occasions, and when it is quite unnecessary, can lift their voices like a trumpet, whenever it becomes indispensable that they speak up loud and clear, are subitement sans voix.

We had forgotten to mention the examination of the class in instrumental music, which occurred two days previous to the Anniversary, and was decidedly fine. They seemed to have attained to the idea, that music does not consist altogether in noise. SPECTATOR.

Unuttered Prayers.

BY MISS J. E. WORMLEY.

Read at the Fourteenth Annual Commencement of Alfred Academy, July 8, 1852.

The shallow brook goes babbling by—
 The threatening storm moves harmless o'er—
The light word, uttered carelessly,
 Falls, to be echoed never more;
For ah! so depthless is the tone
Of babbling brook and hollow moan—
So lightly breathed the soulless word
By which no music-chord is stirred.

Noiseless, the deeper waters glide,
 Still onward in their giant flow—
And breathless, gathering skies betide
 Earth's doom of mightier waste and wo;
The thought unuttered, save by look
Of deepest meaning, who may brook?
The prayer, unbreathed from heart-depths there,
Is still the heart-breathed, earnest prayer.

Unuttered prayer! The pent up fire
 That rankles 'neath some Etna's clod—
The soul of Heaven-born desire,
 Up struggling to its home and God—
Heart-longings for the pure and true—
Night-shower of unseen, gathering dew—
Than loudest speech, more earnest far
Is oft the heart's unuttered prayer.

We may not hear their pleadings rise,
 We may not know their incense given,
Unseen, that soareth to the skies,
 And lights the altar-fires of Heaven.
We may not catch their accents wild,
From captive doomed, or orphan child,
From servile bound in woe's abyss—
Yet, O! what wrestling prayer is his!

It did not wail thro' Eden's bower,
 When sin had blighted all her joys,
Yet burned it with intenser power
 Than could be breathed by human voice;
O'er ruined world, and wreck of soul,
To heaven lost, that prayer up stole,
From founts of anguish deeper stirred,
And plead as ne'er plead uttered word.

Think you such prayers unheard shall rise?—
 No angel, stayed in upward flight
On mercy's mission, flee the skies,
 Dispel the gloom, unfold the light?—
No blessing shaken from his wings
Of all he, Heaven-gifted, brings?—
No bright pearl caught, nor star-gleam given,
To guide the erring one to Heaven?

Ah, no! The orphan's speechless wo,
 The voiceless cry from prisoned cell,
Whose untold depths there's none may know,
 Nor angels—only God may tell—
Tho' breathed in silence, not in vain;
That prayer has snapped the clanking chain
By which ye strove to fetter him,
The high of soul, the free of limb.

Unuttered prayers! ye are not few,
 That linger round the throne of love;
Ye are food for angels, and the dew
 Distilled from Elysian fields above;
Ye turn the key that flingeth wide
The golden gates; ye ever guide
The spirit whither it should roam,
And lead its wayward wanderings home.

LIFE IN CALIFORNIA.—On the 16th inst. we received a letter from Randolph Drake (formerly of Plainfield, N. J.,) dated Sonora City, Tuolumne Co., California, June 11, 1852. The following paragraph from it gives a picture of life in California, which is probably as true as it is deplorable:—

"The state of society here is most deplorable. Gambling is carried on in this city to a greater extent, if possible, than in San Francisco. This is a mining district, and the gambling houses are filled with miners and others on all days of the week, but especially on Sundays, when they are crowded to excess. Sunday being the day on which miners flock to the city to do their business, two or three of the auction stores hold their sales on it, and the mechanics transact business as usual. Next Sunday there will be a bull and bear fight at Columbia, to amuse the citizens of that place and this. A horse race is also appointed for that day, to fill up the time and keep the people from attending meeting."

A WORLD'S FAIR IN NEW YORK.—The programme of the World's Industrial Exhibition in New York has at length been issued. It is to open in May next (Anniversary week) under the management of gentlemen of high respectability, is to proffer all desirable facilities to American exhibitors, and to contain (so far as seasonable notice and unremitted efforts on the part of the Managers can secure them) specimens of our various Ores, Minerals, Agricultural Products, Fabrics, Wares, &c., as well as of the more delicate creations of Art. It will contemplate Utility first, Beauty afterward; holding in higher esteem a practical Steam Plow, than the daintiest Piano.

UNION COLLEGE.—The Catalogue of Union College for the Third Term of the present year, shows an aggregate in that Institution of 235 students. Three courses of study are now established in the College—the Literary, the Scientific, and the University course. The Literary is the old Baccalaureate course of the College—in the Scientific course, the modern languages take the place of the ancient, and the amount of mathematics is increased—and in the University course, students select any branch of study at pleasure, receiving a diploma according to the studies pursued. Among the branches on the programme, Civil Engineering, in its various departments, holds a high place.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JULY 12.

In the Senate, among the numerous petitions presented was one from merchants and ship-owners of Boston, praying the recognition by the United States of the independence of Hayti. Several private bills were passed, and the last part of the session was occupied in a discussion of the bill amending the act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers traveling on steamboats, which was ordered to be engrossed.

In the House, the bill for the reduction of postage on printed matter was agreed to in Committee. The Deficiency bill was also up in Committee, and the Senate's amendment granting additional compensation to Collins' steamers was agreed to, 84 to 73.

THIRD-DAY, JULY 13.

The Senate passed the bill for the better security of passengers on vessels propelled in whole or in party by steam. It also passed several private bills. The latter part of the day was spent in considering the bill authorizing the President to raise, arm and equip, three regiments of volunteers, to serve for three years. in guarding and protecting the emigrant route and telegraph lines, and conveying the mails between Missouri River and the settlements in Califarnia and Oregon. There are to be ten posts on the route, to be garrisoned by one hundred men each, with intervening stations twenty miles apart, garrisoned by 20 men each; the station houses to be erected by the volunteers, and from materials obtained in the country along the route. These volunteers are to keep the roads in order, with bridges and ferries, and to protect the telegraph lines, and all persons employed in establishing and working the same. They are to raise, gather and preserve, all necesary provisions and supplies, without cost to the Government. They are to be paid the same as other troops, and at the end of three years to be entitled to 640 acres of land each. The telegraph lines thus constructed may use these military posts and stations free of charge.

The House spent considerable time on the Deficiency Bill, and did not finally dispose of it. The Newspaper Postage Bill was taken up, amendments agreed to by the House, and the bill adopted. It differs from the bill we printed last week only in the first section, which we copy in the form finally agreed to:—

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the 30th of September, 1852, the postage upon all printed matter passing through the mail of the United States, instead of the rates now charged, shall be as follows, to wit: each newspaper, pamphlet, periodical, magazine, book, bound or unbound, circular, catalogue, and every description of printed matter unconnected with any manuscript or writing, and of no greater weight than two ounces, shall be charged one cent postage, and one cent for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce, for any distance under three thousand miles; and for any distance over three thousand miles double these rates. All newspapers and periodicals not weighing over one ounce, published regularly, as often as once in three months, and sent from the office of publication to actual subscribers, shall be chargeable with only one-half the foregoing rates, provided all newspapers and periodicals not weighing over two ounces, when sent to actual subscribers within said State where such newspapers or periodicals are published, shall be entitled to the reduction provided for in this section. The postage upon all printed mailable matter shall be prepaid at the office where it is mailed, or paid quarterly in advance at the office of delivery, otherwise double the foregoing rates shall be charged thereon.

FOURTH-DAY, JULY 14.

The Senate passed the bill directing the President to designate places for Ports of entry and delivery in Oregon, and fixing the compensation of the Collector at Astoria. The bill reducing newspaper postage was received from the House and referred. A bill providing for a survey of public lands in California was passed. The bill to remunerate the Spanish Consul for losses by the Flibustier mob, at New Orleans, was passed. The Deficiency bill was received and referred.

In the House, the Printing Committee made a report in favor of abolishing the contract system, and providing for a public printer. The House ordered 20,000 copies of the proceedings relating to the death of Henry Clay to be printed.

FIFTH-DAY, JULY 15.

In the Senate, Hon. David Merriwether appeared to fill the seat of Henry Clay. The Senate enjoyed a long debate upon a day of adjournment, and finally postponed further talk upon the matter for one week. A resolution was adopted requiring all appropriation bills to be sent to the Senate at least ten days before adjournment. The Deficiency bill came up, and nearly all the House amendments were agreed to. A bill was passed to a third reading authorizing the President to organize certain companies of Mounted Rangers for the protection of the Western territories and California from Indians.

In the House, the public printing was the principal theme of discussion. Near the close of the session, some time was given to the Indian Appropriation Bill.

SIXTH-DAY, JULY 16.

The Senate was all day engaged upon private bills, of which it ordered thirty to a third reading, including one to reimburse Elisha B. W. Moody, owner of the British bark Sarah, the expenses incurred by him in the rescue of the crew and passengers of the American ship Caleb Grimshaw. Adjourned to Second-day.

In the House, the Florida and Alabama Railroad Land bill was agitated, but not finished. The Indian Appropriation bill was taken up, and Mr. Giddings made a short speech upon the Florida War and negro stealing by the Government. The Deficiency Bill then came up, and the House managed to agree with the Senate in all the items except the constructive mileage item of $50,000.

SABBATH-DAY, JULY 17.

The Senate was not in session.

In the House, a bill was introduced, but laid on the table, to admit railroad iron free of duty. The Indian Appropriation bill was up, and an amendment giving fifty thousand dollars to destitute Indians in case of short crops, &c., was rejected. Some other amendments were acted upon, and the House adjourned.

European News.

The Cunard steamer Asia, with Liverpool dates to July 3, arrived at New York on the 15th inst.

From England, the one item of news by the Asia is the prorogation of the British Parliament.

The late proclamation against Roman Catholic processions has begun to yield fruit. On Tuesday night, June 29, a riot broke out at Stockport, between the Catholics and Protestants; at least, the disturbance began respecting a procession of Roman Catholic Sunday School children, but afterward merged into a general fight of Irish against English. At first the Irish had the best in the fray, but afterward the English proved victorious, and proceeded to pull down the houses of the Catholics. Several dwellings were unroofed to furnish missiles, and the furniture broken up to supply weapons. The mob then proceeded to the search Catholic Chapels, one of which they completely gutted, and made a bonfire of the pews, organ, and furniture of the altar, &c. They also pillaged the priest's house, and were proceeding to greater outrages, when a detachment of the 60th Regiment arrived on the ground, and by their presence kept the rioters in check. Sixty of the wounded rioters were taken to the hospital, and one man was picked up dead—killed with a pitchfork. One hundred and fourteen of the ringleaders are arrested. The magistrates appear to have acted sufficiently well under the circumstances, having sworn in 500 special constables, and distributed them in patrols to keep the mob from re-assembling.

A collision recently took place on the River Thames, between the Ramsgate steamer Duchess of Kent, and the Antwerp steamship Ravensbourne. The former was cut to the water's edge, and sunk in eight minutes, with some of the passengers on board, it is supposed.

The telegraphic cable between Dublin and Holyhead does not work, and a surveying party is engaged in searching for the injury. Only five miles more of cable was used than would cover the distance in a straight line.

On Wednesday, the ship Admiral arrived from Port Phillip, with 30,840 ounces of gold, valued at nearly £120,000. The captain states that the difficulty of obtaining crews is undiminished, and there are fifty sail in port deserted by their crews. The number of persons arriving at Port Phillip was about a thousand per week.

The Paris Patrie announces that a plot against the State has been discovered in Paris. Thirteen individuals have been arrested in a detached house in the Rue Reine Blanche. The conspirators, who are in correspondence with the London refugees, were busy making an infernal machine. Many arrests took place during the night. The machine was composed of fourteen barrels, capable (the dispatch says) of containing each about twenty bullets, and their firing in a wrong direction would have been impossible.

Accounts of an unfavorable nature are again received from Algeria. No decided check had been suffered by the French, but the Arabs had massacred the colonists in various districts, and the insurrection had spread more or less over Kabylia and part of the Province of Constantia.

California News.

The steamer Illinois, with twelve days later news from California, and $2,000,000 in gold dust, arrived at New York on the 15th inst.

The news has no feature of remarkable interest. Of crimes in the interior, this arrival gives us a larger record than usual.

A serious outrage recently occurred at the Court House in Sacramento City. The Court of Sessions had adjourned, and as Judge Wilson, one of the Justices of that Court, was leaving the Court House, he was met and assaulted with a cane by John H. McKune, Esq., a member of the bar of this city. Judge Wilson immediately drew his sword-cane, and stabbed the assailant under the left nipple, penetrating the left lobe of the lungs. Mr. Henry Caulfield, a friend of Mr. McKune, thereupon drew a pistol and fired at Judge Wilson, missing him, and hitting Mr. McDonald, the keeper of the prison-brig, who was at the time supporting Mr. McKune, who was falling. Mr. McDonald was shot through the side, and is dangerously, perhaps mortally, wounded.

New and very rich diggings are said to have been discovred at a point near Pleasant Bar, on the Middle Fork of the American River. On Sunday a man paid $500 for a claim in the new placer, and on Monday he took out a pan of pure gold weighing fourteen pounds! The gold found at this place is in large pieces, very smooth and heavy.

Near Nicolaus, on the west bank of the Sacramento river, a man was recently hung up by the people on suspicion of having murdered a woman.

Another case of Lynching, at Placerville, is reported.

Henry Clay's Family.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Lexington, Ky., gives the following sketch of the various members of Henry Clay's family:—

Mrs. Clay is now 71 years of age, and although her health is feeble, has the appearance of a lady of 50. Her name was Lucretia Hart, and her native place Lexington. Mr. Clay married her shortly after he came to Lexington from his native State, Virginia. By her he has had eleven children, three of whom died in childhood.

Eliza Clay died suddenly, in 1824, while on the way to Washington in company with her father. Her age was about sixteen. Another daughter, Mrs. Dubale of New Orleans, died about the same time. In 1835, another and the only remaining daughter, the wife of Jas. Erwin, of New Orleans, died also.

Of the eleven children, only four now live, Henry Clay, Jr., having fallen at the battle of Buena Vista. His body is interred in the family lot at Lexington.

Theo. Wythe Clay, who has been a lunatic since his boyhood, is near fifty years of age, being the eldest son. His recovery is hopeless. His lunacy is characterized by melancholy, with occasional fits of violence.

Thos. Hart Clay is the proprietor of Mansfield, a fine estate near Lexington, and devotes himself for the most part to the cultivation of hemp. His age is 42.

Jas. B. Clay, aged 30, is also a farmer, and owns a large estate near St. Louis, Mo., where he has a large dairy, and is engaged extensively in rearing stock.

John Clay, the youngest, is 28 years of age, and resides at home, managing the farm, and devoting a portion of his time to the profession of the law. In appearance he resembles his father more than any of the other sons. His features are similar, his hair has the same dry, sandy appearance, and hangs about his features in the same careless manner.

All the sons are highly intellectual in appearance, but none of them have yet given promise of future greatness.

Of the 35 slaves owned by Mr. Clay, Abraham, the groomsman, is the oldest, being near sixty; Adams, the gardener, is 55 years of age. Thornton, Mr. Clay's body servant, received from the hands of his master his free papers, but never left him, even after death, until the corpse was placed in the tomb.

Henry Clay's Will.

The Will of Mr. Clay was presented in Court on Monday, July 12, and admitted to record. It is drawn by his own hand, and bears date July 10, 1851. It relates almost entirely to the disposition of his estate among the members of his family, the only exception being that which relates to his slaves, providing that children of his slaves born after the 1st of January, 1850, be liberated and sent to Liberia, the males at the age of 28, and the females at 25, three years earnings prior to the emancipation to be reserved for their benefit, for the purpose of fitting them out; and prior to removal they are to be taught to read, write, and cypher. Slaves in being before 1850 are bequeathed to his family. Ashland is left to Mrs. Clay, for her sole use and benefit during her life, and after her death to be sold, and the proceeds to be divided among his children. The only specific devises outside of his family are, to Dr. D. W. Dudley, the gold snuff-box presented by Dr. Hunt, late of Washington; to Henry T. Duncan, a ring containing a piece of the coffin of Washington; to Dr. W. N. Mercer, a snuff-box said to have belonged to Peter the Great. Mrs. Clay is appointed executrix, and Hon. Thomas A. Marshall and James O. Harrison, executors of the will, with a provision that no securify shall be required of either.

Liberating Slaves.—On Thursday, the 8th inst., Mr. Jno. Holmes, of Adams Co., Miss., brought to Cincinnati three slaves—one girl and two boys—which were raised on his plantation, whom he manumitted on their arrival. Mr. John Ford, Jr., a gentleman from the same County, liberated three of his slaves also—two girls and a boy. It is the intention of these gentlemen to educate them at their own expense at some institution either in Ohio or in the East. The boys and girls are young, fine-looking children, and promise well.

SUMMARY.

A farmer named Warren Skinner, at work in his field, in Earlville, Oneida Co., was struck by lightning and killed, on Wednesday, July 7. His clothes were torn into fragments, and thrown in different directions more than thirty feet from where he stood, and both his boots were entirely torn off and thrown at least ten feet. There was scarcely a shred of any part of his clothing left on him. There were two holes in his head, which appeared to have been made by the electric fluid, and also a hole in the bottom of each foot, and a hole in the ground directly under his feet.

At the request of a distinguished citizen of Louisiana, the Secretary of the Navy, more than a year since, directed the commander of the East India squadron to procure and send home roots of the sugar cane from Salanga, and the Straits of Malacca, which is believed to be superior to the cane now grown in the Southern States of the Union; and several boxes of roots, in a growing state, have arrived, and have been turned over to the Department of the Interior for distribution among sugar planters at the South.

The closing exercises of the Sixteenth Term of the New York State Normal School, took place at the Institution in Albany, on Thursday, July 8. The Poem was read by Miss Jane A. Newman, of Little Falls, and the valedictory by L. H. Cheney, of Syracuse. Rev. Dr. Kip delivered an address to the pupils, in the absence of the Secretary of State, Mr. Randall; and the retiring Principal, Prof. Perkins, also addressed the school. There were 18 female and 19 male graduates.

John Pretlove, of Mobile, had lived for years on good terms with his family, but some difficulty occurred, when he procured nitric acid, and by some means induced his wife, Rosaline, their son William, a fine little boy of three years, and James Carroll, all to partake. Late on Sunday the husband, the suicide and murderer, died! On the next morning at 7, the wife too died! In the afternoon the poor boy followed; and before night closed, James Carroll also fell dead on the floor.

A dispatch dated Worcester, Mass., July 15, says: The Catholic College, situated about a mile south of this city, took fire yesterday afternoon, and was entirely consumed, with the exception of a portion of the east wing. The fire commenced in the upper story of the north-east corner, from a defect in a chimney. Most of the furniture was burned or destroyed. A large portion of the valuable library was saved. The loss is estimated at from $40,000 to $50,000, and no insurance. There were over 100 students in the building, and some of the Professors and tutors have lost their all.

The steamship Daniel Webster, from Chagres, arrived at New York on the 18th inst. She reports that the inhabitants of Aspinwall were nearly all sick with cholera and fever, and the same was raging to a great extent at Gorgona and several other places on the Isthmus. Along the railroad it was so bad that they were compelled to give up work, and most of the laborers left. It had been raining incessantly for two weeks, so that the roads were almost impassable, requiring several days for crossing, the mules going into the mud two and three feet.

The Dunkirk Journal says: Our fishermen are having a fine run these hot days. One boat in two days secured the valuable services of 152 salmon-trout, weighing in the aggregate 2,282 pounds! The boats proceed from 5 to 10 miles into the lake, where the supply, thus far, is found to be inexhaustible.

During a storm at Lexington, Miss., July 13, a tree on Mr. Cunningham's plantation, under which a party of seven negroes were eating their dinner, was struck with lightning, and four of the negroes were instantly killed.

At the recent fire in Niles, Mich., there were twenty-six buildings destroyed in all, and the total loss is estimated at between $35,000 and $40,000, on which there was very little insurance. It falls principally upon young men with very little capital, the most of whom have been ruined. The fire originated in a cabinet wareroom, and was caused by the explosion of fire crackers, which were thrown among the shavings.

New Orleans papers contain the particulars of the explosion on the Steamer St. James. The whole number of lives lost, as far as actually known, was sixteen, nineteen wounded. It was, however, supposed that many passengers were lost whose names were not registered. The steamboat California, in going to the assistance of the St. James, ran down a boat in which some passengers were escaping, and all, except one, were drowned.

A gentleman who accompanied the remains of Henry Clay to Louisville speaks of a neat little tribute of respect that took place at Rising Sun. As the Ben Franklin passed that place, the passengers saw quite a demonstration upon the banks. It consisted of thirty-one young ladies, dressed in white, with one exception, with black veils, each with a banner representing the different States; the one indicating Kentucky was dressed in deep mourning.

We have from Washington an account of a most disgraceful assault upon a clerk in the Pension Bureau by George W. Jones, a Congressman from Tennessee. It seems that the man assaulted (Mr. Van Wyck) had asserted that "no member of Congress earned his salary half as much as the clerks in the departments." For this, Jones tried to break a chair over Van Wyck's head, injuring him severely.

There was an explosion of a powder magazine in Lafayette, Ia., last week. One hundred kegs of powder were in it. The damage is estimated at $50,000. Scarce a house in the town but was more or less injured. Large buildings, three or four squares from the explosion, were moved from their foundations, doors burst open, windows broken, plaster knocked off, walls cracked, and other injuries sustained.

The Farmville (Va.) Journal mentions a rumor that a disease of a most malignant character, somewhat resembling cholera, is prevailing to an alarming extent, in Charlotte, Lunenburg, Macklenburg, and other counties south and east of that place, among the blacks particularly, and that a large number of them have died—one gentleman in Charlotte having lost ten, and another in Mecklengurg as many as forty.

During a storm at Baltimore, on the 13th inst., Hartford River overflowed its banks, flooding basements, cellars, and first-floors of over three hundred houses, sweeping off fences and outhouses, and carrying off furniture, &c. The bridges and two culverts were swept off, and six houses, nearly finished, were entirely demolished. About two hundred other houses had their cellars flooded. They were all small buildings, occupied by the poorer classes.

A dispatch dated Cleveland, O., July 13, says: The steamer America, which left here last night for Buffalo, when 17 miles out, came in collision with the propeller Oswego City, sinking the latter in 15 minutes. The crew and several passengers were precipitated into the water and from 15 to 20 were lost. The Ameirca immediately returned to port much damaged.

The Toronto Colonist has the following dispatch, dated Quebec, July 15—"Eight persons were killed and three houses destroyed, Tuesday, at Cape Diamond, by a slide of rocks, at 4 o'clock P. M. Yesterday another slide took place at 7 A. M., killing one man and crushing some houses. There was also another slide in the afternoon, but without loss of life; some houses were, however, crushed."

A small association of sixteen persons left New York recently for Wisconsin, with a view of carrying on agriculture and mechanic arts in some part of that State, probably in Washington Co., upon co-operative principles. The members of this little band were mainly of French and German origin; and they go out to make a beginning, with the idea that others will join them as they advance.

Hon. John M. Clayton is industriously cultivating his farm, three miles from Newcastle, Del. Instead of running a race with competitors in the political field, he is endeavoring to distance his overseer in agricultural pursuits. Each has selected his field, and a wager lies between them, which will produce the richest crop from his allotted portion.

The Maysville (Va.) Eagle says a few cases of cholera continued to occur in that city, and that there have been 95 deaths by it since it first broke out. The cholera has broken out at Wilmington, Ohio. There have been six or eight deaths, and considerable alarm is felt. It is also prevailing in several small towns throughout the West.

A crazy man in Almont, Mich., named Wesley Hulbert, being about to be arrested, took refuge in a vacant log-house, with a musket and pistols, and shot Jacob Mills dead as he was approaching for his arrest. Two hundred of the citizens resorted to the place with arms, fired the house to drive out Hulbert, and, on his appearance, shot him down. Both the dead men leave large families.

At Two Rivers, Wis., thirty or forty cartridges, prepared for a six pound gun, exploded in the midst of a crowd assembled on the Fourth to listen to an oration. Some sixteen boys, who were in the immediate vicinity, were badly burned, and but little hope is entertained for the recovery of six of them.

Two young men were drowned in Croton River, at Purdy's Station, while bathing, on Sunday, July 4. One, named William Hawkins, who couldn't swim, got beyond his depth, and was struggling to escape, when the other, Barney Foley, leaped in to help him out, but Hawkins caught him around the neck, and both perished.

The Postmaster of Charleston, S. C., has issued a notice cautioning the public against sending slaves to the office for their letters. Instances have occurred in which white rogues have taken valuable packages from the negroes, but they cannot be convicted on a black's testimony.

Advices from the Rio Grande state that a horde of desperadoes still infest the country above Brownsville. Two Americans were recently shot at Matamoras, by Gen. Avalos, for what crime is not stated. The American Consul interfered to save their lives, but without success.

Gov. Kossuth sailed for Liverpool, in the Africa, on Wednesday, July 14, instead of waiting till the departure of the Washington, on Saturday, as he had before intended. He left without any manifestation of excitement among the people, being accompanied to the ship only by a few personal friends.

Friday morning, July 16, a burglar was detected in breaking into stores in Fall River, from one of which he obtained $500 in money. Constable Gordon Manchester attempted to seize him, when he drew a pistol, and shot the officer in the breast, mortally wounding him. The burglar was finally arrested.

The steamship Philadelphia, from Key West, where she had been quarantined, arrived at New York on Sunday last. Eight deaths occurred on board of her since June 30. The town is perfectly healthy. No cases of cholera among the Philadelphia's passengers since her arrival in the harbor, and no sickness ashore.

Funeral Ceremonies in respect to the memory of Henry Clay, were held in New York on the 20th inst. There was a grand civic and military procession, after which, an oration was pronounced, accompanied with the usual religious exercises.

A correspondent of the Baptist Register states that Rev. T. S. Malcom, Corresponding Secretary of the Baptist Publication Society, is soon to embark for Europe, for the benefit of his health.

A serious riot occurred at Hamilton, Canada, on the 12th. It was a breaking out of the undying feud between Orangemen and Catholics. One man was killed and another wounded.

The price of gas in Boston is $3 per thousand cubic feet; in New York, $3 50; in Baltimore, $4; in Charleston, Savannah, Richmond, Providence, Worcester, Lowell, $3 50 each.

A serious railroad accident occurred June 14, near Camden, N. J., whereby one man was killed. Sand washed over the track by the rain was the cause.

R. S. Denny, of Clappville, Leicester, Mass., has lost four woolen mills by fire within the last six and one-half years. The last was burnt on the 1st inst., and was fully insured.

A meeting of the People's College Association will be held at Elmira, on Wednesday, August 4, 1852, when all friendly to the general objects propo ed are invited to attend.

At the earnest solicitation of many of his old companions in arms, Gen. Scott has consented to be present at the great Niagara gathering on the 27th inst.

We learn from Princeton, Ky., that fifty deaths from cholera have occurred at that place during the present season. Many families had left, and others were leaving.

Ten thousand dollars have been remitted from this city to Montreal, in anticipation of the subscriptions to be collected here.

Wm. James Stillman sailed on the 17th inst., in the steamer Washington, on a professional tour in Europe.

A man at Utica, who had been sun struck, and was delirious and near dying, was saved by putting his feet in warm water.

Abram and Charles D. Coon have recently removed from Portville, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., to Walworth, Wisconsin.

DIED,

In Andover, Allegany County, N. Y., July 7th, of dropsy of the heart, Deacon Philip Wardner, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. Bro. Wardner professed religion near forty years since, while living in Essex County. Some time after this he removed to Wheatland, Monroe County. From Wheatland, some twenty-four years since, he came to Andover, Allegany County. Here, upon the organization (or soon after) of the Baptist Church of that place, he was chosen to the office of Deacon, in which capacity he served until discharged by death. Bro. Wardner's life was a well-written commentary on the power of grace to renew and sanctify the human heart, he giving the most decided proofs, through the services of a long and useful life, that he was laying up "treasures in heaven." As in his life beloved and esteemed by his brethren, as well as respected by all who knew him, so in his death is he greatly lamented.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country. Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses, Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

Miscellaneous.

Essentials to Productive Farming.

The following fifteen essentials to productive farming are from the pen of the American Farmer, which is, we believe, the oldest agricultural paper in the United States:—

1. Good implements of husbandry, and plenty of them, which should always be kept in perfect order.

2. Deep plowing and thorough pulverization of the soil, by the free use of the harrow, drag, or roller.

3. An application of lime, marl, or ashes, where calcareous matter or potash may not be present in the soil.

4. A systematic husbanding of every substance on a farm capable of being converted into manure, a systematic protection of such substances from loss by evaporation or waste of any kind, and a careful application of the same to the lands under culture.

5. The draining of all wet lands, so as to relieve the roots of the plants from the ill effects of a superabundance of water, a condition equally pernicious as drouth to their healthful growth and profitable fructification.

6. The free use of the plow, cultivator, and hoe, with all row culture crops, so as to keep down, at all times the growth of grass and weeds, those pests which prove so destructive to crops.

7. Seeding at the proper time, with good seed, and an equal attention as to time, with regard to the period of working crops.

8. Attention to the construction and repair of fences, so that what is made through the the toils and anxious cares of the husbandman, may not be lost through his neglect to protect his crops from the depredations of stock.

9. Daily personal superintendence, on the part of the master, over all the operations of the farm, no matter how good a manager he may have, or however faithful his hands may be, as the presence of the head of a farm, and the use of his eyes, are worth several pairs of hands.

10. Labor-saving machinery, so that one may render himself as independent as needful of neighborhood labor, as a sense of the comparative independence of the employer upon such labor begets a disposition of obedience and faithfulness on the part of the employed.

11. Comfortable stabling and sheds, for the horses and stock, all necessary outbuildings, for the accommodation of the hands, and protection of the tools and implements, as well as for the care of the poultry.

12. Clover and other grasses to form a part of the rotation of crops, and these to be at the proper periods plowed in, to form pabulum for succeeding crops.

13. The clover field to be either plastered or ashed, each succeeding spring—one bushel of the former, and six of the latter per acre.

14. To keep no more stock than can be well kept, but to be sure to keep as many as the farm can keep in good condition, as it is wise policy to feed as much as possible of the crops grown on the farm, and thus return to it that which has been abstracted from it.

15. To provide a good orchard and garden —the one to be filled with choice fruits of all kinds—the other with vegetables of different sorts, early and late, so that the table may, at all times, be well and seasonably supplied, and the supplies contribute to increase the wealth of the proprietor.

Science and the Useful Arts.

(Arranged by the N. Y. Tribune.)

Plowing by Steam.—A rotary steam plow has been invented by James Usher, Edinburgh. It is much like a locomotive, with a horizontal shaft in front, on which are fixed arms forming mold-boards and coulters. There are three arms in the circumference, and on the length of the shaft five, which enable it to cut five furrows at the same time. This plow weighs five tuns, is ten horse-power, and costs $1,455. It moves at the velocity of 2,550 yards per hour, and requires an engineer and two men to tend it. It plows six acres in a day. When the plowing apparatus is disconnected, the machine may be used for any other purpose, as a steam engine.

Lord Willoughby Scoresby has also made experiments in steam-plowing. He employs two steam engines at the same time, one at each extremity of the field. The plow plays between them, forward and backward, by means of ropes attached and rolled around capstans, with which the machines are provided. Two men are employed to drive the engines, four to shift the plow and engines, one to hold the plow, and three boys at trucks. To plow an acre requires 7½ cwt. of coke, making the cost to be 6 shillings, which is half the price of doing the work by horses, with the advantage that steam does it in half the time.

Fattening Cattle in Stalls and in Sheds.—An experiment has been made in Scotland, to try the comparative value of these two modes of fattening cattle. Ten animals having been chosen, were divided as equally as possible; five were put in a sheltered court with plenty of shed room, and the others into boxes. At the beginning of October it was soon found that those in the court eat 134 lbs. per day, while those in the boxes eat only 112 lbs., or 22 lbs. less, thus proving that a certain degree of warmth is equivalent to food. After seven months, toward the end of April, they were all slaughtered, and the following results were found: Cattle fed in boxes, Beef, 3,262 lbs.; Tallow, 6,678 lbs. Cattle fed in courts, Beef, 3,416 lbs.; Tallow, 6,054 lbs. These results show the superiority of feeding in boxes. It is thought that in a less mild winter they would have been more striking. In the course of the experiment, the thermometer rose to 50 degrees, and the cattle under cover seemed to suffer from being too warm. It was found a trifling expense to comb them regularly, which speedily produced a very marked improvement.

Growing Trees from Cuttings.—A French gentleman, named Delacroix, has discovered a new mode of propagating trees from cuttings, which has proved successful for apples, pears, plums, apricots, &c., as well as for roses and other plants that are tenacious of life. This method is to bend the cutting in the form of a bow and to put it in the ground at the two extremities, leaving only the middle part exposed and on a level with the surface of the ground. There must at that point be a good bud or shoot. All other parts being protected by the earth from drying, give vigor to the bud, which is soon transformed into leaves, by which in its turn it draws from the atmosphere the carbon necessary to the formation of the roots. The method of planting is to form two ridges, and placing the cuttings across the furrow between, cover the ends with earth, press it upon them, and water freely. The cuttings should be of last year's growth.

Submarine Telegraph between England and Ireland.—The laying of the wire across St. George's Channel was performed on the 1st of June. The rope was rather less than one inch in diameter, and was composed of a central copper wire inclosed in a double gutta-percha tube, and surrounded by twelve galvanized iron wires. The breadth of the Channel being only fifty-nine miles, eighty miles of line were put on board to prevent a repetition of the accident which happened between Dover and Calais. At the end of ten miles it was determined to compare the distance run over with the length of the line run out, and it was found that only twelve miles of it had been expended. The next comparison showed 20 miles of line to 16 miles' distance; the next, 31 to 25; the next 55 to 47; finally, for the 59 miles' distance, only 65 miles of line were expended. During the operation the vessels moved at the rate of four miles an hour. The greatest depth passed over was 84 fathoms.

Stereoseopic Daguerreotype.—This is an English invention, now a few months old, which, if not very practical, is at least very curious. Two photographs are taken simultaneously from the same abject, in two adjacent cameras, so placed as to correspond to the slight difference which exists in the images of an object seen with the left or right eye. These two images are placed in a stereoseope, that is, in a case so disposed as to admit the view of one picture to the right eye, and of the other to the left eye. The two become entirely blended together, and produce this optical illusion, that instead of a flat picture, you see solid objects, and faces with the appearance of life, in which motion alone is wauting.

Monoclave or Uni-Touch.—Such is the name of a very ingenious but complicated instrument invented by Mr. Acklin. Its object is to enable any person to play on the piano, organ or accordian by making a band of paper pass, with a velocity regulated by the time of the tune, across the instrument. This paper is pierced with holes corresponding to the notes, and is prepared by means of a peculiar machine, by simply playing the tune once on the piano. The inventor indicates many other useful applications of this instrument; that it may be worked with the foot, so that a good player may play on two pianos at the same time.

Editing a Paper.

From the National Intelligencer.

Many people estimate the ability of a newspaper, and the industry and talent of its editor, by the editorial matter it contains. It is comparatively an easy task for a frothy writer to pour out daily columns of words—words upon any and all subjects. His ideas may flow in one weak, washy, everlasting flood, and his command of language may enable him to string them together like bunches of onions; and yet his paper may be a meager and poor concern. But what is the toil of such a man, who displays his leaded matter largely, to that imposed on a judicious, well-informed editor, who exercises his vocation with an hourly consciousness of his responsibilities and duties, and devotes himself to the conduct of his paper with the same care and assiduity that a sensible lawyer bestows upon a suit, or a humane physician upon a patient, without regard to show or display

Indeed, the mere writing part of editing a paper is but a small portion of the work. The care, the time employed in selecting, is far more important, and the tact of a good editor is better known by his selections than any thing else, and that we all know is half the battle. But as we have said, an editor ought to be estimated, and his labors understood and appreciated, by the general conduct of his paper, its tone, its temper, its uniform, consistent course, its principles and aims, its manliness, its dignity and propriety. To preserve these as they should be preserved, is enough to occupy fully the time and attention of any man. If to this be added the general supervision of the newspaper establishment, which most editors have to encounter, the wonder is, how they find time to write at all.

A Robin in Difficulties.

While Mr. Charles Newall, granite-hewer in Dalbeattie, was plying his vocation at Craglair Quarry, his attention was suddenly arrested by cries strongly indicative of distress, proceeding from one or other of the feathered denizens of the wood. On throwing from him his tools and hurrying to the spot whence the sounds proceeded, he discovered a robin apparently in a state of great agitation, whose movements immediately certified him of the true cause of alarm. An adder twenty inches long, and one inch in circumference, had managed to drag itself up the face of the quarry, and was at that moment in the very act of protruding its ugly head over the edge of a nest built among the stumps of the cut-down brushwood, and containing the poor mother robin's unfledged offspring—her maternal instinct prompting her to the only defense of which she was capable. She was engaged, when Mr. Newall first got his eye upon her, in alternately coming down the one moment upon the spoliator, darting her beak into his forehead, and anon rising on the other to the height of a yard or so above the scene of danger. It was the act of a moment for Mr. Newall to dislodge the aggressor. But in doing so, two of the little birds were thrown out of their nest, where, however, they were speedily and carefully replaced. While Mr. Newall was killing the adder, the joy of the parent bird was so excessive that she actually perched on the left arm of her benefactor, and watched with an unmistakable an intense delight every blow inflicted by his right arm on her merciless and disappointed enemy; and when that enemy lay dead, she alighted upon and pecked the lifeless trunk with all her vigor, and revenge thus taken, entered her nest, and having ascertained that all was safe, swiftly repaired to a neighboring branch, and piped, as she best could, what was no doubt meant for a hymn of gratitude and a song of triumph. When at work since, Mr. Newall has been evidently recognized by the tiny biped, and we do hope that nothing may occur to interrupt a friendship originating in circumstances so specially interesting. [Dumfries (Scotland) Courier.

An Example.

In the year 1836, says the Lockport (Ill.) Telegraph, a young man, a mechanic, came to this place, seeking employment as a journeyman. His trade was a tin-smith; he brought a letter of introduction to a citizen of this place, who interested himself in his behalf, and succeeded in getting him employment at his business. He was without means, but by the assistance extended to him he was enabled to start a small shop, where, industriously working at his trade, and adding a few articles of hardware to the stock of his shop, he did a small, but prosperous business in Milwaukie. By industry and economy he was enabled soon to very much extend his business, and finally became an importer of hardware. A few years of prosperous business made him independent. He then gave the superintendency of the business to others, and spent a couple of years in traveling; visited England and other portions of Europe. He afterwards returned and purchased a valuable property in Madison, the capitol of Wisconsin, which he has rendered still more valuable by erecting extensive mills, and in making other judicious improvements.

He has at different times been solicited to accept of positions of trust and honor, but has uniformly declined, giving strict attention to his own private affairs, until he accumulated a fortune.

His uniform integrity and well-established reputation for good business habits, have now brought him not only a first-rate fortuue, but political preferment, and a distinguished position among the magistrates of the country. We have sketched a portion of the history of Mr. Leonard J. Farwell, Governor of the State of Wisconsin.

His history is full of instruction to all who please to study it. It adds another instance to the many thousands of self-made men, and also a beautiful commentary upon the principles at the basis of the republican government, whose wealth and honor, position and preferment, are all open to the enjoyment of the humblest citizen of the country, and accessible to all who rightly seek, and really deserve them.

How to Render Assistance in Accidents.

In case of a fractured or a dislocated limb, let the sufferer lie on the ground until a couch, door, gate, or plank can be procured, for in raising him up he may die from faintness or loss of blood. When procured, place the door or gate alongside of him, cover it with something soft, and let men convey him steadily home, but do not put him into a vehicle of any kind.

In Fits.—If a person fall in one, let him remain on the ground, providing his face be pale; for should it be fainting, or temporary suspension of the heart's action, you may cause death by raising him upright, or by bleeding; but if the face be red, or dark-colored, raise him on his seat, throw cold water on his head immediately, and send for a surgeon and get a vein opened, or fatal pressure on the brain may ensue.

In hanging or drowning, expose the chest as quickly as possible, and throw ice-water over it, whilst the body is kept in a sitting posture.

Children in Convulsions.—Deluge the head with cold water, and put the feet into warm water, till medical aid can be procured.

Poison.—Give an emetic of a teaspoonful of mustard flour in a teaspoonful of warm water every ten minutes, till vomiting ensues or medical assistance is obtained.

Burns and Scalds.—Let the burnt part be bathed in a mixture of turpentine and olive oil, equal parts, till the pain abates; then dress it with common cerate, and defend it from the air. [Farmer and Mechanic.

The Wife of Henry Clay.

A short time since, we stated, on the authority of an exchange, that Mrs. Clay had never visited Washington. A correspondent of one of the city papers, however, asserts that the venerable lady, in years past, often accompanied her lamented partner to the scene of his forensic triumphs. He says, however, that Mrs. Clay was never fond of the exacting, changing, and fashionable life of the city, and was always happy to return home to Ashland. She used, however, to accompany Mr. Clay to Washington in the winter, when he was Speaker of the House, and her two daughters were, during those sessions, with her, and at school here. When Mr. Clay became Secretary of State, Mrs. Clay resided there, and was universally admired for her kindness and affability; and her evening parties were rendered as agreeable by her pleasing manners as by her brilliancy and her spirit. I remember an incident that occurred when he had the duel with John Randolph. As he was returning from the ground, he asked anxiously whether Mrs. Clay knew of what had happened. He had informed her that he was going out, and had kept it a secret. Just before his return, she had heard it from a servant, and, meeting him in the passage, threw her arms around him, exclaiming, 'Oh! Harry, how could you go without letting me know?' . . . . Mrs. Clay's last visit to Washington was in 1834, when Mr. Clay was in the Senate. They used formerly to travel between Washington and Lexington in their private coach, with four horses and an outrider."

Bathing.

Dr. Mayo furnishes some hints on "Bathing" that may be read with advantage at this season of the year. At night, warm water should be employed; in the morning, cold. The frame, after the exhaustion of the day, is in a condition to be better for the soothing influence of warm bathing. The whole person should, preparatory to retiring to rest, be laved with warm water, and afterwards a moderate glow should be produced by gentle drying with towels. It has been said that cold water, used at night, has the advantage of preventing the feet from becoming tender. The reverse is the fact. Tenderness of the feet is much sooner and more surely remedied by the use of warm water then cold. The direct purpose of bathing is better obtained by warm than cold water. Nevertheless, there are some who are compelled to use cold water for their feet at night; if they use warm water, there is no re-action; and their feet and ankles become painfully chilled, and deficient in circulation. But the morning is the proper season for the employment of cold water, the temperature of which, however, should bear a relation to the time of year, and to the temperature of the weather, as well as to the strength of the person using it. Sometimes, therefore, it is better to use water in the morning tepid, just as at night it may happen, for various reasons, to be desirable to avoid the relaxing effects of water too warm. A person in health and strength is the better for having the entire persons bathed with cold water in the morning, followed by sufficient friction to produce a general healthy glow. In these simple directions two effects are contemplated: one, niceness of the person; the other, a stimulating or soothing influence on the nerves, or on the system generally. Both of these effects are capable of being attained to a still greater extent by the use of baths.

Natural Water Purifiers.

Mr. Warrington has, for a year past, kept twelve gallons of water in a state of admirably-balanced purity by the action of two gold fish, six water-snails, and two or three specimens of that elegant aquatic plant known as Valisperia sporalis. Before the water-snails were introduced, the decayed leaves of the valisperia caused a growth of slimy mucus, which made the water turbid, and threatened to destroy both plants and fish. But under the improved arrangement, the slime, as fast as it is engendered, is consumed by the water-snails, which reproduce it in the shape of young snails, whose tender bodies again furnish a succulent food to the fish; while the valisperia plants absorb the carbonic acid exhaled by the respiration of their companions, fixing the carbon in their growing stems and luxuriant blossoms, and refurnishing the oxygen (during sunshine, in visible little streams,) for the respiration of the snails and the fish. The spectacle of perfect equilibrium thus simply maintained between animal, vegetable, and inorganic activity, is striking and beautiful; and such means may possibly hereafter be made available on a large scale for keeping tanked water clean and sweet. [Quarterly Review.

Horrible Death.—On the afternoon of Saturday, John Anderson, carrier, Whytemyre, was discovered lying in a field by the side of the road leading up from the turnpike, a few hundred yards east of the Harmuir toll. On examination it appeared that the wretched man had been burned to death. He had been in Nairn with a load, and was returning hôme. At Auldearn he went into a public house, whence he was seen coming out upon all-fours. He passed the Harmuir bar, with his pipe lighted, sitting on the top of his cart. Turning up the cross road, he was observed to jump off the cart; and shortly after was found with every particle of clothing burned off his body, except a small bit of his stockings, and the back of his coat and trowsers. What adds to the horror of the case, his eyes were literally burned out, and his nose and ears burned off! It is conjectured that a spark from his pipe had ignited the fumes of alcohol, and that spontaneous combustion immediately ensued—the subtle gas issuing from every orifice in the body, and even through the pores of the skin, being kindled on coming into contact with the air. [Forres Gazette.

Bushing Tomatoes.—Those who love good tomatoes, will take pains to cultivate them so as to insure them as near as may be in their full perfection. There is no other fruit that delights more in air and sunshine than the tomato. They should have, therefore, abundance of room, and the vines be sustained from falling to the earth. I have found stout brush firmly set around the plants, to answer the purpose better than any other method. The branches have room to extend themselves as they like, while the limbs of the brush keep them in their positions. By this method the fruit is more fully exposed to the genial influences of the air and sunshine, whereby it attains a more delicious flavor, larger size, and comes quicker to maturity. [New Yorker.

The Palode Vacca, or Cow-Tree of Brazil.—This is one of the most remarkable trees in the forests of Brazil. During several months in the year, when no rain falls, and its branches are dead and dried up, if the trunk be tapped, a sweet and nutritious milk exudes. The flow is most abundant at sunrise. Then the natives receive the milk into large vessels, which soon grows yellow and thickens on the surface. Some drink plentifully of it under the tree, others take it home to their children. One might imagine he saw a shepherd distributing the milk of his flocks. It is used in tea and coffee in place of common milk. The cow-tree is one of the largest in the Brazilian forests, and is used in ship-building.

DEFERRED SUMMARY.

A patent has been granted in England to T. Ashworth, of Bristol, for a compound whose object is to prevent incrustations in new boilers and to loosen them in old ones. It should be introduced in the boiler twice a week in the proportion of one gallon for each thirty horse power. The compound is prepared by mixing intimately 33 gallons of coal tar, 21 gallons of linseed water, 5 lbs. of pulverized black lead, and 8 lbs. of castile soap. Linseed water is prepared by boiling 14 lbs. of seed in 21 gallons of water and removing the seed. The mixture is of a creamy consistence.

Mr. O'Reilly has issued a circular, calling the attention of the public and of railway managers to the necessity of putting up lines of telegraph along railroads, with instruments at each station, so that before leaving a station the conductor of a train may ascertain whether the track is clear, and give information that he is upon it. By this means accidents involving the loss of life may be avoided, and the destruction of property saved to an extent far exceeding the cost of erecting and operating the wires.

A writer in the Bristol Times tells a rather remarkable anecdote of a lizard in the collection at the Clifton Zoological Gardens: One, about a foot long, had swallowed another nearly as long as itself, but not having taken the precaution to bite off its head, it commenced scratching when it got down, and actually scratched a hole in the side of the other, through which it emerged in safety, while the voracious one died from the injury, and was speedily gobbled up in turn by his relations.

Daniel Webster's friends gave him a very hearty reception in Boston on the 9th inst.—a large procession marching through the principal streets. It is estimated that 30,000 persons were on Boston Common when Mr. Webster delivered his speech.

Lake Erie is only 60 to 70 feet deep; Lake Ontario, which is 452 feet deep, has its bottom 230 feet below the level of the sea; Lakes Huron, Michigan, and Superior, although their surfaces are much higher, have their bottoms on the same level as that of Ontario. Lake Erie is accordingly a sort of shallow canal between large reservoirs of water.

The New York State Agricultural Society trial of grain reapers and other implements will commence at Utica, on Tuesday, 20th July. A large number of implements have been entered for the trial. The citizens of Geneva will have an exhibition of the machinery and implements at the same time, and a plowing match on Wednesday, July 21.

Montreal was visited by another destructive fire on the 9th inst. Nearly 700 acres were burnt over, including nearly all of the Quebec and St. Lawrence suburbs. Thousands of people were left without shelter. The loss of property is rated at about half a million of pounds sterling.

A very destructive fire occurred in Boston on Saturday afternoon, July 10—the largest for many years. The Mariners' Church, Sailors' Home, Boylston School House, and other valuable buildings, are destroyed. The fire is supposed to have been purposely kindled. Estimated loss $250,000.

On the 19th ult., at Fond du Lac, Wis., two men were overcome by noxious vapor in the bottom of a well. A Mr. Chapman threw cold water down upon them until one so revived as to be able to assist in extricating the other. Both were finally saved by the simple application of water.

There was a fire on board the steamship City of Manchester, just as she was coming up the river to Philadelphia on Friday last, caused by the barkeeper dropping a candle in the spirit room. It was soon extinguished, but two men were so burnt that they died the next day.

The New England Worsted Company has sustained a loss on its last year's business of $219,000, owing entirely to the depreciation of their surplus stock—a plain case of over production. The Company have under consideration the manufacture of Tapestry and Brussels Carpeting.

Large quantities of eggs are purchased at different points in Ohio for exportation to New York. The yolks are separated from the whites, which latter alone are shipped, the yolks being sold in the localities where the purchases are made. The whites are sold to metropolitan book-binders for gilding purposes.

A man named Francis Schidel, at the last term of the St. Louis Criminal Court, was sentenced to 104 years' imprisonment: five years for an assault with intent to kill, and ninety-nine years for shooting and killing a deputy constable.

We learn from the Madison Courier, that by the Revised Statutes of Indiana, of 1852, it is provided that laborers on public works, constructed by companies, shall, for the amount of work done by them on such works, have a lien on the property of the company constructing the same.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

Rev. 1: 10.—"In the Spirit on the Lord's Day."

Another text ordinarily adduced, and on which much is built of the supposed change, is that in the Book of the Revelation. It also names neither the Sabbath nor first day of the week, even according to our translation. We quote in connection:—

"Behold He cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him. Even so, Amen. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty. I John, who also am your brother, and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ. I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice as of a trumpet, saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last; and, What thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia." Rev. 1. 7—11.

Thus taken, as it stands in Scripture, it is difficult to see what reason there is for the idea that this text either proves or sanctions any change of the Sabbath. Yet from the fact of Christians in our own and other lands, more especially amongst Protestants, having long been accustomed to meet chiefly or solely on the first day of the week, and from their commonly applying to it the appellation "Lord's day," people are generally accustomed, on reading this text, to understand it as referring to the first day of the week. It does not, however, follow, that the Apostle John, who was favored with the vision, from the Book containing the account of which we have quoted, had the same notions which now prevail, or that he here intended in any degree to give countenance to our practices. He does not say on which day of the week it was that he enjoyed this revelation; and as Sunday is no where else in Scripture, either in the Old Testament or in the New, called "the Lord's day," we are not entitled, without better proof, to interpret the expression as having reference unto it.

Indeed, however prevalent the opinion is, and with it the intrepretation on which that opinion is founded, at no period of the Church's history has it, we believe, been without those who have questioned the accuracy of the general opinion. Amongst the learned, the meaning of this expression, "Lord's day," has been the subject of much debate, where the disputants were in no way influenced by the views we maintain regarding the Sabbath; and, from the evidence which there is of a corresponding expression having been introduced into other texts, in the Syriac version of the New Testament, the words "on the Lord's day" have by some been rejected as of later introduction, and as altogether apocryphal. On the other hand, Gill, and also the Theological Dictionary, state that, in the Ethiopic version, the text before us reads, "I was in the Spirit on the first day." Such a reading, however, can in no way be regarded as a translation of the Original of our copies. It may therefore be apprehended, that it owed its origin to the efforts made to reconcile Scripture with the practice of the church. But indeed such support it truly only could render by assuming both readings to be inspired; for if the right exclusive reading were that John was in the Spirit on the first day of the week, this would simply mark a date, without expressing sacredness, or in any way implying it, to the day so specified. It would even leave us without semblance of reference to our Lord's resurrection, or change of the Sabbath.

Daubuz, in his large Commentary upon the Apocalypse, although he takes it for granted that the words, "on the Lord's day," refer to the first day of the week, he yet adds, "I must not forget to observe here, that P. Colomesius hath conjectured, that this Lord's day might be the anniversary day of our Lord's resurrection, and not that which hath been observed weekly. And Dr. Hammond did so before him, as appears from two several places, (Hammond on Rev. i. 10 in the paraphase; and note on Rev. xviii. 2.) And indeed the Ethiopians still call Schambatah Crostos, the Sabbath of Christ, the Easter Holidays.* If I am not mistaken, Tertullian hath also used Dominicum Diem for Easter, in these words, 'Omelior fides nationum insuam: sectam; quæ nullam solemnitatem Christianorum sibi vindicat non Dominicum diem, non Pentecosten,' though we must not give this out for an absolute proof. It may have there the common signification. Yet he saith thus, in another place, 'Cur pascha celebramus animo circulo in meuse primo? cur quinquaginta exinde diebus in omni exultatione decurrimus?' Tertull. de Jejun. Cap. xiv." Daubuz therefore asks, 'Are not these alike?'"

"The very emphasis," says Morer, in his Dialogues on the Lord's Day, (p. 44,) "the very emphasis which some lay so great a stress on in the article te [the, in the original,] speaks louder for the anniversary of Christ's resurrection at Easter, which is always a double festival, than it doth for Sunday, when indeed we weekly commemorate that great act of our Redeemer, but do it at Easter in a more solemn manner, and much more agreeable to the excellency of the particle. There are those who apply it to the day of the Nativity, Ascension, and Pentecost, as days not inferior to the Resurrection in mystery, value, and benefit to man. But many assert the hemera Kurion [day of the Lord] and hemera Christon [day of Christ] to mean the same day, and that is the day of judgement, which Paul calls the Lord's day, ["that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus," 1 Cor. v. 5,] and which John in an ecstasy is supposed to see as already come."

In the Original it is not, "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day;" for the definite article the is wanting before Spirit. It reads, therefore, "I was, in spirit, in [en] the Lord's day," or, more correctly, "in the lordly day," for it is the adjective that is connected with day. And when we consider the design of the book, as a revelation of the events connected with the great day of the Lord, we have thus a distinct and consistent view of the declaration concerning the state in which John, as a New Testament prophet, was put, when called to foretell, for the guidance of the Church, events of such magnitude. He was in spirit, though not in body, in the day of the Lord. It is thus in harmony also with other expressions of the Apostle, and with numerous similar statements in other of the inspired books. The words, according to this view, imply the Apostle's being in spirit where and when in body he was not. In body, John was in Patmos, as it was eighteen hundred years ago; but, in spirit, he was in the day of the Lord, under circumstances which are still future.

This is precisely analogous to what is stated concerning their state when receiving prophetic communications. While Ezekiel was among the captives in Babylon, he was so favored of the Lord. Thus he declares, "The hand of the Lord was upon me, and carried me out, in the Spirit of the Lord, and set me down in the midst of the valley which was full of bones." Ezek. xxxvii. 1. 2. This was a transportation, not in the body; but the hand of the Lord being upon him, he was carried out "in the Spirit of the Lord." On a previous occasion, also, as he sat in his house, and the elders of Judah sat before him, he informs us, "the Spirit lifted me up between the earth and the heaven, and brought me, in the visions of God, to Jerusalem, to the door of the inner gate that looketh toward the north," in order that he might be shown the abominations practiced by his people. (Ezek. viii. 1—17.) So again, "Afterwards the Spirit took me up and brought me in a vision, by the Spirit of God, into Chaldea, to them of the captivity; so the vision that I had seen went up from me." (Ezek xi. 24.) Thus is he wafted from place to place; at one time he is "among the captives by the river of Chebar;" at another, he "came to them of the captivity at Tell-Abib;" and yet again, at another, he is brought "to Jerusalem, to the door of the inner gate,"—but still he all the while is aware that this is but in Spirit; it is only "in the visions of God."

This is still more distinctly expressed in Ezekiel's magnificent closing vision of the day of the Lord. While yet in Babylon in reality, "the hand of the Lord," says he, "was upon me, and brought me thither. In the vision of God brought He me into the land of Israel, and set me upon a very high mountain, by which was as the frame of a city on the south. And He brought me thither." Ezek. xl. 1, 2. The prophet proceeds fully to declare the wonders of the day of his people's conversion and final restoration—of their happiness and the Saviour's glory—but still he was amid the wonders and the glories of that blessed day only "in the visions of God." Thus, anticipating many generations, in Spirit brought "unto the land of Israel," while yet in body in the land of Babylon—beholding the glories of millennial bliss, and all unconscious for the time, it may be, to what was being transacted around him—a captive still in Babylon, yet wholly occupied with the visions of the glory of the Lord, and of better days for his people in their own beloved land, "the land of Israel." The natural senses and faculties of the prophet were thus put in abeyance. Still he knew and was able to inform us, that all this was not in the body, but only in the Spirit; while if, as is generally believed, the "man" of whom Paul speaks was himself, he was, in this respect, more peculiarly situated; for although he distinctly intimates that "he was caught up into Paradise," he is yet constrained to add, "whether in the body or out of the body, I cannot tell." 2 Cor. xii. 2—4.

But, as Ezekiel knew that he was still in Babylon, when entranced, and "saw visions of God," so John also knew that he "was in the isle that is called Patmos," when he was in Spirit in the Lordly day or day of the Lord, and heard behind him a great voice as of a trumpet, saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last, and, What thou seest write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia. There seems to me a perfect parallel between this statement and those which I have quoted from the prophet Ezekiel—a parallelism which is not merely verbal, but equally also in the purposes for which the prophets, both earlier and later, respectively enjoyed their visions. It is not merely in their being in a sense taken out of themselves, in order that they might see visions beyond the reach of the natural eye, nor in their being instructed to declare what they saw, that we may perceive this correspondence in the visions of the Old and New Testament prophets. The description of the Saviour's person given by both is the same; and as, when Ezekiel was brought in vision into the land of his fathers, "behold the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east, and His voice was like a noise of many waters; and the earth shined with His glory," (Ezek. xi. 2;) so John also, in "the Revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto His servants things which must shortly come to pass," when he saw one "like unto the son of man," heard "his voice as the sound of many waters." Rev. i. 1, 13, 15. And as this Old Testament prophet was, in the Spirit, "set upon a very high mountain," and saw the city Jehovah Shammah, "the Lord is there," so the New Testament Apostle says, an angel "carried me away, in the Spirit, to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the Holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God," and both, under the inspiration of the same Spirit, describe its gates and give its measurements. (Ezek. xlviii. 30—35. Rev. xxi. 9—17.

And it seems a matter of no little importance, when seeking to understand the import of the Apostle's words, "I was in the Spirit in the Lord's day," at the opening of his sublime vision of our Lord's future glory, to find near the close the Apostle, in the words quoted, thus again intimating that he was "in the Spirit" carried away "to a great and high mountain." For, as we are thus distinctly taught, that like Ezekiel he was transported "in the Spirit to a great and high mountain," so may we the more readily inquire whether he meant not to intimate, by these words, that he was also carried forward in the Spirit to be placed amid future scenes "in the Lord's day" of His coming glory. THE ELDER IN TROUBLE.

"Be not deceived," said one, when giving admonition under the direction of the Spirit. The necessity of this was finely illustrated in a recent conversation. An old Christian woman was visiting her friends. They were content with that antiquated creed known in the Apostles' day as "the faith which was once delivered to the saints." It seemed that the visitor's attainments far outreached the things there intended, for these she called "the rudiments," and her wonderful experience "perfection," which she explained to mean complete and entire freedom from sin. Now it so happened that the head of the household was an old man, and an elder in his church. But his guest's experience seemed not only far beyond his, but also entirely contradictory to his understanding of that rule of faith, the Word. As might be expected of a simple Dutchman, he became quite puzzled. He could not at a jump get over it. The ninth chapter of Daniel and the seventh of Romans—the one containing the prayer of a holy prophet, and the other the experience of a holy apostle, came to mind. The purity of the old woman, "enjoying the blessing of perfection," seemed to leave these holy men in such depths of impurity as to bewilder him. He was fast making up his mind to bring the matter before the dominie for explanation; for, thought he, if he be a teacher sent from God, he ought to know something about this matter. But "the meek will He guide in judgment;" and the old man was soon taught in a way the least expected.

"You don't mean that you are absolutely free from all sin?" suggested the elder, as though he might be mistaken in her meaning.

"O, yes," said the old woman; "I can truly say, that for the past two weeks I have not known what sin is."

The elder was afraid she did not know the nature of sin; but as her words were intended to mean that she "had no sin," he was sorely embarrassed; for, despite of himself, the words of John the apostle came plump to mind: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves." Nor was he less so, even after a most vigorous scratching over his right ear—a habit of the old man, whenever perplexed.

"Did you hear," said the visitor, abruptly changing the subject, "did you hear about those two young Jews abroad, who have suddenly entered into a most enormous property? I saw it in the paper."

"No," said the elder, mechanically; for the new doctrine "kept troubling him."

"O, it is wonderful how some folks do get rich, and others don't!" exclaimed the good woman.

But still the new doctrine was perplexing the elder.

"Very wonderful!" continued the old lady. "And I've been thinking for the week past, if I had one tenth of what they got, I should be satisfied."

"What?" exclaimed the elder. "How is this? You have lived in sinless perfection for two weeks past, and yet for half that time have been committing covetousness, the most deadly sin mentioned in the holy book. Well, this too is contrary to my understanding. But this I do know, 'the heart is deceitful above all things.'" And the elder shook his head, like one relieved of his embarrassment, at the same time very mildly adding, "Take heed that ye be not deceived." [Ch. Intelligencer.

DYING WORDS OF WILBERFORCE.

"Come and sit near me; let me lean on you," said Wilberforce to a friend a few minutes before his death. Afterward, putting his arms around that friend, he said: "God bless you, my dear." He became agitated somewhat, and then ceased speaking. Presently, however, he said, "I must leave you, my fond friend; we shall walk no further through this world together; but I hope we shall meet in heaven. Let us talk of heaven. Do not weep for me, dear F——, do not weep; for I am very happy; but think of me, and let the thought make you press forward. I never knew happiness till I found Christ as a Saviour. Read the Bible—read the Bible! Let no religious book take its place. Through all my perplexities and distresses I never read any other book, and I never felt the want of any other. It has been my hourly study; and all my knowledge of the doctrines, and all my acquaintance with the experience and realities of religion, have been derived from the Bible only. I think religious people do not read the Bible enough. Books about religion may be useful enough, but they will not do instead of the simple truth of the Bible." He afterward spoke of the regret of parting with his friend. "Nothing," said he, "convinces me more of the reality of the change within me, than the feelings with which I can contemplate a separation from my family. I now feel so weaned from earth, my affections so much in heaven, that I can leave you all without regret; yet I do not love you less, but God more."

"BY THE RIVERS OF BABYLON."

PSALM CXXXVII.

From a new and well-printed edition of the Poetical Works of Fitz Greene Halleck, published in New York, by Redfield, we select the following poem:—

We sat us down and wept,
Where Babel's waters slept,
And we thought of home and Zion as a long-gone happy dream;
We hung our harps in air
On the willow boughs, which there,
Gloomy as round a sepulchre, were drooping o'er the stream

The foes, whose chain we wore,
Were with us on that shore,
Exulting in our tears that told the bitterness of wo.
"Sing us," they cried aloud,
"Ye, once so high and proud,
The songs ye sang in Zion ere we laid her glory low."

And shall the harp of heaven
To Judah's monarch given
Be touched by captive fingers, or grace a fettered hand?
No! sooner be my tongue
Mute, powerless, and unstrung,
Than its words of holy music make glad a stranger land.

May this right hand, whose skill
Can wake the harp at will,
And bid the listener's joys or griefs in light or darkness come,
Forget its godlike power,
If for one brief, dark hour,
My heart forgets Jerusalem, fallen city of my home!

Daughter of Babylon!
Blessed be that chosen one,
Whom God shall send to smite thee when there is none to save:
He from the mother's breast,
Shall pluck the babe at rest,
And lay it in the sleep of death beside its father's grave.

"After that he was left to prosper. He accumulated property very fast, and died before he found time to enjoy it," said Mr. Somers.

"Did he die without hope?" said Mr. Hunt.

"He was sick only two days, and was delirious for the whole time. His incoherent thoughts had reference to a new business enterprise in which he had just engaged."

"Another sad illustration of the dangers of delay."

Mr. Somers and Mr. Hunt were on their way home from a prayer-meeting, and brought their conversation to a close while they stopped for a moment at a point where the ways separated. Mr. Ames overtook them just in time to hear the remarks above recorded. He was struck by an expression used by Mr. Somers—"he was left to prosper." As uttered by Mr. Somers, it implied something like a judicial visitation—a judgment instead of a blessing. Mr. Ames had been accustomed to regard prosperity as a blessing. A moment's reflection convinced him that there was something in the previous history of the man referred to, which led Mr. Somers to use the expression. His curiosity was excited.

"Mr. Somers, (said he,) can I, without impropriety, ask to whom your remark, 'he was left to prosper,' had reference?"

"I was speaking of a Mr. Johnson, a man who lived near me before I came to this place."

"Does not the blessing of God cause prosperity?"

"It does, but prosperity is not always a blessing—nay, it is often a great evil. One of the best and wisest men our country has ever produced, I refer to Chief Justice Jay, says, in a letter to one of his children, 'If there be any temporal state or condition, which more than others affords reason for alarm and apprehension, I think it is that of a long and uninterrupted course of wordly prosperity; for it is said, If ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons.' I suppose that God sometimes gives men the desires of their hearts, though it be their ruin.

"You think that was the case in regard to Mr. Johnson?"

"I do. He was early taught to know his duty. His father died when he was young, but he was brought up by an uncle, who was a very good man. His mind was wrought upon by the Spirit several times before he was of age, and at one time, almost all who knew him thought he was a Christian. His general conduct was always very blameless, so far as men were concerned, and for more than a year he was strict in his attendance upon all the meetings held in the congregation, and many expected him to make a profession of religion. He told me afterwards that he could not at that time make up his mind to forsake all for Christ. He had a course of life marked out, and the object of that course was wealth. He was afraid, if he became a Christian, it would be his duty to be a minister. Many years afterwards, after hearing a sermon, the object of which was to show that every man had his calling from the Lord, that some were called to be lawyers, some farmers, some merchants, and some ministers, he remarked, 'If I had heard that sermon a dozen years ago, I should have become a Christian. I thought if I became a Christian, I should be obliged to become a minister, and I could not make up my mind to that.'"

"Did no one urge him to become a Christian, when he had thus discovered his error?"

"Yes, the occasion was taken to press the matter home upon his attention, but his excuse was that he had so many things to think of, that he could not bestow upon religion the amount of thought that was necessary. He said he liked to do thoroughly what he did, and he could do but one thing at a time. If he were to undertake to attend to religion, then he should not half attend to it, for he had a world of business on his hands. He was asked when he would have less, and he said that he did not expect to be always as busy as he was then. A revival took place not long afterwards; he was awakened, but he could not spare time to attend the meetings, and his seriousness passed away, and while others pressed into the kingdom, he staid without. God then sent adversity to rouse him, and to loosen that hold upon earth that was dragging him down to hell. Some of his best laid plans were frustrated, and some of his most confident expectations disappointed. A friend then went to him, and told him God had given him time to take care of his soul. 'You were never more mistaken in your life,' was his reply, 'for I am harrassed night and day. If I were sure of being lost, I could not attend to religion while my affairs are in their present state.' It was in vain that his reason and conscience were appealed to. He gave his undivided attention to his business, and succeeded in meeting all his engagements, and entered again upon his former course. Another revival season came and another season of embarrassment in business. After that, it seemed to me that God left him to prosper. He avoided all conversation on the subject of religion, and attended church only half the day on the Sabbath. He was prospered in all his plans. He soon became the most wealthy man in the place. He entered upon several new kinds of business, and prospered in them all. When he had become far richer than he had ever expected to be, even in his youthful dreams, he was suddenly called to render an account of his stewardship."

"It seems that his history, like that of many others, can be written in a single line, 'he made money, and died without hope,'" said Mr. Ames.

"There are many who die without hope, who have never made money, though they have ruined their souls in the attempt."

"Their case is still more deplorable than that of those who do succeed in their efforts."

"It does not strike me so. To be sure, their end, 'their dreadful end,' is the same. But before the end cometh, I look upon those who have been left to prosper as in the more deplorable condition."

MATURITY OF GRACE.

Flavel, in his Meditations on the Harvest Season, gives the following three signs of the maturity of grace:—

1. When the corn is near ripe, it bows the head and stoops lower than when it was green. When the people of God are near ripe for heaven, they grow more humble and self-denying than in the days of their first profession. The longer a saint grows in the world, the better still he is acquainted with his own heart and his obligations to God; both of which are very humbling things. Paul had one foot in heaven when he called himself the chiefest of sinners and least of saints. 1 Tim. 1: 15. Eph. 3: 8. A Christian, in the progress of his knowledge and grace, is like a vessel cast into the sea—the more it fills, the deeper it sinks.

2. When the harvest is nigh, the grain is more solid and pithy than ever it was before. Green corn is soft and spongy, but ripe corn is substantial and weighty. So it is with Christians; the affections of a young Christian, perhaps, are more feverous and sprightly; but those of a grown Christian are more judicious and solid; their love to Christ abounds more and more in all judgment. Phil. 1: 8. The limbs of a child are more active and pliable; but as he grows up to a more perfect state, the parts are more consolidated and firmly knit. The fingers of an old musician are not so nimble, but he hath a more judicious ear in music than in his youth.

3. When corn is dead ripe, it is apt to fall of its own account on the ground, and there shed; whereby it doth, as it were, anticipate the harvest-man, and calls upon him to put in the sickle. Not unlike to which are the lookings and longings, the groanings and hastenings of ready Christians to their expected glory. They hasten to the coming of the Lord, or, as Montanus more fitly renders it, they hasten the coming of the Lord; that is, they are earnest and instant in their desires and cries to hasten his coming; their desires sally forth to meet the Lord; they willingly take Death by the hand; as the corn bends to the earth, so do these souls to heaven. This shows their harvest to be near.

POOR ZEKE; OR, LET HIM PRAY.

In a wild, sequestered place, quite away from the bounds of my congregation, there lived a very wicked family, a father, mother, two brothers, and three sisters. None of them attended any meeting. One of the brothers was wanting in common sense. His name was Ezekiel. As he was not supposed to have mind enough to be put to any work, he used to stroll away, and be gone sometimes several days.

One day, as I was preaching on the pity Jesus has for poor sinners, I observed "poor Zeke" looking me in the face; and every time I said Jesus pitied poor sinners, the tears would start from his eyes. As there was more than usual attention to religion, we had meetings often; and whether it was a lecture, or a prayer-meeting, or an inquiry-meeting, "poor Zeke" was sure to be there.

At length I asked him if he loved Jesus, and he answered, "Yes." "Why do you love Jesus?" said I. "O, 'cause he love poor, wicked Zeke so." "Have you been wicked?" "Yes, I full, full of wicked." "Do you pray?" said I. "O, yes." "What do you say when you pray?" "I say, O my Jesus, pity poor Zeke. O take all my wicked away."

After a while he went home. His appearance was changed. He had lost his seeming vacancy of look and thought. But he dare not pray in the house, for all were full of fun and noise. So he went to the barn, and there he fell on his knees and uttered his broken prayer to Him who "hath chosen the weak things of this world to confound the mighty." His brother, going into the barn, heard him crying to God so fervently that it alarmed him. He went in and told his father, with an oath, that Zeke was in the barn praying. At this, his father ran to the barn and listened, and found the boy indeed at prayer. He went in and spoke to him; but he "cried so much the more a great deal." "Stop your noise, Zeke!" said his angry father, but he kept on. So they took hold of him and got him into the house, in hopes of quieting him.

They asked him where he had been, and how he came to feel so. He told them a very rational story about it. But the more he talked, the more his father scolded. Poor Zeke found he could say no more, and then fell down on his knees again. His father tried to silence him; but his mother loved her poor boy, and begged them to let him pray.

When he had arisen from prayer, his mother said, "It is high time we all prayed, Ezekiel, will you pray for your mother?" "O yes," he said; and down again he went upon his knees, and his mother with him. Not many days after, she too was full of joy at the thought of Jesus' dying pity. By this time the brother who had first heard him pray was sobbing out, "What shall I do?" Poor Zeke said, "Go to Jesus." Then Zeke and his mother prayed for him, and he too found his distress giving way to unspeakable joy. There were three to pray for a hardened husband and an unfeeling father. He fought and ridiculed until their three daughters were added unto the Lord. This made five who had now joined Ezekiel and embraced his religion.

At last his father saw himself alone. His heart broke; he wept like a child. He went to his son and confessed his sin in opposing him, and got him to pray for him. His burden was removed; he rejoiced in God. He erected the family altar, and it was a solemn sight to see seven persons, who had a few weeks before been profane and careless, now all brought over from the service of Satan to the service of the Lord. And it was a joyful day when poor Zeke, with his father and mother, his brother and sisters, united with God's people, and came together to the communion.

Reflect, that if a poor, ignorant, and foolish child, under God, can do so much good, what a solemn account must they have to render at last, who, having talents, yet often shrink at the cross, and let sinners perish. [American Messenger.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON AND HALLEY.

Sir Isaac Newton set out in life a clamorous infidel; but on a nice examination of the evidences of Christianity, he found reason to change his opinions. When the celebrated Dr. Edmund Halley was talking infidelity before him, Sir Isaac addressed him in this wise: "Dr. Halley, I am always glad to hear you when you speak about astronomy, or other parts of the mathematics, because those are subjects which you have studied, and well understand; but you should not talk of Christianity, for you have not studied it. I have; and I am certain that you know nothing of the matter." This was a just reproof, and one that would be very suitable to be given to half the infidels of the present day, for they often speak of what they have never studied, and what, in fact, they are entirely ignorant of. Dr. Johnson, therefore, well observed, that no honest man could be a Deist, for the reason that no man could be so after a fair examination of the proofs of Christianity. On the name of Hume being mentioned to him, "No, sir," said he, "Hume once owned to a clergyman in the bishopric of Durham, that he had never read the New Testament with attention."

MISSIONARY LIFE IN INDIA.

This is no time for the churches to relax their efforts, or to take up the lamentation, that their efforts have been in vain. Never did India present such a scene of interest and excitement, and never was there such reason to cry to the churches of Britain and America, "Come over and help us." Nor should any be deterred from entering on this service, under the impression that, owing to the deadly climate of India, missionary life there must be short. The impression has extensively gone out, that its average duration in that country is only seven years. But the writer in the Calcutta Review, already quoted from, shows that this is a great mistake. From a careful induction of the lives or services of two hundred and fifty missionaries, it appears that the average duration of their missionary labor has been 16¾ years. At first it was much less; but owing to a better knowledge of the climate, and of the precautions to be used to secure health, the average has improved, and is still becoming greater year by year. In proof of this, take the following facts. Out of the one hundred and forty-seven missionaries laboring in India and Ceylon in 1830, not less than fifty are still laboring in health and usefulness; while of the ninety-seven others who have died or retired from labor, twenty labored more than twenty years each. Several missionaries now in India have been there more than thirty years each. Among the three hundred and eighty-one foreign missionaries in India, constituting about one-fourth of the whole number who have been sent into all the world, there were in 1850 only four deaths; and only about twenty of this number found it necessary to be absent from their stations on account of their health.

A PROTECTION AGAINST EVIL.

It is said that bees and wasps will not sting a person whose skin is imbued with honey. Hence those who are much exposed to the venom of those little creatures, when they have occasion to hive bees, or take a nest of wasps, smear their face and hands with honey, which is found to be the best preservative. When we are annoyed with insult, persecution, and oppression from perverse and malignant men, the best defense against their venom is to have the spirit bathed in honey. Let every part be saturated with meekness, gentleness, forbearance, patience, and the most spiteful enemy will be disappointed in his endeavors to inflict a sting. We shall remain uninjured, while his venom returns to corrode his own malignant bosom; or, what is far better, the honey with which he comes in contact will neutralize his hatred, and the good returned for evil overcome evil with good.

Thomas Jefferson was a shrewd, practical man, a trait never better illustrated than when he said, "Were I to commence my administration again, with the knowledge I have acquired from experience, the first question I should ask, with regard to candidates for public office, would be, Is he addicted to the use of ardent spirits?"

SECTARIAN ZEAL.

In this world of multifarious views, a certain measure of what is popularly called sectarianism seems unavoidable. It is evident, however, that it may be carried to an extreme. There may even be a disproportionate expenditure of zeal in behalf of some truth of God's word. We do not mean, that there may be more zeal than is necessary in behalf of God's truth, taken as a whole. For that is impossible, if it be our duty to serve God with all our strength. But we mean, that some particular item of that truth may so absorb our attention, that other items, not less important, will be neglected, and their saving benefit lost. It is in this sense, that we use the term sectarianism.

We do not suppose that any man will be justified on the ground of his obedience to God's truth, even though that obedience be as perfect as it is possible for gospel grace, working in the heart, to render it. Still less do we suppose, that obedience to any one item of truth will justify him. Justification rests solely upon the finished work of the Lord Jesus Christ. But we do suppose, that every particle of divine truth exercises a saving influence upon the heart of him who receives it; that is, it tends to his sanctification. In proof of this, see John 15: 3, and 17: 17, Eph. 5: 26, 1 Pet. 1: 22, also Rom. 6: 17, where Scripture doctrine is represented as the mold in which believers are cast, that they may, by hearty obedience to it, become holy.

Now, if a founder, proposing to cast an image, should find that the metal which he had poured into a matrice had settled to one side, so as to give a monstrously large development to an arm, or a leg, leaving every other part imperfectly formed, it would be but an illustration of what is often witnessed among those who are called Christians. The great desideratum is to have every believer modeled after the image of Jesus Christ, and the matrice of divine truth is perfect, and every way calculated for bringing about the object. Nevertheless, the object is but imperfectly realized. But the fault lies in the material used; in other words, in the heart, which is so perversely corrupt as to resist the modifying influence. Instead of coming from the mold, beautifully and proportionately developed in every part, he appears to be in many instances a one-sided and unsymmetrical formation. Great zeal is manifested in one particular branch of obedience, and culpable indifference about others. So it was with some of old. They tithed mint, and anise, and cummin, with punctilious care, but neglected judgment, mercy, and faith. Alas, the descendants of such zealots are too numerous!

It is evident that, upon such subjects, the saving influence of divine truth is in a great measure lost. The doctrine concerning those duties about which they are so indifferent, has no opportunity to exert its sanctifying power upon them. This being the case, the zeal which they evince for particular duties, instead of being sanctified zeal, is only party-spirit. A true zeal for God's glory embraces every thing which he has commanded. If, on the contrary, our zeal is confined to one particular, there is reason to suspect that it is more because we are particularly interested, than because God himself has enjoined it. For certainly, he has given no intimation that he feels more interested in one part of divine truth, than in another.

Now, as it should be our aim to secure for ourselves the saving benefit of every part of divine truth, in equal proportion, so we ought to guard against all those influences, however plausible they may seem, which tend to draw us into an excessive manifestation of zeal for any one branch of duty.

It is granted, however, that under certain circumstances, an unwonted zeal for a particular duty may be called for. If it is a duty which is treated with marked neglect by the community into whose circle we are thrown; if it is one which almost every body has resolved upon setting aside, or about which there is a general misapprehension as to its claims upon public regard, there can be no doubt, that extraordinary zeal in its behalf is demanded. Common zeal will not answer, under such circumstances. Any thing less than extraordinary earnestness will not suffice to put us under the saving influence of the duty; the general apathy in regard to it creating a moral atmosphere, whose hurtful effects cannot be otherwise resisted. In whatever degree the performance of the duty tends to our sanctification, this effect cannot be realized without that extraordinary zeal, which, in nine cases out of ten, will expose us to the charge of fanaticism.

Even under these circumstances, however, there is danger. The very effort we are called to make, being so much greater than what is demanded in respect to other duties, may be the means of beguiling us into an over-estimate of the importance of the one, the neglect of which, by the community at large, is a matter of so much pain to us. There is danger of making our religion to consist chiefly in it: and we are but too apt to consider those who do not see the subject in the same strong light that we do, as perversely bent on rebellion against God. We cannot be too careful in this matter. The heart is deceitful above all things; and we may think we are actuated by zeal for God's glory, when it is nothing more than the spirit of party.

GLIMPSES OF DOMESTIC LIFE IN CHINA.

No. 12—The Dormitory.

I thought to have filled this sheet of "Glimpses" with details of the dormitory; but, on referring back, I find I have already, at different times, given you rather a full description of it. Whatever I may have said of one such room, applies about equally to all; for this department exhibits, perhaps, as much sameness, as any one whatever. Whether, through the open street door you catch a glimpse, in passing, of the couch of some poor tenant, too poor to possess an inner room; or whether you go beyond, where every room increases in consequence, and every step shows you that onward is only the synonym for upward, in the domestic vocabulary of the Chinese; still, the outline is every where the same. You first come to the servants' rooms, then to those of the different members of the family in the order of their importance, &c.

The bedstead is never without its curtain, and this is of coarse linen, generally blue, opening in front, and fastened back in the day time, with long brass hooks, suspended by cords from the distant corners. This curtain, which is a musquitoe net in summer, is also a screen in winter; so, for economy's sake, (to save them the extravagance of duplicates,) the prudent critic will excuse the closeness of the texture, blue and coarse as it is, although a mere glance at it, during the sultry heats of summer, is sufficient to send a feeling of suffocation through the sensitive frame of a fereigner. All this is amply atoned for by its perfect adaptedness to the bleak winds of winter, which find but a meager check in the best-built walls of a common Chinese house. Little care is taken to make tight either the walls or floors of the second story, (the general sleeping loft,) single boards being considered quite sufficient for either.

The form of the bedstead is ever the same; but it differs in elegance in every conceivable degree, from that of the rude, unpainted framework, to the costly carved couch, inlaid with ivory, and radiant with gold, differing proportionately in value, until an incredible degree of extravagance is sometimes attained. I know of no article of domestic furniture which can compare with this in costliness and elegance. Their choicest ornaments, too, as well as their most potent charms, are here displayed. Among these is often conspicuous a hideous-looking tiger (law-hoo) suspended at the opening in front, whose peculiar office it is to frighten away the wicked spirits that come to trouble children in the night time. Where children do not sleep, these are useless, and their place is supplied by others, having different offices to perform, or, as is sometimes the case, they are dispensed with altogether.

But the "bridal bed" seems to constitute a sort of compendium of the whole, and is of itself a little museum of amulets. The curtain seems alive with flying fish, birds, butterflies, and bats, or strange caricatures of each, which might puzzle a naturalist to decide to which division of the animal kingdom they were designed to belong. That, however, is of far less consequence to the new married pair, than is the prospective good fortune thereby secured—the blessings of long life, health, wealth, and a numerous posterity, all which are summed up in this mystical character, which we see everywhere inscribed, the character "Fo," (felicity.) The secret of the charm consists in the symbolical grains of rice, cash, beans, or sprigs of evergreen, which are folded in bits of paper, and carefully secured within. Nor are all arranged merely for show; even the pillow receives its share, and the fortunate incumbent is not forgotten; indeed, it were difficult to say whether there were any but charmed objects belonging to the happy household.

In front of the bedstead is sometimes a supplementary fixture, a sort of ante-chamber, sufficiently deep to receive a chair and candlestand, the whole reminding one of the state-rooms of a ship, and able to comprise quite as many of the comforts of a Chinese dormitory as does the state-room of our own. This requires its separate screen, and strikes the observer at once as a remarkable specimen of refined taste, just in those departments where every thing else displays such shocking want of it.

Near the bed's head is placed a dressing table, which, in its appearance, and the general outlines of its furniture, does not differ much from the same article with us. The looking glass may be either an elegant mirror, in its curiously-wrought frame, supported by elaborately-carved feet, or a simple reflector in the top of the dressing case. There are no ivory combs, but in their stead are huge wooden ones, which perform their office well, with the help of stiff long hair brushes. There are pomatums and perfumes, large red cords for fastening back the hair, and pins and braces with which to secure it, as well as the extra coil of borrowed hair—an indispensable accompaniment to the finished toilet. There are brushes for the eyebrows, and others for the teeth and the nails; rings and pendants for the ears, and bracelets and chains for the hands, arms and neck; bandages and shoes for the little feet, and flowers and bands for the head; embroidered girdles and handkerchiefs, as well as fans and amulets, for the completion of the full dress. Perhaps I should not omit the chalk for the brows, and the rouge for the cheeks and lips; for although not always used, I am inclined to think it a great mistake that they are the exclusive appropriation of those who maintain but a doubtful reputation before the world.

Next comes the wardrobe—a sort of press, very like our own, but, as far as I have seen, the receptacle of more incongruities than could well be crowded into the same space in any but Chinese economy. Elsewhere the walls are well lined with chests, trunks, or cabinets, as you please, (square boxes, with deep hollow lids,) placed one above another, sometimes to the very ceiling, and nearly all, as well as the wardrobe, brilliant in their coating of red paint and varnish. Stools, mostly, instead of chairs, are scattered about the room; a square table at the front side is covered with materials for embroidery, and adorned with a long tobacco pipe and well-filled box, apparatus for striking a fire, teapot and covered cups, abaccus and cash, with such other implements of housewifery as are incident to the domestic duties, not forgetting the dice board, the ever ready resource for the amusement and entertainment of visitors. Add to these the guitar, which is about as common as the piano at home, and you have the inner apartment, the female sanctorum, the nursery of the child, the cloister of the maiden, the parlor of the wife. It is here that she receives the privileged visitors of the family. It is here that she works, and sleeps, and eats, although, as I have said, the latter may be accomplished anywhere, where there is room for bowl, chop-sticks, and a stool. Carpets are seldom used, but grass mats and bamboo footstools are common; and much are they needed; for the damp tiles of the ground floor, and the large seams of the upper ones, are among our greatest discomforts in visiting our heathen neighbors, unless indeed they are equaled by the constant fear that we are not sure of leaving the house without carrying away one or more of its most dreaded of all living little nuisances. This state of things is the necessary result of their domestic habits. The floors, although the most proper subjects imaginable for that kind of treatment, have never dreamed of the "water cure," and are almost as much strangers to the healthful influences of dry friction. But here I would gladly veil the picture to my own imagination, or transfer the scene entirely to yours, with, as usual, one or two exceptions; for truth allows me to say, that I have seen some tidy-looking Chinese houses; not that American houses in the same state would be considered so; but I am giving you a glimpse of domestic life in China. Facts are what you ask, and these oblige me to say, what would otherwise be never written by me; and I should owe you a humble apology if your feelings are half as much distressed by the recital as my own.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Elections—The Crystal Palace and Sunday—Dr. Achilli.

GLASGOW, July 9, 1852.

This has been a busy week among the politicians of our country. The comparatively short period within which the elections of members for the ensuing Parliament were required to be returned, has caused an unusually early appeal to the constituency. The details, even if we were disposed to enter upon them, would be of little interest to the readers of the Sabbath Recorder. One or two points, however, we may notice. Mr Salomons, one Jewish candidate, has been rejected at Greenwich, where formerly he was successful; another, (Baron Rothschild,) is again returned as one of the members for "the City" of London. George Thompson, the anti-slavery advocate, and of notoriety in relation to questions less desirable, has been rejected by his former constituents of the Tower Hamlets by a large majority. Mr. Mial, the editor and proprietor of the Nonconformist, and who devotes his whole energies (and they are great) for the overthrow of Religious Establishments—and who, by the way, had the courage to say of my pamphlet in opposition to a change of the Sabbath at the Resurrection of Christ, that it is "well written and carefully reasoned"—had this day at 12 o'clock polled 1188, while there were but 312 for Mr. Ramsey, the opposing candidate, for Rochdale. Glasgow is certain, almost, as I write now possibly after the close of the poll, to return her former representatives, Hastie and Macgregor—the former a religious man of "voluntary" principles, the latter with no pretension to a character for godliness, pluming himself on being a decided "free trader." But the most noticeable feature in the Glasgow election is in its relation to the Sunday Question. One of the candidates is Mr. Blackburn, Chairman of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, and who took measures to shut the line on one of "the six working days," according to the Word, but which the Church has converted into a day of rest. Irrespective, therefore, of politics or other qualifications—irrespective even of all consideration of the motives which prompted to the act—there was in this single circumstance what commended him to a large number of voters among our Sunday-prize givers and Sunday-prize essay writers and approvers, so that his friends were somewhat confident of success. In this, however, they have been disappointed. We are somewhat confident that he will be found to have polled little more than half the number of votes obtained by either of the successful candidates. And, looking at the fact that the moral and religious character of our public men is often made of little account, this result is the more remarkable, as Mr. Blackburn is allowed to be the most able and effective speaker who has presented himself on this occasion, soliciting our suffrages. The only candidate in favor of the Grant to Maynooth Popish Seminary withdrew about noon in despair of success.

The Times, in an article in favor of the New Crystal Palace being opened on Sundays, says, "Many thousands go by rail every Sunday and Monday to the tea gardens at Auerley, Leydenham, and other places." The Record, commenting upon this, argues that it is justifying the adoption of one sinful practice by the existence of another. This would be intelligible, and logical also, if there were any divine law sanctifying Sunday to men; but when the Record complains loudly of "unskillful divines," who, it says, "have played fast and loose" with the fourth commandment, which they should take as their banner, we can only wonder at the influence which traditional prejudice exercises in blinding men against the plain and obvious truth. But such have human law still in favor of their views; and at the Thames Police Office, Edwin Twinn, a butcher, was lately fined five shillings for having his shop open for business on Sunday forenoon, after 11 o'clock, which he had for a long time been accustomed to have. He refused to pay the penalty, and said he should resist any attempt to enforce it. We know not if he did afterwards submit.

Dr. Achilli, who obtained a verdict for libel against Dr. Newman last week, has resumed preaching in Italian to his countrymen in London—which he had been obliged to discontinue for some weeks previous to the trial. The effect of the trial has been unfavorable to the Popish cause, as showing what even the Papists themselves must think may or might be the evil conduct of the priesthood, and how little check would be given to it. That it promotes immorality, there can be no doubt, while ignorance or rejection of God's Word by the bulk of its adherents is the avowed aim where there is any hope of being able to enforce compliance. Yet this system, Lord Monteagle stated in the House of Lords within these two weeks, is endowed in 24 out of our 38 colonies in Asia, Africa, America, and Australia, out of the Colonial or Treasury funds.

LETTER FROM A COLPORTEUR.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

Dunkirk has been growing rapidly since it became the terminus of the New York and Erie Railroad. Much of the business of the place, however, is very transient. Passengers coming in by the Erie Railroad seek the boats bound for Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, and their various places of destination, scarcely leaving for the place as much as a "thank you."

Dunkirk is very unsettled in its religious character. Other things absorb the attention of the inhabitants, at the expense of their educational and religious interests. Hotels and travelers' homes are being multiplied, while there are no new houses for schools, and there is only one place that is worthy to be called a house of public worship, for these three thousand inhabitants. The people have not yet learned to "seek first the kingdom of God."

But Dunkirk affords great opportunities for the extensive circulation of Sabbath Tracts. The only local preacher in this place did not wish to discuss the Sabbath Question—had examined it in his theological course—was perfectly satisfied—did not want any tracts—was not under any obligation to investigate a subject because some renegade Presbyterian had gone over to the Baptists.

The general expression of the people in this village is, that the Lord don't care about them, and they don't care when Sunday comes. I had opportunity, on board the boats, to present tracts to persons from different States, and some intelligent men from the old countries. Some who, seeing me engaged in distributing Sabbath Tracts, mere ready to pronounce a "Lord bless you," when they learned that my tracts called attention to the long-neglected truth, that "the seventh day is the Sabbath," rejected the tracts as not from the "Repository." But it is encouraging to know, that the tracts are generally received and read with interest; and many candid concessions are made in relation to the thruth they contain. On one boat there was a company of ministers, returning from a Convention at Cleveland. Those best acquainted with the arguments, bade me a God speed, saying that I was "doing a good work," and encouraging me to "scatter the truth." Others thought it was "a great enterprise, to turn the world upon this subject." Some suggested, that I "should be in better business than sowing discord and unsettling the minds of community." There are those also who with candor turn to the Bible, then bound from the creation to the resurrection, and finally swing off into an unfathomable uncertainty or non-essentialism.

"Let us look at the practical consequences," said one man. "There is a very general unanimity in the observance of Sunday; and wherever it is observed, we are blessed with religious influences, and good order prevails; but when this question is agitated, communities are divided, and we shall have no Sabbath." Well, let us look at practical consequences. We all regard the right observance of the Sabbath as vital to the interests of religion. Whatever theory we adopt, the tendency of which is to make the Sabbath a non-essential matter, or to throw a shade of uncertainty over the requirement of God, is destructive. But listen to the conversation of twenty-five ministers upon this subject, and you will find as many methods of treating it. Some will tell you that there is no sacred time; others that "a seventh part of time is all that is required;" others, that it is impossible to keep the same time; others, that it is Jewish; others, that we keep the spirit of the commandment; and others, that the Sabbath was changed at the resurrection of Christ. Pile up arguments of this kind, and they will crumble by their own weight—they confute themselves. You say that you mourn over the desecration of the Sabbath around you; but is it not a practical consequence—an inevitable result—of your own theory? Can you urge men to obey God in this matter, when you say there is in it nothing difinite or esential? Do you hope to convince and reform men, except by bringing God's law to bear upon the heart? The practical consequence of your reasoning is, to arrange words for infidels, to strengthen Romanism, to throw the commandment into a position that it cannot reach the hearts of men, and then appeal to civil codes to urge that which truth and conscience alone should enforce. Ye ministers of the sanctuary, who teach this non-essentialism, we roll the responsibility upon you. This uncertainty that hangs over the minds of community—this disregard for the requirements of God—this Sabbath desecration which you so much deplore, is the practical consequence of your own teaching.

COLPORTEUR.

FOURTH OF JULY CELEBRATION AT GREENMANVILLE, CT.—The good people of Greenmanville, Ct., celebrated the National Anniversary on Sunday, the 4th of July. We do not learn that any accident happened to them because they presumed in that way to disturb "the sacred stillness" of Sunday. On the contrary, the occasion seems to have been a very safe, interesting, and pleasant one. W. E. Maxson served as Moderator, I. W. Utter as Secretary, and L. Crandall, A. B. Burdick, S. S. Griswold, C. Greenman, T. S. Greenman, and others, as speakers. The following resolutions were adopted:—

1. Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting, the Constitution of the United States should be interpreted in strict conformity to the principles set forth in the Declaration of Independence.
2. Resolved, That in our opinion, to aid in the execution of the "Fugitive Slave Law," is a violation of the Declaration of Independence, the rights of humanity, and the principles of the Gospel.
3. Resolved, That in our opinion, the two great political parties of the nation have identified themselves with Slavery, by requiring of their candidates for the Presidency a pledge to support the Compromise, or Fugitive Slave Law, as a condition on which they are to receive their support.
4. Resolved, That we cannot, consistently with our views of duty as Christians, give our support to either of the present candidates of these parties for the Presidency.

TEMPERANCE IN NEW YORK.—The New York State Temperance Convention, recently held at Syracuse, resolved that civil government is an ordinance of God—that the lawmaker is bound to base his statutes on the principles of God's law—that the duty of government is to protect the citizen in his rights—that the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage is destructive to all the interests that government is constituted to conserve—that laws which sanction this traffic are obviously immoral, and should at once be abandoned—and that the traffic should by law be absolutely and unconditionally prohibited. In accordance with the spirit of these resolves, the Convention recommended for circulation and signature among the electors of New York the following pledge:—

We, the undesigned, hereby pledge ourselves, that we will vote for no candidate for the Legislature who is not known to be a temperance man in principle—to be in favor of the Maine Liquor Law, and of its adoption by our Legislature, and who will not use both his vote and earnest exertions to secure its passage at the next session.

THE EVILS OF TOBACCO.—Leonard Woods, Justin Edwards, C. E. Stowe, Henry Wilson, Amasa Walker, Moses Grant, Lyman Beecher, R. B. Hubbard, and others, have published a Card recommending the Rev. Geo. Trask as a lecturer on the evils of tobacco. They introduce the recommendation as follows:—

"In the deliberate opinion of the subscribers, the use of tobacco is a great physical and moral evil. And the evil is greater and more dangerous, because its influence is gradual, and for a time not likely to be noticed. But its deplorable effects on individuals and on the community have become exceedingly obvious and alarming; and all who are real friends to the welfare of man, must wish success to every suitable effort to put a stop to so wide-spread and growing an evil, and to warn the rising generation against its insidious approach. In regard to this tremendous affair, it is high time that the community should awake out of sleep."

EMANCIPATION IN EARNEST.—A company of twelve colored persons lately passed through Rochester, who were seeking a home in the free states or in Canada. The American says:

"Ten of them were slaves of Benjamin Dicken, Esq., of Edgecombe county, N. C., deceased, and liberated by his will, which instrument sets apart property to the amount of $10,000 to $15,000 for their benefit. One of the twelve was a husband purchased by his wife, and one a wife purchased by her husband. These two had been slaves of persons other than Mr. D. They all speak in terms of grateful affection concerning their late master."

ORDINATION.—Bro. Hiram W. Bacock was ordained to the work of the Ministry at Hebron, Potter Co., Pa., on the 17th inst. An ordination discourse was preached by Eld. James Bailey, on the character and responsibilities of the Christian Ministry. After an intermission, another discourse was preached by Eld. N. V. Hull, on the duties of the church to the Ministry. The consecrating prayer was offered by Eld. N. V. Hull, charge by Eld. T. E. Babcock, hand of fellowship by Eld. H. P. Burdick. At the same time, brethren W. H. Hydorn and Geo. W. Stillman were ordained deacons of the church in Hebron.

PIERCE CONNELLY.—This gentleman, once an Episcopal clergyman in this country, became a Papist, and entered the priesthood. His wife became a nun. The details of their separation, of their vows, &c., were published at the time in Catholic papers, with great satisfaction. The neophytes were great favorites at Rome, where they figured for a while, after which they appeared in England. Mr. Connelly became, we believe, chaplain to the (Catholic) Earl of Shrewsbury, and Mrs. Connelly was connected with some religious house in the neighborhood. At length, Mr. Connelly got his eyes open, and demanded the restoration of his wife, for which he instituted a suit at law. We hear of him lately through a letter in the London Christian Times, in which he says:—

From the moment that I accepted infallibility and a visible supreme headship over Christendom, I frankly and deliberately gave up my reason, or, at least, in all matters of faith and discipline, solemnly proposed to renounce it. From that moment I never examined one single doctrine of the church of Rome with any other view than to be able to defend it against heretics and other "infidels." And I not only gave up myself, body and spirit, but, God forgive me! I gave up all that was entrusted to me, all that was dear to me, to my new obedience. When I compare the Church of Rome, as I now see it, with what I painted her to myself, with the imaginary realization of our blessed Saviour's scheme for fallen man's sanctification, no words can convey my horror at the contrast. I should often doubt the conclusion of my reason, mistrust my moral sense, and reject my certain knowledge as a dream, if God's written Word, and man's universal science, if the experience of both hemispheres and of ten centuries, did not confirm me.

THE METHODIST GENERAL CONFERENCE.—Rev. Alfred M. Lorraine, of Ohio, in giving through the Western Christian Advocate some account of his journeying to and incidents in and about Boston, makes the following allusion to the body of which he was a member:—

"This roused up more self-confidence in me than was ever realized before. I used to think that I was less than the least of all saints. But when I saw stiff-bearded veterans clamoring for the rostrum, when I saw distinguished writers on sanctification impatient of contradiction, when I saw beclouded doctors rising in their own fog, inflicting prosaic speeches on men of clearer conception, ready for the question—I almost said, 'Lord, I have seen an end of all perfection, but thy commandments are exceeding broad.' And I did say, 'Thank God, I am not like other men!' Yea, to come to a full confession, I felt that I was too religious for the crisis. Sometimes I felt like putting forth a 'blizzard;' but I measured the conflict, counted the cost, and saw clearly, that in my efforts to get the floor I would have all the breath knocked out of my sails. There were some, however, who sat calmly on tumult's wheels."

EPISCOPAL MISSIONS.—Receipts for Domestic Missions since June, 1851, $23,566, and for Foreign $41,048—in all, $64,614. Within the year just closed, the committee have very nearly doubled the number of their missionaries; and they have reason to hope that, through the blessing of God, their progress will continue to be still more prospered as time rolls on. The missions to China and the west coast of Africa, will both receive further enlargement this fall. The Foreign Committee have also made arrangements for occupying new openings for missionary work. Bishop Boone, of China, under the urgent advice of physicians, proposes to come home this fall on a visit, taking the overland route.

MENNONITES IN EUROPE.—German papers state that, in consequence of a law lately promulgated in Prussia, the Mennonites, a religious sect who resemble the Quakers, have been held to the performance of military duty, contrary to their creed, and that they are therefore emigrating in great numbers, partly to the United States, and some to Russia. They are mostly persons of comparative wealth, and one hundred families of them have lately crossed the Prussian frontier to settle in the last-named country.

CHURCHES OF THE CANDIDATES.—The Presbyterian publishes a letter, said to be from the pen of Dr. Junkin, from which we ascertain these facts:—

"General Scott is a Protestant Episcopalian, and worships at St. John's Church, Washington. Mr. Graham is by birth and education a Presbyterian, though not a communicant of any church; and as his lady is a member of the Baptist Church, he worships, part of the time at least, with that denomination. General Pierce is by education a Congregationalist, though not a member of the Church. Mr. King is a Protestant Episcopalian in his preferences."

RHODE ISLAND AND THE LIQUOR LAW.—The Maine Liquor Law went into operation in Rhode Island on the 19th inst. The temperance people of Pawcatuck celebrated the occasion by an excursion to Watch Hill, where they had a splendid dinner, followed by toasts and speeches. From Providence, on the 23d inst., the following significant dispatch was received: "The first liquor was seized under the new law, this morning, and was destroyed."

CHOLERA IN NEW YORK.—Several deaths have recently occurred in New York from a disease very much resembling Cholera. The steamer United States, from Chagres, which arrived at New York last week, had sixteen deaths on board from Cholera, and several persons who were sick on her arrival had to be taken to the Quarantine Hospital.

AMERICAN MENNONITES.—A Mr. Oberholzer, a preacher of the Mennonite denomination, commonly called Mennists, is about to commence a religious paper for his denomination, at Quakertown, Pa. It will be printed in the German language, and will be called "Der Religioese Bothschafter."

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JULY 19.

In the SENATE, Mr. Hamlin presented petitions in favor of the passage of the Land Distribution bill. Mr. Sumner presented a petition, signed by Messrs. Cooper, Bryant, Irving, and other American authors, in favor of an International Copyright law. Resolutions were adopted asking for copies (to be presented next session) of all diplomatic correspondence relating to commercial regulations in foreign countries; also, for copies of all matters in relation to the right of way over the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. The Deficiency bill was then taken up, and the Senate, after a speech from Mr. Hunter, adhered to its appropriation of $50,000 for constructive mileage. A Committee of Conference was appointed, and, after a short executive session, the Senate adjourned.

The HOUSE spent the morning hour in considering a bill granting to all chartered Railroad and Plank Road Companies the right of way through the public lands, such Companies to have 100 feet on each side of the road, and the use of wood, earth and stone in the vicinity. The Indian Appropriation Bill was finished up and passed; the Deficiency Bill came back from the Senate, and the House receded from its former vote on the mileage item, and passed the bill. This bill appropriates, alltogether, between five and six millions.

THIRD-DAY, JULY 20.

The SENATE received Mr. James's bill to amend the Tariff. It provides for a more equitable estimate of value on goods taxed ad valorem, so that the system of running goods through upon low and fictitious values may be in a measure broken up. The bill to purchase Catlin's Indian Gallery was discussed, but finally laid on the table. Several bills of minor importance were pushed forward a little, and the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, the Plank Road Land bill was debated during the morning hour. Political speeches, of no general interest, occupied the remainder of the day.

FOURTH-DAY, JULY 21.

Mr. Wade introduced a bill into the SENATE for the establishment of a line of settlements to Oregon. A long debate upon a day of adjournment followed, and, after a deal of political maneuvering and sparring, the Senate finally resolved to adjourn on Tuesday, the 31st of August.

In the HOUSE, the River and Harbor bill was discussed all day, but no progress was made toward a vote upon it.

FIFTH-DAY, JULY 22.

The SENATE had up and ordered engrossed a bill granting additional school lands in the several States which contain public lands. The bill grants an additional section in each Township to the States for school purposes. The remainder of the day was spent in considering a bill granting to Michigan land for the construction of a Ship Canal around the Falls of the Saut Ste. Marie. Mr. Felch offered a substitute for the bill, omitting the grant of Public Land, and providing in place thereof that the Secretary of War contract with the lowest bidder for the construction of a Ship Canal 100 feet wide and 12 feet deep, with single locks 325 feet long and 75 wide; the cost of said Canal not to exceed $400,000.

The HOUSE passed the bill granting the right of way to all Rail, Plank and Macadamized Roads through the lands of the United States. Information was asked in relation to the difficulty about fishing grounds. Several other topics were discussed, but no action was taken upon them.

SIXTH-DAY, JULY 23.

The SENATE, after a long debate, passed a resolution calling upon the President for correspondence in relation to the Fishery Treaty. Afterward it passed the Military Academy Bill, to which was attached an item of $50,000 for mileage of members; and adjourned to Second-day.

In the HOUSE, the bill granting to Michigan alternate sections of Public Lands for a Railroad from Pontiac, Oakland Co., to Lake Michigan, in Ottawa Co., was voted down. The River and Harbor bill then came up, was slightly debated, and finally laid over at the hour of adjournment.

SABBATH-DAY, JULY 24.

The SENATE was not in session.

In the HOUSE, a short debate ensued upon a bill to arm frontier settlers against Indians, &c., the River and Harbor bill was looked at, and the session closed.

European News.

Three steamers from Europe—the Humboldt, the America, and the Baltic—have arrived since our last, bringing Liverpool dates to July 14. The following summary embraces all the news of importance.

The weather in England was fine, and the crops in all parts of Europe were remarkably prosperous.

The Parliamentary elections were occupying a large share of public attention in Great Britain. Most of the English Borough Members had been returned, but the Counties had still to elect. The result so far was not encouraging to the Government.

The Royal Agricultural Society of England offers a prize of £1,000, and the gold medal of the Society, for the discovery of a manure with equally fertilizing properties to the premium guano, of which an unlimited supply can be furnished in England at $5 per tun.

The Government Returns, just published, show that the emigration from Liverpool to the United States during the past month was 20,847, a falling off, as compared with the month of June, of upward of 6,000, the emigrants the past month being chiefly Irish of the poorest class. Emigration to Australia continues to flow without abatement.

One of the Liverpool police, an Irishman named Slaney, has been committed to jail on a charge of willful murder, for striking a woman down with his truncheon "in the discharge of duty," as the phrase goes.

Louis Bonaparte is now regularly settled for the summer at St. Cloud. Debauchery and excesses of all kinds have marvelously changed the man; he is said to be quite out of health; and his doctors tell him decidedly, that if he will not change his manner of living, they will not answer for his life. He is also said to be worn down with anxiety and work, dejected, and demoralized.

The Arab Chief, Abd El Kader, and Hamet Ben Cuta, State prisoners in the fort of St. Louis and Cette, had a quarrel, when the former stabbed the latter in the abdomen, of which he shortly afterward died.

Several lamentable cases of Hydrophobia are recorded in the Parisian papers throughout France.

From Spain the only news that arrives directly, this week, is respecting the movements of the Queen and Court. We notice that her Majesty presided at a bullfight, and was accompanied by her husband and infant daughter, the Princess of Austurias.

A letter from Breslau states that the Cholera had appeared at Kalisch, on the borders of Poland, but no authentic details are given.

A decree has been promulgated in Florence, subjecting to military discipline young men who, owing to idle and irregular habits, were a burden to their familes and dangerous to the public repose.

Many political arrests have taken place within a few days at Milan and Venice. It is said the arrests were from the trivial circumstance of one of Mazzini's bank notes having been found by the police while searching a house in Milan for smuggled goods.

A great Industrial Exhibition is to take place in Russia, to which foreigners are invited to send contributions.

California News.

Ten days later news from California has come to hand since our last.

Two million dollars in gold dust was brought from San Francisco by the steamer of June 28th. The shipment of gold dust for June is set down at $5,343,754.

The City of Aspinwall was quite healthy. The Cholera, which had been prevailing both there and on the Isthmus to some extent, had almost entirely disappeared.

The mining intelligence continues to be encouraging.

The most important item by this arrival is the destruction of the City of Sonora by fire, which was laid in ashes on the morning of June 18. The loss is estimated at nearly $2,000,000.

The influx of Chinese continues as great as ever, and will probably not slack off until the advices sent home by their countrymen resident there are received. Within ten days, five vessels arrived from China, bringing 1,636 passengers.

The ship Robert Bourne, Bryson, master, sailed for San Francisco from Amoy on the 21st March, having on board 450 Coolies. In lat. 22 N., lon. 128 E., a difficulty occurred between the Captain and officers and the Coolies, when the former were all murdered. Some of the crew escaped by taking to the boats. The vessel subsequently went ashore on one of the Manganese Islands in the China Sea, where the Coolies were received by the natives in a most friendly manner. The seamen who had been fortunate enough to escape then succeeded in getting the vessel off and putting to sea, and ultimately reached Amoy, when the E. I. Co.'s steamer Scimarias and revenue brig Silly were immediately dispatched to arrest the mutineers. At the latest dates, a number of the mutineers were committed for trial. A portion of the cargo taken by them was brought back by the above vessels to Amoy.

The Fishery Difficulties.

The daily papers for a week past have been freighted with statements, rumors and surmises, relative to difficulties with England about the New Foundland Fisheries. It appears that measures have been taken to exclude American fishing vessels from pursuing their business in the bays along the Coast of Nova Scotia, New Foundland or Prince Edward's Island. Even from the Bay of Fundy they are to be shut out, and the passage of the Gulf of Canso is henceforth to be denied them. Armed vessels belonging to the Colonies have already taken their stations for this purpose, and several fishing vessels have been seized.

This course of proceedings is based on the Convention of 1818, in which the United States expressly renounced the right "to take, dry or cure fish on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbors of his Britanic Majesty's dominions in America," except where there was no settlement on the coast.

The measure recently adopted is perhaps legally justifiable. It is one which the Colonies have before desired to execute, but until now the home Government has not given its assent. They have claimed that our fishermen were encroaching, and that the Convention ought to be enforced against them, and now at last they are authorized to enforce it.

A memorial addressed to President Fillmore in relation to the matter, has been numerously and influentially signed in Boston. It represents that 2,100 vessels and 30,000 seamen are now engaged in the fisheries, representing property valued at $12,000,000; that the people of New England and their fathers have enjoyed free right to fish in the now proscribed waters; and that the enforcement of the new construction put upon the treaty of 1818 will ruin many families in New-England. Therefore, the memorialists pray the President to send a naval force to the British North American waters, sufficient to protect the fishermen in their lawful occupation.

REVOLUTION IN THE SOCIETY ISLANDS.—Riatea, Society Islands, was recently the scene of a conflict between the Republicans and the Royalists. The half-breed native who was elected by the former as President pro tem., was overpowered and forced to flee with his troops before the sudden assaults of the Royalists. The Republicans, however, rallied, received strong reinforcements and marched against Queen Pomare's troops, repulsing them, with considerable loss of life on both sides, and reinstating their President. Queen Pomare, hearing of the defeat of her troops, hastened in person to Riatea, to turn the tide of war. She was assailed with great fury, and barely escaped with her life, by taking refuge on board a French frigate. This vessel arrived at Lahaina, Maui, one of the group of Sandwich Islands, on the 15th May, having on board the Queen of the Society Islands, who has thus been forced to abdicate her throne.

HARVARD COLLEGE.—The Association of the Alumni of Harvard College held a festival at Cambridge on Thursday, July 22, in the Unitarian Church, when an address was delivered by Hon. R. C. Winthrop. The subject was the "Responsibilities of Educated Men." Mr. Winthrop spoke nearly two hours, and at the conclusion of the services the procession proceed to the college grounds on Harvard-st., where a dinner was prepared beneath a tent. Speeches were made by Hon. Edward Everett, ex-President Josiah Quincy, Chief Justice Shaw, Hon. R. C. Winthrop, Rev. Dr. Thornwell, President of Columbia College, South Carolina; Rev. Dr. Fuller, of Baltimore; Mr. Preston, (brother of Hon. W. C. Preston,) of South Carolina, and Hon. Jas. Savage, of Boston. Previous to the public exercises, a plan was adopted to found a class of scholarships for indigent and meritorious students, which will be well calculated to give the advantages of the large library and extensive collections of the University to many to whom they now are inaccessible.

THE LAND OF THE MORMONS.—S. T. Cary writes to the N. Y. Tribune from Kanesville, Iowa, that the Mormons are all leaving that region, and that their lands are for sale. He says:—

"The exodus of such a vast number from this country affords a rare opportunity of securing a good farm for a trifle. Many have sold their farms for one-fourth the cost of improvements; others have not been able to sell at all, and have left their farms in the hands of an agent to dispose of for what he can get. Others have abandoned them, and any one can come and occupy who may be disposed. The country is well watered and soil unsurpassed in fertility. The vast numbers annually passing through this place for California, Oregon and Utah, make a home market for all the produce the farmer has to dispose of, and at better rates than he could get farther east."

EDUCATIONAL CONVENTIONS.—The New York State Teachers' Association holds its annual meeting at Elmira this year. There will be a session of two days, commencing on Wednesday, the 4th of August.

The American Institute of Instruction will hold its twenty-third annual meeting at Troy, N. Y., on the 6th, 7th and 9th of August. Lectures will be delivered by Messrs. Henry Barnard, Geo. B. Emerson, R. S. Howard, G. D. Abbott, W. H. Wells, Jos. McKeon, John Pierpont, and others; and Dr. Stone will occupy an hour with his class in Phonetics. Ladies from abroad may expect the usual accommodations.

The American Association for the advancement of Education will meet at Newark, N. J., on Tuesday, the 10th of August, and will hold a session of three or four days. Addresses, lectures and discussions, of great interest, from distinguished men in the educational field, may be expected at the several gatherings.

On Monday morning, 19th inst., Mr. Joseph Winston, of the firm of Nace & Winston, commission merchants, of Richmond, Va., together with his wife and an only child about 8 months old, were found, the two latter dead in bed, and Mr. Winston probably beyond hope of recovery, though still alive. His head had a terrific wound upon it, immediately between the eyes, opening the forehead, and there were three other wounds on the back of his head. Mrs. W. also received three or four wounds—one about three quarters of an inch wide, and two inches long, on the forehead, immediately above the nose, apparently made with some blunt instrument; also two deep cuts on the side of her head. The child seemed to have been smothered, or choked to death, or dashed against the wall—the throat and breast exhibiting severe bruises. Six negroes, three men and three women, belonging to Mr. W., have been arrested. It is reported that two of them (man and wife) desired to be sold, but Mr. W. refused to sell them—hence their dissatisfaction, and hence, it is thought, their too fatal revenge.

SUMMARY.

On Sunday night, July 18th, a man named Johnson was discovered in a boat in the rapids, near the brink of the Falls of Niagara. The boat stuck fast on a rock, and was still there at day-break the next morning, when arrangements were at once commenced to rescue the man from his perilous situation. Joel Robinson, at the peril of his life, went to his relief in a small skiff, taking a rope from the island, and succeeded in rescuing him from the boat. About five minutes after Johnson was taken from the boat, it loosened from the rock and went over the Falls. A purse of $200 was made up by the visitors for Robinson.

A dispatch dated Rome, N. Y., Friday, July 23, says: A destructive fire has been sweeping through the woods six or eight miles west of this place, for the last few days. Hundreds of acres of land, commonly known as Pine Plains, have been burned over. The fire, at last accounts, was still on the increase, and nothing but a heavy rain could possibly quench the flames. In addition to the pine timber, several hundred cords of wood and bark prepared for market purposes have been burned.

A man named John G. Russell was last week brought to this City, in custody of Officer Patterson, who arrested him at his place of residence, Pine Creek, Potter County, Penn., on a requisition from Gov. Hunt upon Gov. Bigler, of Pennsylvania. The prisoner stands indicted for having, in May last, obtained by false pretenses, about $600 worth of goods from Messrs. Van Dusen, & Jagger, dealers in dry goods, boots and shoes, &c., at No. 39 Liberty-st. The accused was taken before Justice Bogart, and committed to prison for trial, in default of $1,000 bail.

The Halifax papers of the 20th report that heavy and destructive gales had prevailed in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The bark Trusty, from Scarborough, England, went ashore off Gaspe, and 18 lives were lost. It is reported that the armed schooner Alliance, with all on board, had perished near St. Paul's Island. Fifteen schooners were lost near Magdalene Islands, and 22 pilots were drowned.

Learned, the Otsego bank robber, was recently tried and convicted before Judge Mason, of the Supreme Court, at Cooperstown. A bill of exceptions was made out, which was argued at the recent General Term at Delhi. The motion for a new trial was denied, and Learned was sentenced to the State Prison for five years. An appeal was taken, which is to be argued before the Court of Appeals.

On Sunday, the 18th instant, a disgraceful riot took place at Louisville, Ky. A false alarm of fire collected a crowd, from which the cry was heard, "Give it to the Irish; they have carried the day long enough." Upon that signal they went to work, knocking down every man they met in the street that looked like an Irishman. A good many were badly beaten, and the windows and doors of several houses demolished. A coffee house on Fifth, and several others on Water-st., were completely gutted, and their contents demolished.

The Montreal Herald says hundreds of persons, who never saw Montreal, or have seen it only at a distance, or have resided in a part far from the scene of our recent disaster, will probably perambulate Canada, and some parts of the United States, representing themselves to be distressed fire sufferers from our city. Now, each one of these is an arrant impostor, and should be treated as such, for here is abundant relief for all who ask, provided they are actual sufferers.

E. N. Paine, Esq., of Rochester, being called by mistake on Tuesday morning, at 5 o'clock, at the Delavan House, Albany, went to sleep again, leaving his door unlocked. On waking at 7 o'clock, he found that his wallet, containing $130 in bank bills, a receipt from J. Pierce for $7,600 of stock, a draft and receipt from the same person for $2,500, a note for $60 against J. W. Western, scrip representing $21,000 of stock, and sundry other receipts, notes, &c., had been stolen from his pantaloons pocket.

The Batavia Advocate, in noticing the Canandaigua and Falls Railroad, says: "This road is graded almost to Batavia, and gangs of hands are at work within a few rods of the village. The bridges, &c., are also progressing toward completion, with all possible dispatch. The right of way has all been obtained, and the few places which had been left to finish grading, will be put through at once. The expectation is, to have the cars running from Canandaigua to Batavia by the first of January.

A sad accident occurred near Cincinnati, O., last Saturday (Sabbath.) Three boilers in the sawmill of the Miami Railroad and Dry Dock Company, at Fulton, exploded. They were torn to fragments, and the whole building was shattered. Several pieces of the boilers were thrown a distance of 300 yards. The foreman, a German, was instantly killed, his body being torn to pieces; but out of about 40 other hands employed, a few only sustained injury. The loss is about $4,000.

Another sad accident occurred at Pittsburg, Pa., last Sabbath. J. Woodhouse, of the firm of A. & J. Woodhouse, tinners, of Alleghany, while measuring the roof of a new building at the foot of Seminary Hill, stepped on a slightly nailed board, and was precipitated to the ground, and died of his injuries in a few minutes.

Christian Hays, who was, perhaps, the most extensive cattle dealer in the West, died suddenly, of cholera, at St. Louis, on Sunday, 27th ult. His business operations were immensely large, and his purchases in the vicinity of St. Louis frequently amounted to $500,000 per annum. Mr. Hays was a native of the Grand Duchy of Baden, in Germany, and at the time of his demise was in the 48th year of his age.

Lieutenant John Rodgers, in command of the Coast Survey hydrographic party off the Florida reefs, states that in running soundings off the vicinity of Soldier Key, south of Cape Florida, to the depth of one hundred and sixteen fathoms, specimens of the bottom brought up retained a temperature of 58 deg., the surface water being 76 deg., and the air 81 deg.

Mr. C. G. Halpine, Boston, has now in his possession a manuscript Bible of the 12th century, very richly illustrated with gold and colors, and once in the possession of Pope Leo the Xth, whose handwriting occurs in marginal notes in various places throughout the volume. The work is clasped with silver, and is altogether a gem. So says the Boston Bee.

The Dayton Item says that a citizen of that County, now in his one hundred and ninth year, and who has, for the past two years, been deprived of the power of speech, was lately, by some accident, thrown upon his head, receiving a severe injury, but, strange to say, he has been able to converse as fluently since as at any period of his life.

A young fellow about 20 years old, imprisoned at Xenia, Ohio, for passing counterfeit money, broke jail, (for the eighth time in his life,) a few days since, leaving the following note: "C. Shepherd begs leave to inform the citizens of Xenia that he leaves—on this Wednesday evening—for his health—expects to spend the season at some noted summmer watering place. ADIEU."

The steamer Alice, running between Bridgeport, Ct., and New York, took fire at her dock and was burned to the water's edge. She was owned by Capt. White of Norwich, and was worth about $15,000. She was partly freighted for her trip to New York, and many valuable goods were lost. She burned so rapidly that nothing could be saved.

A jury, on Monday, 16th inst., at Kenosha, Wisconsin, gave a mulatto woman a verdict of one hundred dollars, against Capt. Lundy, of the steamboat Baltic, for turning her out of the common cabin on account of her color. A righteous verdict.

John Teller, of Schenectady, is without any question a rara avis. Although he is 52 years of age, and has always enjoyed good health, he has never been a mile out of Schenectady in his life! He has never seen a ship, schooner, or steamboat.

On the 30th ult. three boys were playing together on the beach at Canaisie, L. I., when one of them, named Wm. H. Goslin, was struck over the temple with a clam-shell, thrown by another, named James Lumn. The sharp edge of the missile penetrated his skull, and he died in a short time afterward.

A statement is published, signed by 22 of the principal physicians of Cincinnati, in which they say cholera does not exist except in isolated instances in that city, and that the general health of the population is fully as good as in any July during the past ten years.

A dispatch dated Baltimore, Friday, July 23, says: The Union Manufacturing Company of Maryland's extensive works for manufacturing cotton duck, at Canton, lower end of the city, was totally destroyed by fire this afternoon. Loss about $100,000.

Arrangements have been completed for a line of steam propellers between Portland and Liverpool, mainly for the accommodation of the people of Canada.

An old lady, named Mrs. McElroy, is now living in Philadelphia, who was 108 years old on the 26th inst. Twenty-one years ago she received what is termed second sight, and can now see as clearly and distinctly as ever. She does all her housework; waits upon her youngest daughter, fifty-one years of age, who has been blind for three years past; and attends a store or shop they keep in the front room. She was married in 1790, when 46 years of age, and is the mother of seven children, three of whom are dead.

During the recent passage of the ship John Henry, Capt. Oxnard, from Liverpool to this port, with 194 passengers, a passenger, Mrs. McLaughlin, gave birth to two fine boys. One was named "John Henry," in honor of the vessel, and the other "Oxnard McLaughlin, as a mark of respect to the attentive an obliging Captain. "John Henry" and "Oxnard" were decidedly the lions among the passengers during the rest of the voyage.

At the commencement of the Ohio Female College, at College Hill, near Cincinnati, on Thursday last, the degree of Mistress of Arts was conferred on the Senior Class, consisting of seven young ladies. The whole number of students during the last term was 102.

A tree on Cunningham's plantation, near Lexington, Miss., was struck by lightning on the 12th inst., and of seven negroes who were sitting beneath it, eating their dinners, four were killed—a loss to the owner of some $2,500, or $3,000.

At Albany, last Sixth-day, a fire originated in a drug store from bringing a lamp in contact with alcohol. William Bamber, Esq., a clerk in the Attorney General's office, was so badly burnt that he died in a short time.

Some of the most eminent physicians of Cincinnati deny that cholera exists in that city in an epidemic form. We very much doubt if the real Asiatic cholera exists in any part of the United States at present.

In Thomson's Bank Note Reporter the following Washington (D. C.) Banks are quoted no sale: Ocean Bank, Bank of the Republic, Bank of the Union, Metropolitan Bank, and Eastern Bank.

Mr. Jonathan Fuller, who died in North Chelsea, Mass., on the 21st inst., at the advanced age of 83, died in the same house in which he was born, and had never slept from under its roof a single night in his life.

Walter King, Esq., of Utica, died suddenly at Mt. Morris on Sunday last. He was taken with a fit after violently running to overtake the packet, and died in an hour.

Garret O'Neil was arraigned at Boston, on Wednesday, for perjury. He took the poor debtor's oath to escape the payment of $29, and the next day drew $500 from the Savings Bank.

The new steamer "City of Hartford" made the run from this city to Saybrook Bar in 5 hours and 21 minutes; distance 120 miles. This is said to be the greatest steamboat time on record.

The steamer Francis Skiddy has made the trip from this city to Albany in 7 hours 25 minutes, including 30 minutes stoppages—the greatest speed ever made on the river.

John J. Chanche, Catholic Bishop of Natchez, died at Frederick, Thursday, July 22, having remained there since the National Council.

The liquor dealers of Lowell, Mass., gave a "free blow," on the evening of the 21st, to all who would drink, in anticipation of the operations of the new law.

The Ninth Annual Meeting of the American Sabbath Tract Society will be held at Plainfield N. J., on Second-day, Sept. 13.

Of the exercises and speakers at the meetings of the Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies, a more complete account will be given in due time.

Anniversary of the American Bible Union.

THE Annual Meeting of the American Bible Union will be held in the meeting-house of the First Baptist Church, on the corner of Broome and Elizabeth-sts., in the City of New York, on Thursday, the 7th of October next. The exercises are expected to continue through several days.

Among the speakers appointed for the occasion, are Pres. Lynd of Covington Seminary, Pres. Shannon of Missouri University, Prof. Adkins of Shurtliff College, Ill., Prof. Duncan of Louisiana University, Elder Wm. B. Maxson, New York, Rev. John L. Waller, Editor of the Western Recorder, Kentucky, Rev. James Pyper, Editor of the Christian Observer, Canada, Elder B. L. Coleman, Editor of the Christian Intelligencer, Virginia, and Rev. Messrs. J. G. Stearns, C. P. Sheldon, Wm. S. Clapp, Thomas Armitage, A. Wheelock, W. W. Everts, J. I. Fulton, and others.

Discourses upon the Bible are expected to be delivered by Rev. Dr. Lynd, A. Wheelock, and J. Pyper.

The morning hour of Thursday, from eight to nine o'clock, will be occupied as a prayer-meeting, in which brethren from all parts of the country will unite in seeking the blessing of God upon the plans and operations of the American Bible Union, especially in reference to the revision of the English Scriptures.

The business meeting will commence at 9 A. M. in the lecture-room, and the Anniversary Exercises in the body of the house at 10 A. M.

Union Academy.

THE Academic Year of this Institution, located at Shiloh, N. J., for 1852 and '53, is divided into three Terms of fourteen weeks each, with two vacations of one week each between terms.

The First commences the last Monday in August.
The Second commences the second Monday in Dec.
The Third commences the fourth Monday in March.
The year closes the first Monday in July.

Board of Instruction.

WILLIAM C. WHITFORD, Principal,
And Professor of the Classics, Natural Sciences, and Higher Mathematics.

GURDON EVANS, A. M.,
Professor of Agricultural Chemistry.

Mrs. RUTH H. WHITFORD, Preceptress,
And Teacher of the English Department, Painting, and Penciling.

Mrs. ELIZABETH P. JONES,
Teacher of the French Language and Literature.

At the opening of the Fall Term and middle of the Winter Term, TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, and continue seven weeks, for the purpose of reviewing those branches taught in District Schools, and giving each teacher an opportunity to test his own abilities in teaching and governing, by taking charge of a Model Class.

The AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT, during the Winter Term, is under the instruction of Prof. GURDON EVANS, A. M., and embraces the study of and daily recitation in Agricultural Science. Three hours each day are spent in the Laboratory, well furnished with good apparatus and chemicals, where students are instructed in the Elementary Analysis of Soils, Marls, Ashes of Plants, &c. Also, a course of Public Lectures is delivered on the application of scientific principles to practical farming.

Expenses:

Tuition, per term,	from $3 50 to $5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

Extras, per term—Penciling, $1 00; Embroidery and Monochromatic Painting, each, $3 00; Oil Painting, $6 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, $8 00; Piano Music, $10 00.

Tuition settled in advance or by satisfactory arrangement.

Board in the Boarding Hall or Private Families, from $1 25 to $1 75 per week. The entire expense of the year, including board, room, fire, lights, and tuition, need not exceed $82 00.

The aim of the Institution is to impart a thorough, practical, and complete academic education. In the Natural Sciences, all the facilities usually enjoyed in Academies, are presented to the student. In the Classical Department, those Latin and Greek authors read in a College Course are studied. A strict and wholesome discipline is enforced. Courses of Lectures, either moral, miscellaneous, or scientific, are given each term in the year.

For further information, address the Principal, the President, Rev. Wm. M. Jones of Shiloh, or Rev. Sheppard R. Hallock, D. D., of Greenwich, N. J.

HON. LEWIS HOWELL, Pres. Board of Trus.
ISAAC WEST, Esq., Secretary. 7t4

Milton Academy.

THE Fall Term of 1852 will commence Aug. 24, and close Nov. 25.

The Second Term will commence Nov. 30, and will also continue 13 weeks and 2 days.

Tuition:

Tuition must be paid before entering classes, which will vary, according to studies, from $3 00 to $5 00 per Term.

Advantages:

The New Hall, in which the School is at present conducted, affording convenient recitation-rooms, presents increased advantages to those attending with us.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

New York and Erie Railroad.

TRAINS leave pier foot of Duane-st., New York, as follows:—

Express Train at 6½ A.M. for Dunkirk, connecting with first-class steamboats for Cleveland, Sandusky, Toledo, and Monroe, and railroads to Cincinnati and Chicago.

Mail Train at 8 A.M. for all stations.

Way Train at 3½ P.M., via Piermont, for Delaware.

Way Train at 4½ P.M., via Jersey City, for Delaware.

Night Express Train at 6 P.M. for Dunkirk, connecting with first-class steamboat for Detroit direct, connecting with Express Train for Chicago.

Emigrant Train at 6 P.M., via Piermont.

The following are the times of leaving the several stations named:—

Going West—10.29 A.M., 3.41, 9.10, 11.40 P.M.

Miscellaneous.

Consumption.—Effects of Climate.

For many years past, the favorite remedy of physicians, in all stages of consumption, has been to recommend a sea voyage, and a sojourn in a warmer climate. The medical professors in England and France have usually recommended the island of Madeira as the best place of resort for the consumptive invalid; while those of our own country have suggested to their patients either Florida or Cuba, as points of winter residence best adapted to alleviate the condition of the sufferers. Statistics, recently collected, appear to contradict the advantages which were at one time supposed to be derived from a migration to a warmer climate, and to indicate that an atmosphere cool and dry is, in every respect preferable.

It is now contended that tuberculous phthisis is a species of scrofula, and that the process of putrefaction which the diseased lung undergoes, is hastened in the moist atmosphere of a warm climate, and that the disease is, consequently, far more prevalent in the South than at the North.

All bronchal affections are increased by the damp air of the sea-shore, and the statistics of the United States' army show that the number of deaths from consumption are more than double in such situations to what they are farther inland. The statistics of the British army, also, show similar results. Not more than half as many soldiers are attacked with consumption in Canada as in the West Indies; and this is now becoming so well understood that men invalided with this disease are sent from the West Indies to Canada, as offering the best chance of their recovery.

In London, two hundred and thirty-six persons out of a thousand die of consumption annually; in Sweden, a northern climate, only sixty-six. In Russia, consumptive cases are equally rare, while in those southern climates which have been considered the most beneficial to this class of invalids, deaths by consumption from the most prominent feature in the bill of mortality. In Italy, the disease is as prevalent as in France; and in Madeira, where patients are so frequently sent for the benefit of their declining health, there is no disease more prevalent among the natives of the islands. It is now pretty generally conceded that the number of those who are benefitted by a southern sojourn, would have been equally benefited by remedial agents at home; and that the chances are much more in favor of those who travel north for health, than of those who seek recovery in the south.

The dry air of an inland, or mountain region, is also admitted to be preferable to the moist, cool air of the sea-coast, or of valleys rendered damp by flowing streams.

Origin of the Aztec Children.

The question as to where the Aztec children did come from, is definitely settled at last, as will be seen from the following testimony of Mr. Silva at the examination in Philadelphia, on the 6th July:—

Remendo Silva, sworn—I am acquainted with their parents; they live in the village of Jacota, in the State of San Salvador; in 1849, I was passing through the village of Jacota, and saw the children; I asked the mother if she would give them to me, to take them away for a specified time, to educate them; she told me I would have to see their father, who was away at the time; afterward I saw the father and mother together; they gave the children to me, without any written paper, to take them to Grenada to educate them; I determined to bring them to this country to educate them, and then exhibit them; in consequence of a quarrel I had with the British Minister at Grenada, I was arrested and put in confinement; it had nothing to do with the children; at that time Mr. Addison and another American formed a partnership with my brother-in-law, to take the children to America and exhibit them and share the proceeds; I saw the parents last in 1851; as soon as I arrived where they were, they demanded them of me before the authorities there, and said that they had been told that I had sold them; I made myself liable before the magistrates there, that I should come on here and get them, and return them; I had to give bail there to that effect, and am still held by it; I delivered the children to Salaza, my brother-in-law, in San Carlo, Nicaragua; it is about eighty leagues from San Carlo to where the parents of the children reside; I have been here fifteen days, and came to this country with no other object than to get the children, and return them; I have a certificate from the Judge of that place, passed in relation to the children before him; no paper whatever passed between the parents and myself; the last I saw of the children was when I delivered them to Salaza; I saw Salaza three months ago; he is now in Grenada; when Salaza came to the United States, he was in company with Addison; my brother Peter accompanied Salaza, and my brother-in-law and Addison, as interpreter, and was to have a certain portion of the proceeds; from San Carlo they came to Grenada, where I was.

A South African Storm.

Emerging after a few days from these freezing quarters, I found myself on the plains of the Graaf Reinet district. It was pleasant to feel warm again, but what I gained in caloric I decidedly lost in the picturesque. Never-ending plains of burnt grass, treeless, houseless—such were the attractions that greeted my eyes. How anything in the vegetable or animal kingdom could exist there, seemed a perfect mystery. Yet the mystery is soon explained. I was there when there had been a long-continued drought—one of those visitations to which these districts are especially subject. One day the clouds began to gather—the wind fell—the air became oppressively sultry—and all gave notice of an approaching storm. My horses became restive and uneasy, and for myself, I felt faint and weary to excess. My after-rider looked alarmed, for truly the heavens bore a fearful aspect. I can conceive nothing more dismal than the deep, thick, black, impenetrable masses of clouds that surrounded us. Suddenly we saw a stream of light, so vivid, so intensely bright, and of such immense height, apparently, that for a moment we were half blinded, while our horses snorted and turned sharp round away from the glare. Almost at the same instant burst forth a peal of thunder, like the artillery of all the universe discharged at once in our ears. There was no time to be lost; we struck spurs to our horses' flanks, and galloped to a mountain side, a little way behind us, where the quick eye of my Hottentot had observed a cave. In a few minutes—moments rather—we were within it, but not before the storm had bust forth in all its fury. One moment the country round was as black as ink; the next it was a sheet of living flame, whiter than the white heat of the furnace. One long-continued, never-ceasing roar of thunder (not separate claps, as we hear them in England) deafened our ears, and each moment we feared destruction; for, more than once, huge masses of rock, detached by the lightning blast from the mountain above us, rolled down past our cavern with the roar of an avalanche. The Hottentot lay on his face, shutting out the sight, though he could not escape the sound. At length the rain-spouts burst forth; and to describe how the water deluged the earth would be impossible; suffice it, that though we had entered the cave from the road without passing any stream, or apparently any bed of one, when we again ventured forth from our place of shelter, three hours later, a broad and impassable torrent flowed between ourselves and the road; and we had to crawl along the mountain sides on foot, with great difficulty and in a momentary danger of losing our footing on its slippery surface, and being dashed into the roaring torrent, for about two miles ere we could find a fordable spot. [Cape and the Caffres.

Sorrel.

The presence of sorrel indicates an acid soil. It is a sour plant, and thrives only on such lands as are destitute of calcareous matter; consequently, the application of the latter in sufficient quantities to correct the acidity, suggests itself as the most effectual method of getting rid of it, and rendering the soil fit for profitable cultivation in other and more desirable crops. Yet the quantity of soil on which this plant is naturally produced, precludes the hope that it will ever be entirely eradicated, and it hence becomes a part of farming to know in what manner it can be most successfully economized, and rendered valuable as an article of animal sustenance or food.

There are, indeed, but few vegetables, however mean and valueless they may be considered, which do not possess some quality capable of redeeming them from the hasty yet common charge of utter worthlessness; and of this order we regard sorrel. As a food for horses and sheep, it not only possesses considerable value, but if chaffed and mixed with meal, it will fatten them as rapidly, perhaps, as English hay prepared in the same manner. Fed to these animals in its natural state, and without any accompaniment, it is found to retain them in health and heart, and the seed, ground and made into "mush," is said by those who have had no inconsiderable experience in feeding it, to be equal to Indian corn. Yet no farmer will ever cultivate sorrel as a farm product. It is exhausting in the extreme, and it is only when it obtrudes itself upon him, spontaneously, that he should endeavor to render it of any account.

The only effectual method of extirpating it, is to sweeten the soil by liming, or to increase the staple to a degree which will promote the development of more valuable herbage, and cleanse the soil thoroughly by a succession of manured crops, such as corn, potatoes, or some other vegetable which is cultivated exclusively with the hoe. The seed of the sorrel is not only abundant, but it is so invested in an integument, or horny involucre, which possesses the power of preserving the vital power unimpaired for years, when placed by circumstances so deep in the soil as to be beyond the influence of those vitalizing principles upon which germination is found mainly to depend.

This peculiarity of the seed explains why sorrel so often appears after long pasturage, and the disappearance of the plant from the surface of the soil where it has previously grown. [N. Y. Farmer.

The Production of Fish.

A female carp will deposit something like a quarter of a million eggs; a sturgeon six or seven millions; a salmon several hundreds. Yet of these very few are really fecundated, or grow into fish, on account of the accidents which destroy them, not to mention the quantity devoured by other fish. Two humble fisherman of France have recently directed their attention to this matter, and have devised a plan by which all, or the greater part of these eggs may be fecundated, and rivers stocked with fish to an incalculable amount. A pamphlet before us describes that simple plan, and gives much more information on the subject. The discoverers have merely watched the operations of Nature, and guarded against the thousand accidents which interrupt those operations. The eggs grow within the ovaries of the female until they become burdensome to her, and she relieves herself of them by pressing her stomach against the pebbles, or any other substance, at the bottom of the water. The eggs flow from her into a hole which she prepares for them. By a similar process the male relieves himself of the milt, which, flowing on the eggs, fecundates them. The fish then cover up these eggs with sand or pebbles, and leave them to become fish in due course. All, therefore, that man need do is to isolate these eggs from the destructive accidents of rivers, and to furnish them with all the necessary conditions. This has been accomplished by the simple plan of Gehin and Remy, who, under the patronage of the Government, have stocked streams and rivers in various parts of France. In a report made by Dr. Haxo, to the Academy of Sciences, in 1849, we read that these men have formed a piece of water, belonging exclusively to them, in which they have now between five and six millions of trout, aged from one to three years. There is news to fly-fishers, and gentlemen whose trout streams are impoverished!

Great Cheese Factory.

George Hezlep's great cheese factory, in Ohio, converts the milk of about 2500 cows, belonging to farmers in the neighborhood, into the best cheese, by labor-saving machinery. The curd is made, sacked, and marked by the farmer, and sent to the factory by a wagon which daily goes the rounds. Eight teams are thus employed. The curd is then weighed, sliced in a machine; then passed through the double curd-cooking apparatus; then through a machine which cuts it fine to powder, and salts it while passing through. It is then pressed, sacked, and then again pressed. A machine sacks 240 cheeses per hour. The factory makes 300 cheeses daily, weighing about 5000 pounds. Nearly 400 tons are turned out yearly. The Great Industrial Exhibition—Circular.

Office of the Association for the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations, NEW YORK, July 12, 1852.

The Association for the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations give notice, that the Exhibition will be opened in the City of New York, on the 2d day of May, 1853.

The Municipal Authorities have granted to them the use of Reservoir-square, and they are proceeding to erect thereon a building worthy of the purpose to which it is to be devoted.

The Association desire to make the Exhibition, in fact as well as in name, a representation from other countries as well as their own, of Raw Materials and Produce, Manufactures, Machinery and Fine Arts.

To this end they have made arrangements with Charles Buschek, Esq., late Commissioner of the Austrian Empire at the Industrial Exhibition in London, whose skill, experience, and high character, offer the most satisfactory security to contributors from abroad.

Mr. Buschek is the authorized Agent of the Association, for all countries other than the Continent of America, and as such has received his instructions.

All communications from contributors abroad must be addressed to him at "The Office of the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations in New York," No. 6 Charing Cross, London. He will state to them the nature of the powers given and authority conferred, and will also explain the great inducements offered by this enterprise to European exhibitors.

This Association will correspond with all persons in the United States, the Canadas and British Provinces, the West Indies, and this Continent generally, who may desire to contribute to this Exhibition.

All such communications must be addressed to "The Secretary of the Association for the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations, New York."

The Association is now ready to receive applications, and it is desired that they be sent in immediately. Due notice will be given, hereafter, when the building will be ready for the reception of articles.

Applications for the admission of objects to the Exhibition must represent intelligibly their nature and purpose, and must also state distinctly the number of square feet, whether of wall, floor or counter, required.

Machinery will be exhibited in Motion—the Motive Power to be furnished by the Association—and applications for the admission of Machinery, to be so exhibited, in addition to the general description and the requisition for space, must set forth the amount of Motive Power required.

The Association deem it proper to announce that Paintings in frames will be exhibited.

As, nothwithstanding the magnitude of the proposed building, there must necessarily be a limitation of space, the Association reserves the right to modify or reject applications, but, in so doing, will be governed by strict impartiality, looking only to the general objects of the enterprise.

The Association also reserves the right of determining the length of time, not to exceed in any case one season, during which objects shall, severally, form part of the Exhibition.

Exhibitors are requested to designate an agent to whom their contributions shall be delivered when withdrawn from the Exhibition.

Prizes for excellence in the various departments of the Exhibition will be awarded under the direction of capable and eminent persons.

With this statement the Directors solicit the co-operation of the productive intellect and industry of their own and other countries.

Mulching Potatoes.

Very few of our readers are acquainted with what is termed mulching. It has been practiced but little by our farmers, and will not be, unless there are strong reasons for its adoption. Noah Webster says, "Mulch is half rotton straw;" and mulching consists of putting straw more or less decayed around fruit trees, or on plats of ground which it is desired to keep moist through the season. During the great prevalence of the potato rot, a few years since, the Hon. D. W. Naill, of Sam's Creek, Maryland, reported an experiment made with potatoes, of which the following account was given at the time, in Skinner's Journal of Agriculture:

"He supplied a neighbor with potatoes for planting, who carefully planted the sets from three to four inches deep, in drills about eighteen inches apart, covering them carefully with straw from three to four inches deep, except a small portion, which was purposely left uncovered by way of experiment. The covering of straw prevented the growth of weeds, and superseded the necessity of cultivation. The result was an excellent crop of sound potatoes so far as they were covered. Those left uncovered suffered with the rot."

Another Will Case.

We gave recently, from the Cincinnati Gazette, the substance of a will case, in which the daughters—liberated slaves—of a planter recovered property left them by their father. We find another in the the same paper, in which the claimants are not so fortunate, and which shows the tender mercies of the code of Slavery.

In the summer of 1846, Edward Wells, a wealthy Mississippi Planter, brought to this city a beautiful mulatto girl of 16 years—his daughter by a favorite slave—and placed her in the Colored High School, an admirable institution, established and supported by the liberality of Hiram S. Gilmore. Mr. Wells left sufficient funds for the current expenses of his daughter, and returned to his plantation. We have seen several of his letters in which he speaks of "Nancy" in the most affectionate terms, desiring that her moral as well as her intellectual education should receive careful attention. Nancy had an own sister, somewhat younger than herself, but we believe she was not educated in Cincinnati.

In 1848 Mr. Wells died, leaving to each of his daughters, by a clause in his last will, the sum of three thousand dollars. He had previously emancipated both, but, as in the case mentioned a few days since, made no provision for the freedom of their mother. When the two Misses Wells—since married—claimed their property under the will, the payment was resisted by the other heirs, on the ground that it was illegal to emancipate slaves in Mississippi, unless the liberated chattels are taken to a Free State, and a legal record made of the act of liberation. Failing, thus far, to find such record in Ohio or any Free State, the young women mentioned have been unable to obtain a dollar of the money solemnly devised them by their father.

Robbing the Dead!

Yesterday and the night before, (says the N. O. Crescent, of July 8,) it having been noised abroad that the bodies killed by the explosion of the steamer St. James had been robbed and mutilated by a band of rovers on the Lake, considerable excitement was the consequence. A personal inspection of the male corpses showed, that such of them as had on outer garments, had their pockets turned inside out. Counsellor J. M. Wolf, one of the drowned, was said to have had upon him a gold lever watch and over seven hundred dollars in bank bills and other money. Several others, who were known to have been sitting up at the time of the catastrophe, engaged in a game of cards, and consequently with considerable sums about them, were afterward found floating, with their pockets completely rifled. One young lady, with a chaplet of sea-weed entwined in her auburn hair, had several of her fingers split from knuckle to nail. She had worn rings, and the red ruffians had split her fingers to reduce the swelling of the flesh in order the more readily to wring from them the garnish gauds—the rings! Another had her arm torn and gashed, in the same manner, that a bracelet might be pirated from her stiffened yet beautiful limb! Another—aye, another, showed the marks in her lacerated ears whence the ear-drops had been torn with avaricious haste by the cormorant fiends, two, peradventure, tugging for the prize. A fourth had been encountered by a monster more impatient of spoil, who, to secure from her hand two plain gold rings which she was known to have worn, had severed the fingers, flesh and bone!

Fruits and Flowers among the French.

The culture of roses in France affords a branch of trade by no means unimportant. As early as 1770 the number of rose stocks reported was large, and the trade has increased, until now the income of the Department of the Seine alone, from this source, is estimated at a million of francs. The exportation to England, Germany, Russia and North America is large and important. At least 100,000 stocks are annually sold in the Paris flower market, and ungrafted plants to the number of 150,000, and an annual average of grafted plants for exportation of 800,000. Beside the roses, flowers to the amount of 4,000,000 francs are annually sold in these markets, besides those which are used in public and private festivals. Paris consumes annually strawberries to the amount of 5,000,000f., to the raising of which fruit 1,250 acres of land are devoted in the Department of the Seine alone. Epinay, near St. Denis, sends daily, during the season, 500 fancs' worth of asparagus to England; and Meudon, plums to the like amount. Harfleur exported, last year, 100,000 francs' worth of muskmelons to London. Melons throughout France are very profitably cultivated. French muskmelons are sent even to the Senegal and to the United States.

Ashes.

Ashes are perhaps more valuable on light, sandy soils, than on those which have a considerable per centum of aluminous matter. They are valuable either in a leached or unleached state. Lands that have been found almost barren, when cultivated in corn, have, upon being liberally dressed with ashes, without any other manure, produced forty-five bushels per acre of sound grain. One of the principal benefits derived from the use of ashes on light arenaceous lands, is an increased capacity they confer upon it of retaining moisture. Ashes also give to the land silicate of potash, which is necessary in the formation of straw and stems.

On Long Island, and in many parts of New Jersey, ashes are extensively used, with the best results. It is thought by those who have had the most experience in their use, that on sand lands, where there is ordinarily a deficiency of moisture, the application of from forty to forty-five bushels per acre, will invariably produce a sufficient augmentation of crop to pay the expense. In compost, ashes, both leached and unleached, possess a decided value. Where muck, green vegetable matter, and animal excrement are composted together, their use will be found to add greatly to the efficiency of the manure when applied to most descriptions of soil, but more particularly will their influence be recognizable of sandy lands, which are frequently injured by the presence of free acids, salt of iron, &c. [Farmer and Artizan.

A Cheap Disinfecting Agent.

A correspondent of the Cleveland Herald gives the following piece of intelligence, well worth remembering:—

"Heat a shovel not quite to redness, and then place upon it a teaspoonful of freshly burned coffee, and let it burn in a room where the air is impure. At first you will not perceive the peculiar odor of the coffee at all; in a few minutes, however, you will find that the room is filled with the smell of the coffee, and that every impurity of the atmosphere has been totally destroyed, not smothered. Let some of your scientific readers try it where the air is peculiarly foul, and note the results, and explain the modus operandi of the disinfecting process.

"Remember, the shovel must be only so hot as to cause the coffee to burn with a copious white smoke. To the sick, the odor of the coffee is peculiarly grateful."

EASTERN METHOD OF MEASURING TIME.—The people of the East measure time by the length of their shadow. Hence, if you ask a man what o'clock it is, he immediately goes into the sun, stands erect, then looking where his shadow terminates, he measures his length with his feet, and tells you nearly the time. Thus the workmen earnestly desire the shadow which indicates the time for leaving their work. A person wishing to leave his toil, says, "How long my shadow is in coming?" "Why did you not come sooner?" "Because I waited for my shadow." In the seventh chapter of Job we find, written, "As a servant earnestly desireth his shadow."

THE MANIA FOR LACE.—Mr. Weed, in one of his letters from Europe, gives the following notice of the mania for fine lace, which is conspicuous among the forms of modern extravagance:—

"The ladies visited the principal lace manufactory, where the Brussels article is made and sold for sums of money that would frighten prudent people. What do you think, for example, of trimming a dress with lace at $250 and $300 a yard? But just now the rage is for old lace. In Florence, Rome, Naples, Venice, &c., traffic in old lace is very active. Ladies look for it with more solicitude than for any other article of dress. Neither jewelry or precious stones are so much prized as lace known to have been worn by a Cardinal or monk, a century or two ago. No lady thinks of leaving Italy without securing some of their precious spoils. Of course the supply of old lace keeps pace with the rapidly increasing demand! How much of it is genuine I will not undertake to say. Every lady is quite sure she can detect the antique from the modern.

TOBACCO AS A PRESERVATIVE OF TREES.—The efficiency of a decoction of tobacco in preserving elm, linden and other shade trees from the ravages of the worm, has been satisfactorily established by repeated experiments. This specific, we learn, has been tried in Washington by the Commissioner of Public Buildings, on the elms in front of the Capitol steps, and by the keeper of the grounds at the War and Navy Departments, on both elm and linden trees, and in each case was attended with perfect success. The decoction is destructive both to the bug which feeds on these trees, and to the eggs which it deposits on the other side of the leaf. The proper time for the application is as soon as the leaves are well developed, at which time the presence of the bug may be easily perceived.

PREVENTION OF RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.—The practice of placing a looking-glass before the engineer on a locomotive, inclined in such a way as to enable him to see the whole train behind him without turning, is gradually becoming universal on the continent of Europe. Many roads in France have adopted this plan, the greater part of those in Austria have tried it successfully, and the locomotives on the line from Brussels to Antwerp have been just fitted with the necessary reflectors. Should a car or any portion of the train become detached, should an axle break, or in short any accident happen, the engineer sees it at once.

VARIETY.

The editor of the Polynesian, in noticing the arrival of the clipper R. B. Forbes at Hong Kong, Feb. 4, claims for her the honor of the quickest trip on these waters. He says: "Without counting the days of sailing and arriving, which are not usually included in such calculations, she was but seventeen days in running 6,000 miles, which is the distance to Hong Kong, as commonly estimated. This would give her 352 16-17 miles per day, or 14 15-34 miles per hour for the whole time, equal to crossing the Atlantic, from Liverpool to New York, in 8½ days, which has never yet been done by the fastest of the Collins steamers."

John Smith, an English laborer of New Albany, coming home from his labor on the evening of the 2d inst., found his wife intoxicated and partly undressed. He requested her to go to bed, which she refused to do. He took hold of her and endeavored to force her. A scuffle ensued, when S. struck the woman with the palm of his hand. She fell, and in a few moments was dead. Physicians who held a post mortem examination state that death was occasioned by the breaking of a blood-vessel in the head, done in falling, the blood suffusing the brain, and not from the blow of the hand.

The son of Justice Anthony, of Utica, for whom a call for information has been for several weeks advertised in the Atlas, has returned to his parents. He has been to New York, Philadelphia, &c. This erratic genius, says the Utica Gazette, is only nine years of age, and this is the third or fourth of his expeditions. He starts off without preparation, funds or baggage, as the humor prompts him, and commends himself to the good graces and kindness of conductors, hotel-keepers and others, by his handsome and intelligent appearance and good conduct.

The Chicago Tribune has the following: It is said that since the tracks of the Railroads around the Lake were laid down, but one single wolf has been seen or heard of south of them, and it is thought that he had never been north since their construction. The farmers of Twenty Mile Prairie, and adjacent country, are no longer troubled about herding their sheep in pens during each night, as they were formerly. The wolf is at all times exceedingly suspicious of traps, and is not disposed to venture near iron or steel, however tempting the bait may be that lies near it.

In San Francisco, there are fourteen Protestant congregations, eleven organized churches, with 483 church members, church accommodations for more than 4,000 hearers, and an average attendance of 2,605, and an average attendance of 339 scholars in the Sabbath schools and Bible classes. The whole population of the city is 40,000.

In the afternoon of July 7, five buildings in Greensboro' and the adjoining town of Hardwick, Vt., were struck by lightning and consumed. The buildings were not near together, and the fire was not communicated from one to the other—but there were five independent conflagrations.

General Gabriel Villere, of the parish of St. Bernard, La., departed this life at his plantation on Tuesday, 6th inst., at the age of 67. His services in the battle of New Orleans were only second to those of the illustrious Jackson.

Later accounts from Texas have been received at New Orleans. The cholera has made its appearance on the Guadaloupe River, and created considerable alarm. The crops in Texas are remarkably fine.

The editor of the New Orleans Crescent has been fighting a duel, with rifles, with a Mr. Barbagon. Two shots satisfied the honor of the two men, and they parted without hurt.

A beautiful specimen of quartz gold, valued at $50, has been stolen from the cabinet of the Mechanic's Association in Bangor, Me., the Hall having been broken open.

The President has appointed Wm. Carr Lane to be Governor of New Mexico, in place of James S. Calhoun, deceased.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

CONTINUING OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

Rev. 1: 10.—"In the Spirit on the Lord's Day."

Allusions to "the day of the Lord" occur with so great frequency in Scripture, where obviously they refer to Christ's second appearing, that it may appear surprising how little consideration this has had in seeking to interpret the Apostle's words. The prophet Isaiah, in vision of the overwhelming judgments which shall usher in that "great and terrible day," exclaims, "Howl ye; for the day of the Lord is at hand; it shall come as a destruction from the Almighty. Therefore shall all hands be faint, and every man's heart shall melt; and they shall be afraid; pangs and sorrows shall take hold of them; they shall be in pain, as a woman that travaileth; they shall be amazed one at another; their faces shall be as flames. Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, cruel, both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate." Is. xiii. 6—9. Zephaniah, in like manner, uses similar language: "Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord God; for the day of the Lord is at hand; for the Lord hath prepared a sacrifice. He hath bid his guests." Zeph. i. 7. "Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord! To what end is it for you? The day of the Lord is darkness, and not light." "Shall not the day of the Lord be darkness, and not light, even very dark, and no brightness in it?" Amos. v. 18, 20. "And I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." Joel. ii. 30, 31. This prophecy of Joel is referred to by Peter, in the Book of Acts, when declaring from Scripture, that the gifts of the Holy Spirit, promised in fullness to be enjoyed in the latter day of glory, the church already received in foretaste on the day of Pentecost. The Apostle, in quoting, retains the language of the prophet, of "that great and notable day of the Lord." Acts. ii. 20. The Apostle Paul, in like manner, alludes to the day of Christ's return as that of his own glorification, in these words: "That I may rejoice in the day of Christ." Again, to the church of Corinth: "Ye have acknowledged us in part, that we are your rejoicing, even as ye also are ours, in the day of the Lord Jesus." Phil. ii. 16; 2 Cor. i. 14. Again, "that the Spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." 1 Cor. v. 5.

This language of Prophets and Apostles is in perfect harmony with our Lord's own declaration to His disciples, when He said, "The days will come when ye shall desire to see ONE of the DAYS of the Son of Man, and ye shall not see it. And they shall say to you, See here, or see there; go not after them, nor follow them. For, as the lightning that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven shineth unto the other part under heaven, so shall also the Son of Man be in his day." Luke. xviii. 22—24. "The great day of His wrath is come." Rev. vi. 17. The same designation, applied to the day of our Lord's glorious appearing, occurs in other texts. (See Is. ii. 12; Jer. xlvi. 10; Ezek. xiii. 5; xxx. 3; Joel. i. 15; ii. 1; iii. 14; Obediah 15; Zech. xiv. 1.) It is indeed emphatically "The Day of His coming." Mal. iii. 2.

Viewed in this connection, and keeping in rememberance the fact that it is the very object of the Apocalypse to exhibit the day of the Saviour's triumph over all His enemies, and the events which usher in that day, "the Lords day" in which, in Spirit, John was, while yet it was distant, seems clear and distinct. In the day of his banishment to Patmos, for the love he bore to Him who personally also suffered at the hands of wicked men, he was cheered with visions of brighter glory as yet to come. Like Abraham, he in Spirit beheld "one of the days of the Son of Man," and rejoiced.

So much in harmony with the structure and object of the book is this interpretation, that it has been forced upon the acceptance of men who have studied carefully its meaning, even when they held not our view of an unchanged Sabbath. It is adopted in the present day, and strenuously maintained, by Dr. S. R. Maitland, late Librarian to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and defended by Dr. Todd, both eminent for Apocalyptic exposition. The former considers this interpretation important, as "not only amending the translation of one verse, but by affording us an intimation as to the subject of the whole book" of the Revelation. As to the common view of "the Lord's day" meaning the first day of the week, he says, "It is obvious that it rests upon the assumption that the day was known by this title in the time of the Apostle, and this assumption I believe to be perfectly gratuitous." "Unless, however," he again remarks, "we assume that this title was in use in the time of St. John, we may reasonably doubt whether he would have used it to signify the first day of the week; and if this was not his meaning, to inquire what day he did allude to."

Dr. Maitland again remarks, "I do not see the Apostle's motive for specifying that he received the revelation on the first day of the week; the idea is not pursued or resumed, nor can I observe that any thing in the whole book is grounded upon it. Mr. Scott, in his Commentary on the place, says, 'This was on the Lord's day,' which can be meant of no other than the day on which the Lord Jesus arose from the dead, even 'the first day of week;' and this is a conclusive proof that it was set apart and kept holy by the primitive Christians in commemoration of that great event; for on what other account could it have been thus mentioned?' Even taking the present version, I do not see in it a 'conclusive proof' that the first day of the week was set apart and kept holy by the primitive Christians." Letters in the Jewish Expositor for 1823, and in the British Magazine for 1839.

Dr. Todd also remarks, that "very reasonable doubts have been expressed whether, at that early period, the Christian weekly festival was known by the name which the common interpretation of the passage before us supposes to have been here given to it by St. John. In no other passage of of the New Testament is it spoken of as 'the Lord's day.'" It may be observed, also, that this view of the passage enables us to explain (what on the common interpretation is very insufficiently explained) the use of the emphatic article—en te kuriake hemera, 'the day of the Lord.' If we suppose St. John to speak only of the first day of the week, no reason can be given for this use of the article, unless we should conceive him to have intended some particular Sunday, or Lord's day, that was known to his readers. Hence some have supposed that the Apostle meant the festival of Easter; an opinion for which there is no authority. If, however, it be admitted, that the day of the Lord here spoken of is the great day of our Saviour's second coming, the use of the emphatic article presents no difficulty, but is natural and proper." Todd's Lectures on the Apocalypse, p. 56.

It is true that the phrase used in the New Testament for 'the Lord's day,' or 'the day of the Lord,' is generally hemera Kuriou or hemera tou kuriou, (and in the old Vatican MS., 2 Thess. ii. 2, which in our version has "the day of Christ," is the same,) while in Rev. i. 10, and there only, the adjective he kuriake hemera is employed. But, as Dr. Todd remarks, "there seems no reason to suppose, in the absence of any proof, that this difference in the form of expression indicates so complete a difference of meaning as that we should be compelled to interpret the phrase of the weekly festival, and not of that great day of our Saviour's second coming, which the equivalent words undoubtedly signify, in every other passage where they are found in the writings of the Apostles."* p. 27.

"I do not wish to speak positively, and I doubt whether I can express myself clearly," says Dr. Maitland, again, "but I do not remember instances in which any person is said to have been en pneumati [in spirit] as a mode of existence merely, and not with direct reference to some place, or something heard, seen, or done. In such a case, it is generally understood parenthetically—as when our Lord inquires, 'How then doth David, in spirit, call him Lord?'"—this being the sense in which Dr. M. understands John to speak.

So likewise Dr. Todd remarks on this, "It is also assumed, in the common interpretation of this passage, that the words, 'I was in the Spirit,' are an assertion of the Apostle's inspiration; describing a state of supernatural illumination or ecstacy, into which he was cast by the influence of the Holy Spirit, and in which the visions he beheld were presented to his mind. But the phrase en pneumati, when used as it is here, without the article, does not necessarily signify the Holy Spirit of God; and in two other passages of the Apocalypse where it occurs, it cannot possibly have that signification. The first of these is the remarkable place where the Apostle tells us that the angel 'carried him away in the Spirit, en pneumati, into the wilderness,' to show him the woman sitting on the seven-headed beast, (Rev. xvii. 3;) the other is that in which the angel is described as having carried the Apostle away 'in Spirit, en pneumati, to a great and high mountain,' to show him the New Jerusalem, (Rev. xxi. 10.) Now, in these passages, the meaning obviously is, that the Apostle was carried into the wilderness, and afterwards to the great and high mountain, not really, or bodily, but in spirit; that he seemed to himself to be carried thither, where the visions he beheld were represented as present to his soul."

"There seems no valid reason, therefore, why the same phrase, in the passage under consideration, should not have the same signification which it is admitted to bear in every other passage of the Apocalypse where it occurs; and if so, then we must understand the Apostle, when he says, 'I was in the spirit on the Lord's day,' as asserting that he was carried forward, in spirit, to the day of Christ's second coming; to that great and terrible day which was foretold under the name of the day of the Lord, and the day of Christ, in so many passages of the prophets; the day for which the Christian Church was taught to look and long, and whose coming was continually in the thoughts and prayers of all Christ's faithful followers; and, therefore, that the great subject of the Apocalypse, as well as the period to which we are to look for the fulfillment of its predictions, is the coming of the Lord, in glory and majesty, the day in which He will appear, according to His promise, the second time, without sin unto salvation." p. 59.

"Whether the Apostle did or did not intend to express it, must he not," again inquires Dr. Maitland, "have been carried forward, in spirit, into the day of the Lord, when, in the verses preceding that under discussion, he exclaimed, 'Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him?' Is it not the language of one who, though he was bodily in the Isle of Patmos, was yet, 'in spirit, in the day of the Lord,' and (if I may so speak of what passed in vision only,) an actual spectator of its great and terrible mysteries?"

*"Wetstein seems to have understood kuriake hemera, in Rev. i. 10, of the Day of Judgment. His note on the words is as follows: 'Hunc diem judicii vidit in spiritu, i. e. prævidit repræsentatum, Matt. xxiii. 30: Esai. lviii. 1.'"

For the Sabbath Recorder.

THE PASSOVER SABBATH AND THE PENTECOST.

Having said all I thought necessary on this subject in a former communication, I had no thought of bringing it forward again; and I do so now only for the purpose of answering the request of Mr. Begg for my reasons for rejecting his views.

I find two principal reasons for the views which I hold. The first is, the time that elapses from the Passover Sabbath to the day of Pentecost. Bro. B. admits that seven weeks must be numbered, as recorded in Lev. 23: 15, 16—"And ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the Sabbath, from the day that ye brought the sheaf of the wave-offering; seven Sabbaths shall be complete even unto the morrow after the seventh Sabbath shall ye number fifty days." Now, I cannot number fifty days, and make them end on the morrow after the seventh Sabbath, unless I commence numbering on the morrow after the first Sabbath. If Bro. B. can do so, he will remove one objection to his view. For instance: Suppose the Passover occurs on the first day of the week; the second day of the week would be the day of holy convocation, (15th of the month,) and the third day of the week would, according to Bro. Begg's view, be the day for offering the wave-sheaf; and from that day he would number fifty days, and have them end on the morrow after the seventh Sabbath. Now try it, and if you can make it right, I will very willingly yield the point.

My second objection may not appear of so much consequence, yet to me it appears of some consequence, because in my view every truth is important. I believe that God has specifically designated these feast-days, so that we may understand them. Bro. B. views these days of "holy convocation" of the Passover, Pentecost, and seventh month, as Sabbaths alike; but I find that God has given more particular instructions concerning the feasts of the seventh month than concerning the other feasts. "And whatsoever soul it be that doeth any work in that same day, the same soul will I destroy among his people." Lev. 23: 30. God calls these four feast days, in this seventh month, Sabbaths—a title he has withheld from those previous; and in verse 30, says, "besides the Sabbaths of the Lord." Here, then, is a difference. These four, God calls Sabbaths, and to the breach of one of them at least, if not of all, the same penalty is attached as to the weekly Sabbath. Not so with the Passover or Pentecost; and though their character may be the same, so far as relates to manual labor, yet there is the difference of the name Sabbath, and the penalty for disobedience.

I might add some other reasons for my views, but as they are altogether inferential, I think these are sufficient; and if I am mistaken in not "distinguishing between the weekly and festival Sabbaths," as Bro. Begg is pleased to call them, his article has failed to show me my mistake, especially as to numbering the fifty days, which is not an inference, but a fact, whatever may be said of an "unwarranted inference" of the festival Sabbaths.

CHRISTIANITY—ITS DESIGN.

By Christianity, I mean that system of ethics and religion which was taught exclusively by Jesus Christ, including his precepts and examples. Jesus being that prophet who was to be heard, and to whom was to be "the gathering of the people," it was solemnly announced from heaven, by God himself, that he was his Son, and man was commanded to "hear him." Whatever, therefore, in the teachings of Christ's predecessors or successors conflicts with the teachings of Jesus, is nugatory. And I deem this consideration of importance; for many things which are contrary to the spirit and genius of Christianity, have urged their claims as being, at least, permitted by it. Christianity was to supersede all the systems of morals and religion which had preceded it. Even Moses, inspired as he was, was to have no glory when compared with Jesus. Sublime as his teachings were, yet they were, in some cases, to be superseded by those of the Messiah. To know what Christianity is, we are to learn it, not from Moses, nor from Paul or Peter, but from Jesus himself. The gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth, are to be the exponents of Christianity.

These remarks seemed necessary, lest any should form their opinions of Christianity from what is seen in the present day, or has been seen in the past. That Christianity has permitted Judaism, Popery, and Paganism, to interweave themselves in its texture, is quite apparent. To know Christianity aright, the stand-point of observation must be Bethlehem, Calvary, and Olivet. From Calvary, Christianity started on its mission, clothed in its proper dress, and armed with its proper weapons. Its mission was one of love, and its object or design was the regeneration of the world by that principle. To rescue, redeem, and save man from his sins, was announced by its harbingers as its object; and the name of Jesus was enunciated by an angel to the mother of its Author. The great object and design of Christianity, then, was the salvation of men—salvation from sin, as well as from its consequences. Salvation from sin, I repeat, is the Alpha and the Omega of Christianity. "His name shall be called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins." Had not this truth been lost sight of, long ere this "the knowledge of the Lord would have covered the earth." But it is to be feared, that the full meaning of salvation, as comprehended by Christianity, has not been understood or regarded. I think a very general impression prevails, that salvation from sin, or being saved, pertains mostly to a future state, rather than to the present. And much of modern preaching tends to leave an impression, that about the whole object of religion is to prepare men to die. Now, while man must have religion in order to be saved after death, it is no less true, that he must have religion in order to be saved before death. And Christianity is as well adapted to save men here as hereafter; and men need salvation in this world as well, and perhaps as much, as in the world to come. The gospel of Jesus Christ will prove the power of God to salvation, here in this world, to every one that believes it. It has done it, it can and will do it, in all who avail themselves of it.

That Christianity includes the salvation of men in this world, is evinced from the many prophetic declarations of its final triumph over this earth, and the subjugation of men to its saving power. It is proved, from its adaptedness to save all who believe in its principles. It is scarcely possible for one to have been so completely under the dominion of sin, that the power of Christianity would be inadequate to his salvation. The same is true of communities and nations. Christianity has all the elements of a nation's salvation, as well as of an individual's. Its principles, reduced to practice, would undo all the heavy burdens of oppression, hush every note of war, bestow freedom upon every fettered slave, elevate to office none but those who fear God and work righteousness, disband every army of soldiers, spike every cannon, demolish every fort, and pour the vast expenditure of war into the channels of trade and human improvement. All this, and much more, Christianity can, and (blessed be God) will one day do in this world. It was designed to accomplish this; and as certain as its Author possesses all power in heaven and in earth, it will accomplish it. The wilderness shall yet bud and blossom as the rose, the lame leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb yet sing for joy.

EVILS OF INTEMPERANCE.

When the Liquor Law was under discussion in the Legislature of Massachusetts, Mr. Stevenson, a member of the House, gave the following graphic picture of the evils of intemperance:—

"Portray the evils of intemperance, did I say? He does not live who can tell the whole story of its woes. Exaggeration there is impossible. The fatigued fancy falters in its flight before it comes up to the fact. The mind's eye cannot take in the countless miseries of its motley train. No human art can put into that picture shades darker than the truth. Put into such a picture every conceivable thing that is terrible or revolting—paint health in ruins, hope destroyed, affections crushed, prayer silenced—paint the chosen seats of parental care, of filial piety, of brotherly love, of maternal devotion, all, all vacant; paint all crime, of every stature and of every hue, from murder, standing aghast over a grave which it has no means to cover, down to the mean deception, still confident of success; paint home a desert, and shame a tyrant, and poverty, the legitimate child of vice in this community, and not its prolific mother; paint the dark valley of the shadow of death, peopled with living slaves; paint a landscape with trees whose fruit is poison, and whose shade is death, with mountain torrents tributary to an ocean whose very waves are fire; put in the most distant background the vanishing vision of a blessed past, and in the foreground the terrible certainty of an accursed future; paint prisons with doors that only open inwards, people the scene with men whose shattered forms are tenanted by tormented souls, with children upon whose lips no smile can ever play, and with women into whose cheeks furrows have been burnt by tears wrung by anguish from breaking hearts—paint such a picture, and when you are ready to show it, do not let in the rays of the heavenly sun, but illumine it with glares of the infernal fires, and still you will be bound to say that your horrible picture falls short of the truth."

THE AFRICAN AND HIS DOG.

When the devoted missionary, Robert Moffat, was in England, he told an amusing story of a poor African, who lived near one of the missionary settlements, and whose dog, by some accident, had got possession of a Testament in the native language, and torn it to pieces, devouring some of the leaves. This man came to the missionaries in great dismay, and laid his case before them. He said that the dog had been a very useful animal, and had helped to protect his property, by guarding it from wild beasts, and also in hunting and destroying them; but that he feared it would be useless for the time to come. The missionaries asked him how was this? and why should not his dog be as useful as formerly? As for the injury done, that was but an accident, and the Testament could be replaced by another copy. "That is true," said the poor man, "but still I am afraid the dog will be of no further use to me. The words of the New Testament are full of love and gentleness, and after the dog has eaten them, it is not likely that he will hunt or fight for me any more."

THE HONEY THAT JOHN THE BAPTIST ATE. A recent traveler, who visited the Jordan, near Jericho, states that the Hebrew word Debash, rendered honey by our translators in our Bibles, has probably much more frequent reference to honey of dates, or dates themselves, than to the honey of bees. After examining the subject, with the most reliable authorities, to my mind the conclusion is irrefragable that the wild honey spoken of, Matt. iii. 4, was nothing more than new gathered dates, a nutritious and wholesome article of food, requiring no culinary art. ROBIN REDBREAST.

BY G. W. DOANE.

I have somewhere met with an old legend, that a robin, hovering about the cross, bore off a thorn from our dear Saviour's crown, and dyed his bosom with the blood; and that from that time, robins have been the friends of man.

Sweet robin, I have heard them say
That thou wert there upon the day
The Christ was crowned, in cruel scorn,
And bore away one bleeding thorn;
That so, the blush upon thy breast
In shameful sorrow was impressed;
And thence thy genial sympathy
With our redeemed humanity.

Sweet robin, would that I might be
Bathed in my Saviour's blood, like thee;
Bear in my breast, whate'er the loss,
The bleeding blazon of the cross:
Live, ever, with thy loving mind,
In fellowship with human kind;
And take my pattern still from thee,
In gentleness and constancy.

TRUE REPENTANCE.

Dr. Samuel Hopkins once owned a slave, and sold him, probably with feelings similar to those with which John Newton, after his conversion, continued for a time in the slave trade, going to Africa for his victims. After his removal to Newport, R. I., the inhabitants of which place were deeply engaged in the slave traffic, and his own people equally with others, his eyes were opened to the evils of slavery and the wickedness of the traffic, and he resolved to lift up his voice against it. "Accordingly, several years before the commencement of the revolutionary war, he preached a sermon to his people, pointedly condemning the iniquitous traffic. The effect of this discourse was very different from what might have been apprehended; for, instead of arousing their opposition and resentment, as he feared, it produced a general conviction that the whole thing was wrong. The people were surprised that they had never viewed the practice in the same light before. And it was not long before his church passed a resolution, 'That the slave trade, and the slavery of Africans, as it has existed among us, is a gross violation of the righteousness and benevolence which are so much inculcated in the Gospel, and therefore we will not tolerate it in this church.'"

He also formed the plan of educating some of the colored people, and sending them back as missionaries to their fatherland, and began by appropriating the price of the slave, which he had sold previous to coming to Newport, to the object. Here is the working of genuine religious principles, and if all who acknowledge the slave trade and slavery, as a system, to be wrong, would act in a similar way, the days of slavery would be numbered. There is nothing so mighty to the destruction of systems of evil as Christian principles properly acted out. It is also pertinent to remark, that it is not being found in the practice of evil, when the nature of the evil has not been made manifest, that determines the character; but it is the persisting in wrong when the mind has been called to consider the wrong, that stamps the character as reprobate. HINDOO MECHANICS.

The Hindoo does his work in such a different manner from the American or Englishman, that he almost appears to be a person belonging to a different order of beings. Our blacksmith stands at work, the Hindoo squats, with his knees nearly on a level with his chin; it is the same with their carpenters and masons, their posture is suggestive of indolence and effeminacy. They appear to be defective in the muscular power of their limbs, and the blacksmith hammers away, squatted like a kangaroo, on his haunches. They go barefoot, and if they do not use their feet to stand upon while they work, they make more use of their toes than the Anglo-Saxons. The Hindoo blacksmith, when he has a piece of iron to file, places it between the jaws of a small pair of tongs, and, grasping them firmly between his toes, files away with great force. He also sometimes uses his toes to reach forth and grasp a tool, the same as we do with our fingers; and so accustomed are they to use their toes, that they sometimes adorn them with gold rings, they being as worthy of such honor as our fingers.

Time does not seem to be valued by the Oriental. His tools and method of working appear to be contrived for the very purpose of consuming as much time as possible. The mason works with a trowel about the size of a table-spoon, and a small hammer of about half a pound weight.

He squats before his work, and has two women attendants to bring him his brick and mortar. These attend, the one with a brick in each hand, the other with a truncheon of mortar, about the size of a breakfast plate. One American mason, with one hod-carrier, will lay as much brick as twelve Hindoos, with their twenty-four female rundees, or brick and mortar attendants.

An English engineer, sent out to finish some Government works, having occasion to run up embankments in a short time, made an attempt to introduce the wheel-barrow as a substitute for the basket, with which they carry the earth on the head; he got a number made, and to encourage them he filled his barrow full and wheeled the first one himself. He invited the stoutest of his gang to try the next; the poor fellow stepped along a few paces, then staggered, tumbled, and fell with his barrow. He then filled it half full, and it was wheeled along. He then left for half an hour, and when he returned he found four men at the barrow, two at the head and two at the feet, bearing it along as if it were a funeral bier. He thought that the failure was owing to the barrows being too large, and he had a number made about the same size as those with which our boys amuse themselves, as he thought, from their smallness, he would never catch four men carrying one again. These small barrows went well, the Hindoos trundled them along in great glee, and the work, to the joy of the engineer, appeared to go on rapidly; but after all, in a short time no more earth was excavated than by baskets. This puzzled him; but, having gone from the gang a short time, he returned abruptly, and discovered the reason, for he found the Hindoos marching up the plank with the greatest possible gravity, each carrying his wheel-barrow on his head—legs in front, and wheel behind.

The engineer, in giving an account of the first steam engine which was seen there, says that when he was consulting the drawings with dividers, and making calculations with a piece of charcoal, to put all the parts together, the Brahmins and grand-beared Mussulmen looked on with open mouths, as if he was going on with some conjuring process. After he had got the engine together and steam up, one evening about dusk, by the light of two flaming torches, he could see eyes looking curiously through the windows, and the engine house was crowded. In a moment the safety-valve suddenly opened, and what a screaming, and yelling, and running there was, and every one was filled with terror. At last the huge fly-wheel spun round, the walking beam moved up and down, the pumps clanked, the steam snorted, and many came back with their terror changed to wonder at seeing the huge iron shafts and arms endowed with life and motion.

After a while the engineer discovered that the natives had solved the whole difficulty of the nature and principles of the engine—the boiler contained an English spirit, and when a fire was made beneath, and he roasted, he would not go to work until he called duhagci (mercy) through the safety-valve. He would then go to work, but he had to be well supplied with water to quench his thirst. The engineer found that this belief was useful to him, for he impressed it upon the mind of the fireman that if he did not supply the spirit with plenty of water, he would surely break loose and kill everybody within his reach.

DR. OLIN'S POOR SERMONS.

Dr. Olin was the most powerful preacher I ever heard. The assertion is made without a reserved qualification. He did not affect the orator—his manner and peculiarities were against the laws of art; he gesticulated badly, defying all rules; his utterance was often exceedingly defective, especially when he was powerfully excited; but such was the massive magnitude of his ideas, the majesty of his language, the comprehensiveness of his logic, sweeping in mighty curves around the whole field of his subject, and concentrating at its very core—such the very earnestness of his spirit, rising often to sublimity, that you were overwhelmed, if not appalled, at the example of intellectual and moral mightiness which he presented.

His very "failures" were usually great sermons, being remarkable for their thorough thought and sound logic, even when they lacked his usual vivid feeling. His feeble health was sometimes attended with a languor which was insurmountable under whatever excitement the public occasion might afford. He seemed not disposed to disguise his sense of such "failures," and was grateful to find any good effect from them. I spent a Sunday evening with him in Boston, after he had failed, as he thought, in a sermon during the day. He referred to it with much good nature, and remarked that his history as a preacher had taught him to expect the blessing of God on even such efforts. He proceeded to relate an instance which occurred during his ministry in South Carolina. He preached at a camp-meeting where a Presbyterian clergyman, who was to address the next session of his synod in Charleston, heard him. The Presbyterian doctor repeated, not only the text, but substantially the sermon, before his clerical brethren, giving, however, full credit to its Methodist author.

He then occupied the Methodist pulpit of that city, and the next Sunday evening his chapel was crowded with the elite of the community, including several clergymen. He preached long, and, as he thought, loud and confusedly; in fine, he felt at the close of the discourse confounded with mortification. He sank, after the benediction, into the pulpit, to conceal himself from view until the assembly should be gone. By and by he discovered some distingue individuals apparently waiting in the aisle to salute him. His heart failed. Noticing the door adjacent to the pulpit, he determined to escape by it. He knew not whither it led, but supposed it communicated with the next house, which had once been a parsonage, as he recollected having heard. He hastened to the door, got it open, and stepping out descended abruptly into the grave-yard, which extended beyond and behind the former parsonage. The night was very dark, and he stumbled about among the tombs for some time. He reached at last the wall which closed the cemetery from the street, but found it insurmountable. Groping his way to the opposite side, he sought to reach a back street by penetrating through one of the gardens which belonged to a range of houses there. It was an awkward endeavor, in the darkness and among graves, but at last he found a wicket gate. He had no sooner passed through than he was assailed by a house dog. Having prevailed in his encounter, he pushed on, and reached the street, with some very reasonable apprehensions that the neighborhood would be alarmed by his adventures. He now threaded his way through an indirect route to his lodgings, passed unceremoniously to his chamber, and shut himself up for the night, but slept little or none, reflecting with deep chagrin on the strange conclusion of the day. On the morrow he hardly dared to venture out; but, while yet in his study, Mr. ——, one of the first citizens of Charleston, and a leading officer in a sister denomination, called at the house, and was admitted to the preacher's study with reluctance, but what was the astonishment of the latter to hear him say, that the sermon of the preceding evening had enabled him to step into the kingdom of God, after many years of disconsolate endeavors, during which he had been a member of the church! The same day a lady of influential family came to report the same good tidings. Other similar examples occurred, I think that morning; and this "failure" was one of the most useful sermons of his ministry.

INTERCOURSE OF NATIONS.

In the new earth, seen in vision by the seer of Patmos, "there was no more sea." A prominent idea suggested by this description is, that there shall be no bar to intercourse. For seas, though they constitute the great highway of nations, have always been such a hindrance to intercourse, as nothing but the splendid triumphs of science, in these modern days, have been able to overcome. Indeed, with all these advantages, the intercourse of distant nations is nothing compared with what it would be, if no seas interposed. It is readily conceivable, that if the three thousand miles of ocean lying between us and the continent of Europe, were occupied by dry land, and railroad communication established, the intercourse would be increased in a most astonishing degree. But whether such a change would be really advantageous, without a corresponding change in the moral condition of the world, is questionable.

There can be no reasonable doubt, that He who implanted the social principle in our nature, and commanded each one to love his neighbor as himself, intended that there should be extensive reciprocation of fellowship with one another. Yet the history of nations has presented almost a continual struggle between the spirit of commerce and that of isolation. Prompted by the natural cravings of the heart, and by a sense of mutual dependence upon one another, men come together. But meeting, not in the spirit of benevolence, but of selfishness—not to give, but to receive—not to recognize each other as having equal rights, but each to insist upon his own as paramount, the necessary result is strife, which ends only with the destruction of the weaker party, or in their fixed resolution to have no farther dealings with each other.

Considering how supremely selfish men are, it is perhaps well that there are temporary obstructions to extended intercourse. Perhaps it would not be well, that these obstructions should be suddenly removed. It is necessary that men should first be taught of God to love one another, before it will be safe to bring them together on any very extended scale. We may regret that mighty seas, and towering mountains, and immense forests and deserts, together with the confusion of tongues, rendering men unable to understand one another's speech, should oppose obstructions to that ready intercourse between distant parts which may appear to us desirable; but it is, no doubt, far better, on the whole, that it should be so. In proportion as men become imbued with the spirit of righteousness, facilities of intercourse will be multiplied.

The monuments of the heathen nations of antiquity show, that they had attained a surprising skill in the arts. In Greece, and Rome, and Egypt, science achieved some splendid triumphs. But none of their achievements appear to have contributed any thing to facilities of intercourse between distant countries. A wisely controlling Providence ordered, that those whose ruling passion was conquest, and whose selfishness was not modified by religion, should obtain access to one another with difficulty. Pyramids, towering columns and temples of vast extent, show that they were not destitute of inventive powers; but had their ingenuity taught them to build steamships, and to bind together distant provinces by railroads, it might, in the then existing state of things, have been a calamity rather than a blessing. Had the Roman government possessed the modern facilities for bringing together, and concentrating, the powers of its distant provinces, or been able, by a fleet of steamships, to pour down its legions of merciless troops, at short warning, upon a neighboring empire, it had been a still more terrible scourge to the world than it was.

When the kingdom of Christ shall have become extended over the earth, as we know from the sure word of prophecy that it will be, the obstructions to intercourse, which now exist, will doubtless be lessened to a most amazing extent. The elevation of the valleys, and the leveling of the mountains, the straightening of the crooked, and the smoothing of the rough places, as foretold, may receive a more literal accomplishment than people have generally dreamed of. But that will be a time, when people will come together, not to oppress and injure, but to seek each other's welfare. In the rapidly increasing means of intercourse, of the present day, do we not see tokens of the approach of the universal reign of Christ? T. B. B.

The Hudson River Railroad.—The Independent has rather taken the lead in anathematizing the Directors of the Hudson River Railroad for running Sunday trains. For several weeks it rung all imaginable changes upon the various texts of Scripture which relate to the Sabbath—now endeavoring to prove that running cars on Sunday is a breach of the Fourth Commandment, which forbids labor on the seventh day, or Saturday; then labboring to produce a conviction that it is good policy to rest on Sunday, by quoting all the passages of Scripture which contain promises to those who keep the Sabbath from polluting it; and finally threatening those who desecrate the Sunday with all the curses which the word of God pronounces upon those who neglect the Sabbath. Last week it contained an article setting forth the danger of cars on that road being thrown into the river by the breaking of a rail or the giving way of a wheel. The concluding sentences of the article not only furnish an illustration of the old maxim that 'drowning men catch at straws,' but show in what a state of uncertainty they are left who attempt to frighten men into the observance of the Sunday by quoting texts of Scripture which were written with exclusive reference to the Saturday:—

> "This Road is the last one in the country, too, that ought to run its trains on the Sabbath. Whether there be 'special providences' or not, the habit of directly disobeying one of God's commands is an immensely bad habit for a road that has fully enough risks about it, as most carefully managed."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Illustrations of Sunday-keeping—The Elections—Affairs at Rome—Reformed Episcopacy—Tests in Scotland, &c.

Glasgow, July 16, 1852.

The most recent note we have read of Royal Sunday sanctification, is that of her Most Catholic Majesty, the Queen of Spain. "On Sunday, the 4th of July, her Majesty took the infant Princess to a bull-fight, when fourteen bulls were baited to death; but as fewer horses were killed than bulls, the sport was considered to be of an indifferent character."—A fortnight previously, Sunday having been the anniversary of our own Queen's accession to the throne, the Tower and Park guns fired a royal salute in the afternoon, in honor of the event.—And last Sunday, in the Presbyterian town of Belfast, in the keen contest of the election of Members of Parliament, the friends and supporters of one of the candidates, to the number of several hundreds, met at 6 o'clock in the evening, to make and to hear political speeches. The Sunday previous, the fineness of the weather in London, we are informed, "induced many thousands of persons to make trips by rail and water, and on the Blackwall Railway at night there was a complete congestion of passengers returning to London. The carriages and general arrangements were utterly unfitted to cope with the thousands of passengers clamoring for conveyance. There were crowding, fighting, tearing of clothes, and fainting, among the people at Blackwall station; and at Stepney junction, the confusion was terrible, the station there being much too small for the Sunday traffic."

Our elections have, on the whole, passed over, so far as completed, with little disorder. Dublin, Cork, Belfast, Limerick, and Paisley, are exceptions; very serious riots having occurred in these towns. We abstain from comment on the political result; but the Nonconformist gives a list of 33 Members, already returned, "pledged by profession or position to the advocacy and maintenance of those principles, which, when embodied in law, will effect an entire separation of the Church from the State." [I note here, that the correct return return for Rochdale was 529 for Mr. E. Mial, the Editor of the Nonconformist, against 375 for Sir Alexander Ramsay, the opposing candidate.]

Yesterday the Daily News contained a letter from its correspondent in Rome, which states that the Rev Mr. Hastings, Chaplain to the American legation, is about to return home. He has not been officiating of late, the chapel in which he preached having been ordered to be closed. He has not even succeeded in recovering several cases of Bibles and Protestant books, which were confiscated by the Papal authorities, and have been in possession of the custom-house officers nearly three years. Mr. H. is to be succeeded by the Rev. Mr. Baird, son of Dr. Baird. The Pope is said to be threatened with dropsy, and that the state of his health gives his physicians great uneasiness. Every effort, however, has been made to conceal from the public the state of danger in which he is. But though he were removed, what hope of improvement for Italy, or for the British or American subjects of this Italian prince, of any change in the apostate system of superstition of which he is the head? The conclave can furnish a successor in no respect better than the present Pontiff, and could by its counsel prevent improvement, were it meditated or purposed. Connected with the wickedness of the system, we may mention that it has been asserted by the Belfast Chronicle, that Dr. Newman, who was lately convicted of libeling Achilli, spent the early portion of his life in the College de Propaganda Fide at Rome. It is difficult to believe that this can be true, without having been previously mentioned; but, if substantiated, it would suggest many reflections as to the motives which originated the Tracts for the Times, and other agencies by which reverence for the traditions of men have led back to Rome not a few of the descendants of those who had but imperfectly earned for themselves the title of Reformed. The influence of that Rome-ward movement is still being witnessed. Miss Fraser, who has been for some time head of Dr. Pusey's Protestant nuns at Oxford, has now joined the Church of Rome. She is cousin to the Scottish Episcopal Bishop of Brechin, and a relative of Lord Forbes, the founder of St. Ninians Cathedral at Perth.

Some months ago we chronicled an experiment towards reform, in a small way, of the English Episcopal services, by the Rev. Mr. Millar of St. Martin's Church; and when we say that the experiment has been conducted with the sanction of his Bishop, it will readily be conceived, that it can embrace a reform of nothing essential. He has contrived to shorten the morning service, and this is approved, especially by invalids, the aged, and children. He has afforded to servants and others opportunities of occasional attendance at all parts of service, by varying the order of the respective portions alternately; and he administers the Lord's Supper, once a month, in the evening, with the same design—and all this reformation he has accomplished; as he vaunted to his parishioners the other day, without coming into "direct collision with the rubrics," the difficulty of which he declares to have been very great. Had this feat been found impossible, then, of course, any advantages these arrangements might promise must have been sacrificed in order that the rubrics might remain inviolate. With such avowals, what hope can be cherished of any return to the word and ordinances of the living God, until the antagonistic idols are broken in pieces?

Mr. McDougal, lately appointed to the Chair of Logic in the University of Edinburgh, as successor to Professor Wilson, who has retired, is a Free Churchman. His appointment is therefore obnoxious to the Established Church. They had therefore determined to enforce the Tests, which it was known he could not take. In these circumstances, the Town Council, who assert that they have an absolute right to present, simply appointed a Committee of their number to introduce him, as the appointed Professor, to the Senatus Academicus. On this having been done, that body protested, and urged that the presentation should be received back until the legal question of right should be decided. This the Committee refused to do, declaring that it had been duly served, and they accordingly intimated to the new Professor, that the lecture room of his predecessor would be allocated to him for the delivery of his Lectures in the ensuing session. The majority of the Town Council are Dissenters, and some months ago they resolved, by a majority of 15 against 14, even to memorialize her Majesty to direct her Ministers to bring a Bill into Parliament to separate the connection between the Church and the State, and to apply the ecclesiastical revenues to civil purposes.

We have had a week of thunder storms, all over the country, from which, and from the excessive heat, a considerable number of deaths have resulted. The strokes of the sun have been chiefly, though not exclusively, in London. Death and damage through the floods from the thunder storms have been principally in Scotland. In the neighborhood of Edinburgh, two men in a field were struck dead by the electric fluid. At Kilmarnock immense destruction of property has been occasioned by the flooding of the river, swollen in the night, principally, it is supposed, by the bursting of a water spout. J. A. BEGG.

BOOKS—PERIODICALS.

As we look back through the disappearing twilight of other and fast-receding ages, we see here and there a steady light. All else is doubt and darkness. These lights are Books, illuminated by the torch of thought, and placed at that point in the world's history in which their Authors respectively lived; thence to send their rays down through the long vista of years, as they should successively loom up in the future. What would we know of the past, if it were not for these lights? Comparatively nothing. Thanks to those who have lived and thought before us, for their kindness in leaving us such aids. Thanks, also, that these lights were not left unguarded, to flicker out a brief existence, amid the gusts and tempests of all-destroying time, but that the fast expiring flame has been, from time to time, rekindled by other hands—not only rekindled, but also collected from scattered positions into central and more secure locations.

The first public collection, or library, is said to have been made at Athens, 550 B. C. This library consisted of the poems of Homer, which were then collected from detached fragments, and combined and arranged in their present form. The most important library of antiquity was that founded by the Ptolemies at Alexandria, which, in its most prosperous days, is said to have contained not less than 700,000 volumes. It is reported to have been destroyed by Calif Omar, who said, "If the books agree with the Koran, they are unnecessary; if they do not, they should be destroyed; therefore, let them be burned." The first public library at Rome, was one founded in the days of Augustus, on the Aventine Mount. In the first part of the fourteenth century, the library of Oxford consisted of a few tracts, and the royal library of France of only ten volumes. The largest library in the world at the present day is the National Library of Paris, numbering about 880,000 volumes, 80,000 of which are manuscripts. The largest one in the United States is that of Harvard University, containing about 80,000 volumes.

The books composing ancient libraries were very costly, being written on bark or parchment. The method of making a book was by joining the prepared bark or parchment in a continuous piece, and then rolling it on a staff, whence it was called a volume. An author had a separate staff, roll, or volume, for each grand division of his work. This should be borne in mind when reading of the great number of volumes in some of their libraries.

The Greeks and Romans at first wrote their books on the thin bark of the Egyptian papyrus. This plant was called by the Egyptians byblos, whence the Greeks derived biblion, a book, from which we obtain our word Bible. At length the Egyptians prohibited the exportation of the papyrus, and other nations commenced the use of prepared skins of animals, called parchment. This was the principal material used until about the eleventh century, when the invention of preparing paper from linen and cotton rags was made. This was followed, in the fifteenth century, by the art of printing. The effect of this invention was like the rising of the sun upon a moonlight scene. It gave new life to the arts and sciences. Inventions and discoveries were greatly multiplied. Religion found here an ever-increasing medium for the transmission of truth. Knowledge was no longer to be confined to the rich, and those privileged with an attendance at seats of learning; but henceforth, like light and air, it was to be comparatively free, and sufficient for all.

In the seventeenth century, Periodical Literature sprung up. By degrees, gazettes, newspapers, magazines, and reviews, have made their appearance—all designed to meet the demands of society. Books are adapted to the permanent and systematic forms of literature—periodicals meet the ever-recurring, ever-changing demands made by the passing events of a busy, moving world. They chronicle the new and varied facts and ideas that appear in quick succession. They pick up the bright and burning thoughts that are continually flashing forth from the every-day contact of mind, and scatter them throughout the various departments of society, to meet its intellectual wants. Thus the ideas that are moving one portion of society are diffused through other portions, to move and enlighten them. Periodicals are great awakeners and equalizers of thought. They seem to be adapted to the genius of business and progress. They fill up the spare moments of industry, and infuse the energizing and guiding influence of intelligence into all of the activities of life. That they are thus adapted to the wants of society, is manifest from the avidity with which the various classes of periodicals—good, bad, and indifferent—are received and read, and the influence such reading has upon the opinions, conversation, and actions of all classes of individuals. Doubtless the editor of a well-conducted and well-patronized periodical possesses an influence second to but few of any profession or calling. Allegan.

THE CASE OF W. L. CHAPLIN.

The following letter from Gerrit Smith shows in part where the money came from to meet the exorbitant bail required and forfeited in the case of Wm. L. Chaplin, Esq.

William R. Smith—My Dear Sir: The unhappy Chaplin affair is again upon us. In addition to several thousand dollars expended in agencies, lawyers' fees, &c., &c., we paid $19,000 to indemnify Mr. Chaplin's bail in Maryland. We are now called to pay $6,000 to indemnify his bail in Washington.

If the men in Washington who, with such rare kindness and generosity, became Mr. Chaplin's bail, are suffered to lose by that kindness and generosity, it will be very disgraceful to the Abolitionists.

Considering that Mr. Chaplin visited Washington contrary to my advice, and that I paid in the Maryland case about $10,000, I feel that I suffered much more than my full share of the loss in that case. The Washington case is now to be provided for. I am willing to lose $2,000 in it; and hence, I have, this evening, enclosed my draft for that sum to D. A. Hall, who is one of the bail. I trust that the friends of justice will promptly make up the remaining $4,000.

I am robbed of these $12,000. I have been robbed of a great deal from time to time, in the sums which I have felt myself morally compelled to pay in the purchase of the liberty of slaves. I greatly needed all this money to expend in other directions—for the cries of our wronged humanity come up from numerous directions. Nevertheless, I am consoled by the reflection, that I was better off without this money than they, who got it from me, were with it. The robbed may feel very sore under his losses; but still he is better off than the robber.

With great regard, your friend,

Peterboro, June 16, 1852. GERRIT SMITH.

More Jerusalem Missionaries.—P. D. Dickson, and another person, sailed from Boston, July 22, by the bark L. & A. Hobart, Capt. Hodgdon, to join the "Agricultural Mission in Palestine." (Agent of the vessel, N. F. Frothingham, 25 Long Wharf, Boston; price of passage to Smyrna, $75.) In a letter to J. L. Boyd, written the day before sailing, P. D. Dickson says:—

> "I feel under great obligations to you, dear brother, for your kindness and willingness to assist me by information, &c.; still more so to my Heavenly Father, who seems remarkably to have guided me in years past for this object, and now has apparently directed every small incident in my favor—more so than I ever saw before—and has opened my way; and I have now means to go with, blessed be his name! Can I doubt, brother, as to what is duty! Since I first thought of going, there has not been a doubt or misgiving thought, but that it was right, and my way would be fully opened. So it has proved. Remember us at our common Father's throne, when we are on our way; and that God may bring you and all his chosen people, together with the saved of the nations, to his holy mountain, and everlasting kingdom, shall be my daily prayer."

The Advent Review and Sabbath Herald.—Under this title a company of Adventists, who keep the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, issue a semi-monthly sheet from Rochester, N. Y. Joseph Bates, J. N. Andrews, and Joseph Baker, are the Publishing Committee; James White is the Editor. "Terms, gratis; it is expected that all the friends of the cause will aid in its publication, as the Lord hath prospered them." A recent number says:—

> "Where there were but about a score of Advent brethren in the state of New York that observed the Sabbath three years since, there are now probably near one thousand, and several hundred in the Western States, where there were none, to our knowledge. The increase in some portions of New England has been greater than in this State; and in the Canadas, where there were none in 1849, there are a goodly number that 'delight' in the whole 'law of God.'"

The Colored People of Maryland.—A Convention of Delegates from the Free Colored People of Maryland was held at Baltimore last week, to consult an Emigration. After considerable discussion, they adopted a series resolutions, in which they declare all men born free and equal, and entitled to the pursuit of happiness; acknowledge the efforts of their white friends for their elevation, but declare that those efforts have been unavaling, and that their condition, both socially and politically, is worse now than twenty years ago. In the face of constantly increasing emigration and growing prejudices against them, they declare there is no present prospect of their being placed on a footing of equality in this country. They take decided ground in favor of emigration, and, without recommending, are favorable to Liberia. They also propose measures for the education and elevation of colored people, and the obtaining of proper information in relation to Liberia, the West Indies, and other points of emigration.

The British Protestant Alliance.—It seems from English papers that this organization finds something to do worthy of attention. It interfered with effect for the liberation of Dr. Marriatt; it has taken part with the Free Church of Scotland in representing the case of the missionaries expelled from Hungary; it has respectfully memorialized the king of Prussia on the persecutions of German Baptists in his states. When a British commissioner, after the fall of Rosas, was to be sent to Buenos Ayres and Paraguay, the Alliance presented to the British Government a memorial, praying that stipulation might be required for religious liberty in the vast provinces of the Rio de la Plata. They also sent a communication to the Ministers of the United States, desiring that the same objects might be considered in any treaties that should be effected by the expedition of the United States to Japan.

Catholics in the United States.—The Freeman's Journal, a Roman Catholic paper in New York, speaking respecting the great numbers who turn away from Romanism in the rural districts among us, remote from Roman Catholic churches and priests, says:—

> "We know of a Catholic couple who settled in an adjoining county, some seventy or eighty years ago; their descendants are very numerous, but there is not a Catholic now among them! In another county, an old Irish couple are still living, and still preferring the Catholic Faith, whose children, grandchildren, and great grandchildren are something over one hundred souls; yet there are but two or three Catholics among them!"

Presbyterian Missions.—The 15th Annual Report of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has been issued, from which we learn that the Board has received $117,882, from 1286 contributing churches, and has 7 missions, employing 53 ordained ministers and 86 lay teachers and assistants, male and female—all Americans. The State of New York contributes about 23 per cent.; Pennsylvania, 21 per cent.; Ohio, 6 per cent.; New Jersey, Kentucky, and South Carolina, each about 5 per cent; Tennessee and Mississippi, each about 4 per cent.; Virginia, Maryland and Alabama, each about 3 per cent. of of the funds of the Board.

A Chinese River.—Yang-stze-kiang, the river on which Shanghae is situated, and one of the largest in Asia, is navigable for junks of large size more than three thousand miles; and upon this river is situated Suchan, with a population of more than two millions, Nankin, with its four millions, and other large cities, besides a great number of smaller ones, all ready to pour the wealth of the country around them, through Shanghae, into the bosom of "the wide world." Six thousand junks of all sizes arrive, even now, annually down this river. How glorious the opportunity of penetrating the heart of China with the blessed gospel!

Our Anniversaries—Reduced Fare.—To persons desirous of attending the Seventh-day Baptist Anniversaries at Plainfield, N. J., the New York and Erie Railroad Company will furnish excursion tickets, entitling the holder to come to New York and return for one fare any time between the 5th and 25th of September. Tickets for persons in Allegany County will be sent to the Alfred and Friendship Stations about the first of September. For those who wish to start from other stations on the line, tickets will be provided in case they notify Geo. B. Utter of their wish, previous to the 30th of August.

Pedobaptists turning Baptists.—Rev. J. L. Waller, editor of the Western Recorder, says that "within the past eighteen months, at least one hundred and fifty clergymen, connected with the different denominations holding to infant sprinkling and opposed to baptism by immersion, have renounced their error and united with Baptist churches."

The Mountain Cove Journal and Spiritual Harbinger, is the title of a "spirit-rapping" weekly paper just started at Mountain Cove, Fayette Co., Va., by James L. Scott and Thomas L. Harris. Its selections are very good, but its original matter seems adapted for the most part to persons of a different "sphere" from that in which we move. Witness the following, which is the beginning of the first article:—

> The Being of GOD is Life Infinite, triunely operative in Uncreated Good, whose emanat- principles are triune, in their circles, degrees and periods of disclosure.
>
> The infinite principle of Supreme Good is known, through the DIVINE PROCEDURE, to all holy spirits as Love; unfolding the moral-intellectual principle known to all pure intelligences as Truth, or Wisdom of Love; and thence unfolding the disclosive principle, known to all the obedient inhabitants of the creation as Energy of Love.
>
> These comprehensively dominate; and descend, in order of disclosive embodiment infinite in Glory thro' their Dome of triune Manifestation.

Death of a venerable Clergyean.—We are called to record the decease of Rev. James Spencer Cannon, D. D., Professor of Metaphysics in Rutger's College, New Brunswick, and of Pastoral Theology and Ecclesiastical History in the Seminary at that place, and also for many years a Trustee of the College. He was born in the year 1776, in the Island of Curacoa, W. I., came to this country at the age of ten years, and attended the celebrated school of Peter Wilson, LL. D., at Hackensack, Bergen County, N. J., where he married his wife, lately deceased, who was the daughter of Judge Brevoort, of that place. He was settled for twenty years in the Reformed Dutch Congregation at Six Mile Run, Somerset County, and since 1826 has been connected with the institutions at New Brunswick, in the capacities above mentioned.

Minutes.—The Minutes of the Central and Western Associations were printed and put up in parcels for the several churches two weeks ago. Those for the Western Association may be found at Alfred Center. Those for the Central Association will be sent to Adams Center, Verona, Leonardsville, and DeRuyter, at which places the churches in those several neighborhoods may find their respective parcels.

Baptists in Germany.—Rev. Mr. Brown, of Pennsylvania, is reported to have said, that one hundred years ago there were not so many Baptists in America as there are now in Germany, and 50 years hence will see a greater proportional advance in Germany than the same time has seen in America.

Mission at Port de Paix, Hayti.—Rev. Mr. Niel, a missionary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, proposes soon to establish a new mission at Port de Paix, Hayti, where Bro. Wm. M. Jones was stationed for a while.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JULY 26.

The Senate was occupied a large part of the day with the Mexican Boundary affairs, particularly the charges filed against Mr. Bartlett, the Commissioner. The House bill, for the relief of James C. Watson, of Georgia, being compensation for certain slaves taken by the Creek warriors engaged in the service of the United States during the Seminole war, was taken up, and after an ineffectual attempt to get it laid over, so as to allow Mr. Chase of Ohio (who was absent) to speak upon it, the bill was considered, read three times, and passed without one word being said upon it.

The House passed a joint resolution, that from and after the present session the Congressional Globe and Appendix, containing the laws and debates in Congress, shall pass in the mails free of postage. It then passed a resolution, to distribute among the new members, such books as have been furnished to all the old members in the last thirty-four Congresses. The remainder of the day was spent upon the River and Harbor Bill.

THIRD-DAY, JULY 27.

In the Senate, after some resolutions of inquiry, Mr. Sumner offered a resolution directing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing the Fugitive Slave Law. The bill to appropriate money for a Ship Canal around the Falls of St. Mary was discussed and postponed. Discussion ensued upon the Boundary Commission business, and the Indian Appropriation bill; and then the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the Florida and Alabama Railroad bill was lost by the casting vote of the Speaker. The River and Harbor bill was then taken up, and occupied the remainder of the session.

FOURTH-DAY, JULY 28.

The Senate passed a right of way bill for all rail, plank, and other roads through the public lands. Mr. Sumner was choked off in his anticipated speech in favor of repealing the Fugitive Slave Law, by the refusal of the Senate to suspend the rules to allow him to offer a resolution.

The House spent the whole day in considering the River and Harbor Bill.

FIFTH-DAY, JULY 29.

In the Senate, the bill to authorize an exploration and reconnoissance of the courses of navigation used by whalers in the regions of of Behring's Straits; also of such parts of the China Seas, Straits of Gasper and Java Sea as lie directly in the route of vessels proceeding to and from China, was taken up, and Mr. Seward made a long speech in favor of it. Several resolutions of inquiry in regard to California matters were adopted.

In the House, there was a struggle on the River and Harbor Bill. The Committee disposed of a large number of amendments, by voting them down, and at 6 P. M. the bill was reported to the House. After trying to lay it on the table, to adjourn, &c., the bill was finally committed to the Committee on Commerce.

SIXTH-DAY, JULY 30.

In the Senate, the House resolution to allow The Congressional Globe to go through the mails free of postage was passed, after a brief debate. The River and Harbor bill (just passed by the House) was received, read by its title, and laid over. Adjourned to Second-day.

In the House, Mr. Sackett asked leave to introduce a resolution making it a capital offense for officers of steamboats to engage in racing; leave was not granted. The River and Harbor Bill was taken up, and several amendments were disposed of under the previous question. The bill was then finally passed by a vote of 103 Yeas to 75 Nays. After some work on private bills, the House adjourned.

SABBATH-DAY, JULY 31.

The Public Printing occupied the attention of the House all day, and was finally disposed of by adopting the bill reported by the Committee. Its provisions are: First, to repeal the present contract system. Secondly, the election of a Public Printer, who is to execute the printing, not only for Congress, but for the Executive Departments. Thirdly, the appointment of a Superintendent of Printing, to stand between the Public Printer and the Government, to see that work is neatly and expeditiously done, and to exercise a general supervision over the subject.

General Intelligence.

Steamboat Burnt—70 Lives Lost.

On Fourth-day, July 28, the Hudson River was the scene of one of those awful disasters—wholesale murders, they ought to be called—for which this country is noted. On the morning of that day, the steamer Henry Clay left Albany for New York at 7 o'clock, having on board some 300 passengers. The Armenia left the same place a few minutes afterward. On the passage down the river there was, as witnesses testify, a continuous strife or race between the two boats. At one time the Clay crowded the Armenia almost upon the western shore, and forced her to drop astern, &c. The passengers on board the Clay finally became greatly alarmed on account of the racing, and a number of ladies were crying and running about the cabin, as if sensible that some catastrophe was impending. However, no accident occurred until a few minutes after the Henry Clay passed Yonkers, when it was discovered that the wood-work near the boilers and flues was on fire. The pilot saw that no time was to be lost, and headed the boat for for the eastern shore. The river here is nearly two miles wide, and the boat in her regular course would have been a mile and a half from the east bank. Before reaching the shore, the flames had spread so as almost to prevent communication between the fore and aft parts of the boat. At about three or a quarter past three o'clock, the boat came ashore, lying at right angles with the river, and the bow driving up some twenty-five feet on dry land. The shock overthrew the smokepipe, displaced every thing moveable, and added not a little to the spreading of the flames. While the bow was high and dry, the greater portion of the boat, and unfortunately that which held nearly all the passengers, was in deep water. The passengers immediately began to jump overboard. Those on the bow got off safely, and began to help the others. A board fence, near by, was instantly stripped, and the boards thrown into the water. By great exertion, a large majority of the passengers got ashore, some scorched, nearly all with loss of clothes, trunks, &c. But the rapid spread of the fire, which forced the passengers at the stern overboard, was the cause of the loss of a large number of lives.

The scene was one of the most terrible character. Mothers, with their clothes in flames, trying to save some dear child; children struggling in the waves without a hand to help them; husbands and wives drowning together rather than separate, and the remorseless fire rapidly destroying the last standing-place of the helpless victims.

Up to Monday morning 70 bodies had been recovered, of which 63 were recognized by their friends. The following list comprises all the recognized:—

1. Mrs. Emily Bartlett, Poughkeepsie.
2. Eliza C. Barcroft, Philadelphia, aged 55.
3. Mrs. Maria Bailey, West Point, aged 40.
4. Miss M. W. Bailey, West Point, aged 16.
5. Mrs. H. M. Colby, Montpelier, Vt., 32.
6. Miss Mary Cooper, West Farms.
7. Mrs. Margaret Chatillon, New York.
8. Helena Chatillon, aged 1 year.
9. Catrina Chatillon, aged 3 years.
10. Martha Channell, child, New York.
11. A. J. Downing, Newburg, aged 37.
12. Mrs. Sarah Dennison, West Farms.
13. Mrs. A. Nennell, Wilmington, N. C.
14. Miss A. Holmes, No. 96 Allen-st. N. Y.
15. Miss Elizabeth Hillman, Troy, aged 68.
16. John Hosier, New York, aged 18.
17. Miss Julie Hoy, aged 18 years, Newburg.
18. J. B. M. Hanford, New York, 17 months.
19. Christopher B. Hill, colored, N. Y., 15.
20. C. Johnson, Poughkeepsie, colored.
21. George K. Marcher, New York, 38.
22. Mary Jane Murray, Chicago, 30.
23. John, (her son,) 12 months.
24. Elizabeth Pearsall, East Brooklyn, 15.
25. Phebe Jordon, of Jordanville, Ulster Co.
26. Wm. M. Ray, Cincinnati, Ohio.
27. Abby Ann Ray, his wife.
28. Caroline Ray, their child.
29. Mrs. Mary Ann Robinson, New York.
30. Miss Isabella Robinson, New York.
31. Mrs. Schatelas, New York, 25.
32. John J. Speed, Baltimore, 55.
33. J. J. Schoonmaker, Ulster Co.
34. John K. Simons, child, New York.
35. R. A. Sands, child, New York.
36. Elizabeth Shankey, New York.
37. George Thielman, Poughkeepsie.
38. M. Thompson, Lancaster, Pa., 10 years.
39. E. Thompson, Lancaster, Pa., 6 weeks.
40. Mary, their nurse.
41. Elmore Thompson's child, New York.
42. George F. Whitlock, New York.
43. Miss Cornelia Witlock, New York.
44. Miss Wadsworth, North Carolina.
45. Stephen Allen, New York.
46. Abraham Crist, Brooklyn.
47. Miss C. Dewint, Fishkill.
48. Mrs. Joanna Hanford, New-York.
49. and 50. Two Misses Kingsley, W. Point.
51. The mother of G. K. Marcher, aged 57.
52. Mrs. McDaniel, Rutland, Vt.
53. Mrs. Ostrander, New York.
54. Mrs. Schatelans, 2 children, 1 and 3 yrs.
55. Mason Seal, New York, 16.
56. Isaac D. Sands, New York.
57. Isaac Sherman, New York.
58. Mrs. Simons, New York.
59. Mrs. Thompson, Lancaster, Pa.
60. Mrs. Truax and child.
61. Catharine Wetmore, New York.
62. Betty Williams, Poughkeepsie, colored.
63. E. McAnally, of Ireland, living in N. Y.

From the above list it will be seen that several distinguished persons perished by this calamity. Stephen Allen had long been connected with the public institutions of New York, and was much esteemed. A. J. Downing, of Newburg, was the Horticulturist, who has probably done more than any other man to introduce ideas of taste and beauty into suburban and rustic gardening. J. J. Speed, of Baltimore, and Abraham Crist, of Brooklyn, were distinguished members of the legal profession.

The daily papers furnish many incidents connected with this calamity which are exceedingly touching.

Many passengers jumped from the steamer long before she beached, and bodies were found strewed along the shore for a mile above the wreck.

A touching scene was witnessed between a mother and her son, a young lad of 12 years. The youth was a good swimmer, and succeeded in saving his mother from death; taking her with him, he jumped from the stern of the burning boat, and made his way courageously to the shore. Unhappily, however, two young sisters of the lad were lost.

A noble Newfoundland dog, named "Neptune," belonging to the neighborhood, rushed into the water, and seized a young child that was drowning, by the dress, near the shoulders, and bore it safely to the shore. He returned and approached a woman, to assist in the same way, but she was so frightened that the dog had to be called off, and he was thus deprived of the opportunity of extending that relief to the sufferers, to which his instincts and his noble nature prompted him.

European News.

The steamship Europa, with Liverpool dates to July 17, arrived at New York July 29.

There is little of interest besides election news. In Ireland, religious jealousies have been dragged prominently into the election contest, and riots of a serious character have occurred at Cork, Belfast, Limerick, and elsewhere. The war cry on either side was "Protestant" and "Catholic," and to this tune heads were cracked, windows broken, and people shot down in the streets. At Belfast three persons were shot, one mortally.

A railway accident had occurred to an excursion train at Burnley; one or two lives were lost.

At Newport, Wales, while a Convocation of Mormons was in session, the roof of the building fell in. Singularly enough, no lives were lost. The Mormons attribute their escape to a miracle.

During the week preceding the sailing of the steamer, various parts of France were visited by severe thunder-storms. A singular story obtained credence in Paris, to the effect that Arago, the Astronomer, had prophesied that the most terrific storm that had occurred was about to break over the city. To such an extent did the wonder grow, that the Day of Judgment was definitely set down for Thursday.

A wooden bridge at the Baths at the Quat d'Orleans, Ile St. Louis, broke down on Monday, and precipitated a hundred persons into the Seine. Six were drowned.

Letters from Kossuth have been lately seized in different parts of Italy, and forwarded to the Governor of Lombardy. Upon receipt of them, twelve persons were arrested at Pavia, fifteen at Milan, and a number of others at Brescia, Mahtua, and Verona.

Calcutta, with the South and East of Bengal, was visited on the 14th and 15th of May by a violent hurricane, which did immense damage to property. In Calcutta alone 2,657 thatched houses, 526 tiled buildings, and 40 large houses were destroyed. Eight inches of rain fell in a few hours at Dumdum.

More hard fighting in the East is reported. The town of Bessein had been carried by the British by assault, with the loss of only thirty-four men. On the 19th, four steamers arrived before the town, and proceeded to land troops, which were immediately fired on by the Burmese from behind their stockades. The principal defense of the place was mud fort, which was stormed without the aid of a large scaling-ladders, in fifty minutes from the first attack. A white man was plainly seen on the works during the engagement, exciting the artillery, but whether he was an European or an American could not be discerned. The Burmese stood both the fire from the ships and the hand-to-hand combat with great bravery, as is evidenced by the large number who were bayoneted at their guns. Their loss is estimated in the English bulletins at 800; but this is probably an exaggeration. No spoil of any value was found at Bessein. A garrison was left in the town, and the rest of the force returned to Rangoon.

In the north-west of India, Sir Colin Campbell, with a force of 4,000 men and ten guns, was engaged in some hard fighting with hill tribes. The locality of his operations is in the valley of the Swat River, the principal northern affluent of that of Cabul.

In Cabul Proper, there has been raging for some time a dispute between the son of a native chief, Yar Mahomed, backed by the Persians, and the Sirdars of Kandahar, backed by the celebrated Dost Mahomed. Reinforcements had been sent to the support of their respective allies, by Persia and by the Dost, but in the meantime the disputants had come into collision with forces numbering from 10,000 to 12,000 on either side. After a pitched battle of eight hours, the Kandahar force was defeated, with the loss of 2,000 men, and obliged to retreat by Kandahar.

A Sad Case.—On the 18th ult., Mr. Madden, of Olean, N. Y., started out on a hunting excursion. While hurryiug along in a cross-road, about two and a half miles from the village, he heard a rustling in the bushes near him, and on looking in the direction from which the noise came, perceived a slight motion of something, but what it was, he was unable to ascertain, on account of the bushes between it and himself. Thinking it might be a deer, and not waiting to ascertain to a certainty, for fear of losing him, he fired at the unknown object. His feelings can be better imagined than described, when, immediately after the report of his gun died away, a low groan was borne to his ears, and on hastening to the spot found that he had sent a human being from time to eternity. The person shot was a boy of about 14 years, the son of a widow Payne, of Olean.

Jane, the slave and murderess of Mrs. Winston and her child, at Richmond, declares that the act was committed by herself only, and that her husband had nothing to do with it. She further states that she thought Mr. and Mrs. W. had ill-treated her, and that she had been brooding over her bloody revenge for some time. The devil had such possession of her last Monday morning, that she believed she could have gone further than she did, if necessary. Mr. Winston is getting better from the wounds inflicted upon him, and will, no doubt, recover.

The experiment recently made at Stanhope, New Jersey, of making Iron from the Franklinite ore of that region, has terminated in a perfectly successful manner, Iron having been made of very superior quality, at the cost of ordinary Iron, and the per centage of Zinc contained in the ore saved, and by the same process converted into Paint. The New Jersey Zinc Company will no doubt take advantage of this invention, as by it they will be enabled, with comparatively small expense, to manufacture ten times the quantity of Zinc Paint at present made. The demand at present is in advance of the production.

SUMMARY.

Died, in West Brookfield, Mass., June 15, Mary Smith, wife of Capt. Israel Smith, aged 96. The remarkable and almost unprecedented fact of the history of this aged couple, he being 98, is, that they have lived together in holy wedlock for the space of 79 years, they having been married respectively, he at 18 and she at 16 years of age. They have had fourteen children, of whom only four now survive. Three years before the Declaration of Independence, in 1773, Israel and Mary stood up to be married in what is now Burrillsville, R. I.

The London News states that the French brig Pauline, homeward bound, with cargo of sugar from Porto Rico, on the 17th of June, was struck by a whale upon the bows, and so much damaged that she almost immediately filled and sunk. The captain and crew, consisting of ten men, and a passenger, succeeded in saving themselves in a boat, with a scanty supply of provisions, and on the fourth day were very fortunately rescued by the British brig Crusader, and landed safely at Cowes.

The farm of Captain Suydam, of Jamaica, L. I., is this season infested by millions of grasshopers, which, says the N. Y. Evening Post, have destroyed about three thousand heads of cabbages, together with a large amount of grass, corn and wheat. They attack the potatoes, if not housed as soon as dug up. The manner in which they destroyed the wheat, was by biting the straw about two inches below the head, which causes it to fall to the ground.

A merchant of Pittsburgh sued the Exchange Bank of that city, a few days since, for refusing to redeem a $5 note on that Bank, of which one-fifth part had been cut out. It was contended on the part of the Bank that by cutting from several in the same manner, a new note may be formed, and the Bank defrauded of the value of it. The Alderman, before whom the case was tried, decided that the prosecutor was entitled to only four dollars as the value of the note, and consequently rendered judgment in his favor to that amount.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer learns that a gentleman, residing in that city, was robbed of $200 a day or two since at (as he supposed) the Railroad Depot at Detroit. The money was in his coat pocket on the right breast. He did not miss it until on board the steamboat on his way to Cleveland, when, feeling for his "pile," he found that the pocket had been cut open on the outside, the roll of bills taken out, and a paper of tobacco put in its place.

Pardon Miller, an eminent jeweler of Providence, R. I., committed suicide on Tuesday afternoon by hanging himself. Mr. Miller was Deacon of the First Baptist Church, and universally known and respected in Providence as a most sincere and pious Christian. He was a man of property, and engaged largely in the manufacture of silver ware. The circumstances of his death leave no possible doubt that his mind was deranged at the time of his death.

William Bremer, who kept a store at Feyler's Corner, about two miles from Waldoboro' village, Maine, blew up his building about 5 o'clock on the morning of the 18th, by touching off a keg of gunpowder. The house was entirely demolished, and Bremer was found in a dying condition, but able to explain what he had done. He had paid about $150 in fines for selling ardent spirits, which preyed on his mind, and made him deranged.

One firm in Boston sold 1,700 barrels of rum within a week preceding Thursday, (the day the liquor law was to go into operation,) and another firm sold $3,000 of liquors on Wednesday, more than the same concern had sold in one day for forty years that it had been in the trade. The Yarmouth Register says there has not been so large a quantity of liquors in that town during the last ten years as there is at this time.

Mrs Margaret Freeland, of Syracuse, recently broke open the whisky shop of Emanuel Rosendale, and destroyed its contents, because he persevered, in defiance of her entreaties, to sell her husband whisky, which made said husband abuse his family most brutally. She was arrested and brought up for trial, but counter suits were brought against rummy for selling liquor unlawfully, the citizens employing counsel for Mrs. F. He withdrew his suit, paid the cost.

On the 26th, at Richmond, Va., a short time before Mr. Macfarland commenced his oration at the funeral ceremonies for Henry Clay, a serious accident occurred. Two artillerymen, named Eddins and Bohannan, ramming a cannon a little distance above the stand, near the Capitol, it discharged its load prematurely, and tore off the left hand of one of the men and a part of the other's right.

The steamer Alabama, Capt. Wells, from New Orleans, for New York, to which port she was coming for repairs, was totally wrecked on the night of the 12th ult., near the Riding Rocks, (Bahama Banks.) All exertions to get her off were unavailing. Mr. Fish, the owner, and family, together with 70 passengers, had arrived at Nassau, 19th July, all well.

Three blocks of California marble, ordered by the Legislature of that State for the Washington Testimonial Monument, were nearly ready for shipment at last accounts. One block is of grey marble, with fine black veins running through it; another is nearly black, and the third most beautifully variegated. They are each four feet in length, by twenty-two inches square.

P. B. Cahoon, of Renasha, Wis., has raised a specimen of pie-plant, the leaf of one of the stalks of which measures three feet and one inch across by three feet long, exclusive of the stem, which is thirteen inches long by seven inches in circumference. Another stem was about one and a half feet long by six inches in circumference.

The Committee of the New York Legislature, consisting of Senator Bartlett and the State Engineer, Mr. McAlpine, appointed to examine into the causes of Railroad accidents, have been attending to that duty for the last week or two, and have passed over the Hudson River, Harlem, New Haven, Erie, and other roads.

Mr. Fenner Buck, of Boonville, Oneida Co., N. Y., while engaged in lathing the upper room of a dwelling on the 29th, was struck by lightning and instantly killed. His son, who was at work near him, was stunned by the shock, but by the prompt application of water, was restored. The lightning followed down the chimney.

Rufus Porter, who is building a flying ship at Washington, in his semi-monthly report to the stockholders, says: "The fibrous material for tha float and saloon has beenall varnished, and the sewing and making up the float are now in progress, and we may have it ready for inflation in two weeks. The frame work of the saloon, and the longitudinal rods for the float, are ready to be set up. The engine and boilers are only waiting for the furnace."

Mr. Stephen Watkins, a respected citizen of Montgomery County, Md., committed suicide on Tuesday last, by cutting his throat with a razor. It is supposed he was laboring under an aberration of mind at the time, brought on by a fear of pecuniary embarrassment. He was in good circumstances, and had been married only nine months.

A controversy is going on between the Catholic journals as to whether tallow candles may be allowed instead of wax in the Church ritual. A writer in the Freeman's Journal holds that the poverty of a Church may justify it in using tallow candles, provided a few wax ones be used with them, though he doubts whether the tallow ones receive any part of the blessing bestowed on them altogether.

There was a great gathering of Whigs at at Niagara Falls, last week, to celebrate the anniversary of the battle of Lundy's Lane. Some estimates of the numbers present place them as high as 100,000; others as low as 20,000. The editor of the Tribune places it at 50,000, collected from every Free State, with delegations from Kentucky, Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia.

The Courier and Enquirer of Friday, July 30, learns that dispatches were received on Wednesday night from Mr. Webster, containing assurances that the fishery difficulties would be promptly and satisfactorily settled. The British pretensions, as generally understood, are disclaimed, and extend no further than to that portion of the fishing grounds where the British jurisdiction is undisputed.

DIED,

In Scott, N. Y., July 24th, Mrs. Tacy Burdick, consort of the late Perry Burdick, in the 84th year of her age. She was born in Newport, R. I., was a daughter of James Hubbard, and grand-daughter of Eld. John Maxson, and formerly wife of Edward S. Wells of Westerly, R. I. She embraced religion in early life, and united with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, and continned her membership there until her removal to Scott in 1829, when she transferred her membership to the Scott church, of which she was a worthy member until her death. She enjoyed an extensive acquaintance, and was justly esteemed for her kind and Christian deportment. The cause of Christ found in her a ready and efficient friend. "The memory of the just is blessed."

In Scott, N. Y., June 1st, 1852, Prudence Norton, wife of Horace Norton, aged 27 years. She moved with her husband to Racine, Wis., some two years since, and was taken with a lingering disease, so that there was no hope of her recovery. She had a desire to return to Scott, which she did but lived only about a week to see her friends, when she died at the residence of her father, James Frink. She said that her greatest anxiety to live was that she might do her duty in following the example of her Saviour in the ordinance of baptism.

At West Edmeston, N.Y., July 26th, Laura Maxson, daughter of Joshua Maxson, Esq., aged 30 years and 19 days. Miss Maxson professed religion in early life, and united with the 3d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield, with which she remained a worthy member until removed to join, as we trust, the church in heaven. "The righteous hath hope in his death."

In Plainfield, N.J., July 29, Catharine Van Denyne, aged 23 years. About four years since she obtained a hope in Christ, and gave evidence of pardoned sin, living at that time at New Market. After mature deliberation, she united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in that place, and continued a worthy member until removed by death.

In Hounsfield, N. Y., on the 7th of April, 1852, Zebren Deloss, son of Russell and Aurilla Spicer, aged one year and seven days. Also, on the 13th, Edwin Fayette, son of the same parents, aged 3 years, 4 months, and 6 days.

In New York, July 27th, of small pox, Horace T., only son of Wm. S. and Mary E. Rogers, aged 7 months and 14 days.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Ocean, the Plunderer and the Restorer.

The ocean eats into the shore,
Yet never gains one fathom more,
But, giving up whate'er it takes,
Enlarges coasts, and islands makes.
It plunders, yet it nought retains—
Earth has no loss, and sea no gains.
So 't is with wealth, if men would set
Against it all their toil and fret.
How what is won to-day, to-morrow
Pays back—and with its interest, sorrow.
Ocean and wealth both shift their grounds,
But cannot pass th' appointed bounds.

The United States Mint.

Since the enormous influx of gold from California, the United States Mint has become an object of more than common interest and attention, and the place is usually filled with visitors, watching the various processes which the metal goes through before it comes out a finished coin. The machinery and apparatus by which these are accomplished, are of the most complete and perfect character. The rooms in which the smelting, refining and alloying are done, are spacious apartments, in which a large number of workmen are employed. Heaps of the rich ores are to be seen lying around, as they were extracted from the mines, or gathered in dust from the sands of the mountain streams of California. Bars of pure metal, representing many thousands of dollars in value, are passing through the hands, which, like those of Midas, seem to turn what they touch into gold. The heat of this place is insufferable, fires glow with the intensity of those in a foundry, the men are as smutched and dust-begrimed as those in a smithery; there is a suffocating sensation of hot air, steam and perspiration penetrating the atmosphere, which is anything but pleasant to experience, when the thermometer is palpitating under a summer temperature. Crucibles are handled with iron tongs and cotton mittens, the metal is shaped into bars, and then reduced to the requisite fineness. All this takes place in one apartment. In another, there is a most beautiful steam engine, which drives the rolling and stamping machinery. This engine is of the most elegant workmanship, polished like a piece of cutlery, and works without the least perceptible jar. From this room the visitor walks into that where the rolling machines are at work, turning out the metal to the proper degree of thickness which each particular denomination of coin requires. In another apartment the coins are cut with a punch the desired size, and then stamped. The coins are placed, by a person seated at the machine, in a perpendicular tube, down which they descend, one at a time, being seized as they drop by a part of the machinery, which pushes the coin under the stamp, whence it falls under the machine into a glass-covered box. This part of the process used, in former years, to be performed by a press, which still remains in the building, worked by a lever and screw, requiring eight men to laboriously labor at it; now the process requires scarcely any manual labor but handling the pieces of coin. The rapidity with which the pieces are coined is surprising. Cents, Dollars, Eagles, Double Eagles, are turned out with equal facility, the process being the same in all. Some idea of the extensiveness of these operations, and of the metalliferous fecundity of the gold possessions of the United States, may be had, when it is stated that last month nearly three millions of pieces, gold, silver, and copper, were coined, and that nearly four millions in value are coined every month. In addition to the other attractions of the Mint, there is a most extensive cabinet of coins, ancient and modern, (Roman, Greek, Chinese, European,) which is one of the greatest of curiosities, and probably to be met with no where else in the country. French Improvements in Growing Wheat.

France occasionally furnishes us with some curious offshoots of her inventive genius. Amongst her recent schemes is one for "increasing the produce of autumn wheat," patented by Mr. D'Urcle, a farmer of Paris. The inventor grounds his discovery upon the fact—positively acertained "by study and repeated experiments"—that autumn wheat is not an annual, but biennial, like the beet root and carrot class, and he therefore proceeds to develop the alledged biennial properties by a novel plan of planting and treatment, for the increase of the produce. The ground is to be well manured, either before winter or at the beginning of spring, to receive the seed between the 20th of April and 10th of May, this time being chosen to prevent the chance of blossoming during the year. But the time of sowing may be advanced from year to year; for, if it were not for the present degeneracy of the plant, it might occur now in March. Each grain is sown separately, allowing it a large area of ground if the soil is rich, but diminishing according to its sterility. It is deposited in rows, in holes at regular distances, from nine and a half to twenty-three and a half inches asunder, in each direction; the holes in one row are opposite the spaces in the next. Each hole is to contain four or five grains, two and a half inches asunder. When the plants have attained a height of four inches, all but the finest one in each group are pulled up, and this single one is then left for the harvest of the succeeding year. This curious process is stated to increase the produce very greatly.

Great Land Case.

The great land question concerning the Alagon grants in Florida, has been decided in the United States District Court, held at St. Augustine, in favor of the United States, and against the claimants under the Duke of Alagon. The case involves the construction of the treaty with Spain, in 1819, and the powers of the Spanish King under the quasi Constitutional Government which then existed. In the treaty it was stipulated that the United States would recognize and treat as valid all grants of land made by the Spanish King previous to the treaty. During the pendancy of the negotiation, however, the King had made a grant of nearly all the lands not previously granted in Florida, to the Duke of Alagon, and when the treaty came to be ratified, our Minister, or we rather think Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State, protested against the validity of the Alagon grants, and obtained from the Spanish King, in the act of ratification, a disavowal of the grant. But a citizen of the United States had obtained an assignment of the grant, and he and his heirs have insisted upon its validity, and contested the question before Congress and in the Courts ever since. They deny the authority of the Spanish King to set aside a grant duly made, and insist that these rights are so vested that the United States are bound in law to confirm them.

The recent suit was brought in the nature of an ejectment, against a person holding under a title derived from the United States. The Court charged against the plaintiff, both as to the form of the suit and the merits of the claim. It ruled that a suit in ejectment would not lie, and charged further that by the Spanish law this was a grant upon conditions, and, the Duke of Alagon having failed to comply with these conditions, the grant had become void; that the sale of Hackley (the first American purchaser) was in violation of the Spanish law, and the lands became forfeited to the King; that the annulment of this grant by the King was a good annulment in Spain, and that the grant would not have been recognized by the Spanish tribunals, and by the treaty, no grants were good against the United States, except in so far as they would have been good against Spain. The Jury accordingly returned a verdict for defendant; and the plaintiffs excepted to the charge of the Court, carrying up the case, by writ of error, to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The lands in question cover more than half of the State of Florida, and the uncertainty of the titles has materially obstructed the settlement of that State. [New Orleans Picayune.

Battle of Waterloo.

In this great battle the French had 246 guns on the field; the English, 156; and the Prussians, 104. Total 506. The noise of these pieces exceeded everything of the kind that the oldest soldiers had ever heard, and made the very earth to shake for miles around the field. After the action, the gunners could hear nothing that was said to them. The guide pointed out a spot where, during the heat of the firing, one of the powder tumbrils exploded, threw the artillerymen into the air, and shook the horses to pieces. The echoes of the cannonade of this awful battle are said to have been heard on the southern borders of the British coast. Upward of 50,000 men fell in the strife; 20,000 on the side of the allies, and 30,000 on the side of the French. The losses of this day put Europe in mourning. England and France wept like mothers together. A visitor, who passed over the field on the following day, states that, as he approached it, the first thing that struck him at a distance was the quantity of caps and hats strewn over the ground. It appeared as if it had been covered with crows. The field itself seemed flooded with blood. The number of dead horses and men baffled computation. The peasantry employed in burying the dead generally stripped the bodies first, and thereby gained vast booty. The track over which the guard moved, and over which they fled, was still covered with their spoil, and marked by the traces of horses, the wheels of cannon, and the deeper furrows of bombs and shells. A thousand French lay dead on this spot; and the quantity of holsters, standard-holders, bridles, straps, and girths, denoted a fearful conflict of cavalry. The ground seemed quite cut to pieces with the struggling of the horses' feet. The well-known caps of the grenadiers of the French guard lay yet, in considerable numbers, with the rags of their uniforms, and pieces of tartan and black ostrich feathers—the plaids and plumes of Scotland.

Ragged Schools.

Ragged Schools, into which the vicious and beggar children, found in the streets of England and Scotland, are gathered and fed, and taught, have been, after several years experiment, found very effectual means of preventing pauperism and crime, and elevating the most degraded specimens of humanity. At a recent annual meeting of the friends of this enterprise in Edinburgh, statements were made of the most encouraging character. After an experience of five years, the result had exceeded the first expectations. In that time two hundred and sixteen children had graduated from the ragged schools in that city, into thriving occupations. These had been mere offscourings of the streets; but they had been taken out of vicious connections, had learned to read and write, and were growing up intelligent and industrious members of society. It has been estimated that every convicted thief costs the country fifteen hundred dollars; and that in saving these children from becoming thieves, the country has saved an expense of $324,000.

The children are employed four hours of the day in religious and secular education, four hours in labor, and four in taking amusement, food, etc. The industrial department yields a little profit after paying all its own expenses. The fact that the institution feeds and clothes the children, gives them all needed control over them. One speaker said, "that under the combined power of patience and porridge, a most remarkable effect is produced." They are taught thoroughly from the Scriptures, and though probably most of them are children of papists, they are in a way to throw off their papacy, with their badges of degradation. A Bear Story.

In Andover North Surplus, Oxford County, Maine, on Thursday, July 22, as Erastus Bean, aged twenty years, was haying in his field, accompanied by a boy of twelve, named Dunn, he looked up and saw near him a large black bear, of the white-faced breed, the most savage of the black variety. Having taken his gun with him to shoot patridges, he caught it up and fired at the brute, but with little effect, as the bear immediately began to close upon him. Bean fell back slowly, loading his gun the meantime, when, just as he had got his charge in, his heel caught against a twig, and he fell backwards, and Bruin leaped upon him. His situation was now a frightful one, but his coolness did not forsake him, and he immediately fired again, but with no visible effect. The bear at once went to work—seizing his left arm, biting through it, and lacerating it severely. While thus amusing himself, he was tearing with his fore-paws the clothes and scratching the flesh on the young man's breast. Having dropped his arm, he opened his huge mouth to make a pounce at his face. Then it was that the young man made the dash that saved his life. As the bear opened his jaws, Bean thrust his lacerated arm down the brute's throat as far as desperation would enabled him. There he had him! The bear could neither retreat nor advance—though the position of the besieged was any thing but agreeable.

Bean now called upon the lad to come and take from his pocket a jack-knife and open it. The boy marched up to the work boldly, but had to crowd the bear's head over a little to get at the pocket, the beast meantime not being at all easy with such a huge mouthful in his throat. Having got the knife, Bean, with his untrammeled hand, cut the bear's throat from ear to ear, killing him stone dead while he lay on his body! He then notified his friends, had his wounds dressed, and is now comfortable. The bear weighed nearly four hundred pounds. [Portland Argus, 26th.

Value of Green-Houses to Invalids.

Dr. A. H. Stephens, of Astoria, N. Y., long so eminent in his profession, furnishes the following interesting fact to the Horticulturist:

"Having for many years suffered from a pulmonary complaint, I am led to avail myself of your Journal, to offer some observations on a subject lying midway between our respective callings. Some ten or twelve years since, in visiting the green-house of Mr. Niblo, then my neighbor in Broadway, during the winter, I found the atmosphere exceedingly congenial. It abated my cough, rendering the expectoration loose and easy, softened the skin, and induced a comfortable state of feeling, approaching to exhilaration. Wishing to have such an atmosphere at command, I constructed a cold grapery, in which, whenever it has been convenient, I have passed the hours of reading and study. The climate of a cold green-house, in a sunny day of the winter or spring, is a Florida climate, and is entirely different from that of an artificially-heated atmosphere. I venture to recommend it under most circumstances to pulmonary invalids, in preference to the more expensive plan of removal to the South, involving, as it does, much discomfiture, interruption of business, hazardous exposure, and entire separation from friends."

High and Low Pressure.

The New York Mirror says:—When we speak of the high and low pressure steamers on the Western rivers, do not some of our readers ask, What is the meaning of high pressure? We imagine they do, and that they will thank us for answering the question. Those who know already, occupy themselves with other articles.

Attend, then, reader pupil. The steam engine is set in motion by the driving backward and forward of the piston in the cylinder, just as a cork might be driven in a tube, from one end to the other, and this is effected by the steam. The steam is let in below the piston, and drives it up, and is then let in above, and drives it down. Of course, when the piston has descended to the bottom of the cylinder, the steam which drives it down is in the way of its ascent. The cylinder, near the top, and the steam let in below, must force out the steam above.

But this cylinderful of steam, is to be driven out against the atmosphere. The whole inner surface of the cylinder is pressed by the atmosphere about fifteen pounds on every square inch. Now, if steam be let in below which does not exceed fifteen pounds to the square inch, the piston will not rise. We must have a pressure of steam greater than this, to produce motion at all. But if the steam above the piston can be suddenly cooled back into water, it will be put out of the way, and a vacuum will be formed in its place. There will be nothing to prevent the upward motion—every ounce of pressure below will be effective. The atmosphere itself, if allowed to enter below, would drive up the piston.

In the low-pressure engines, the steam which has driven the piston in one direction, is condensed into water, and taken entirely out of the way, before the piston returns. In these engines, if the steam let in gives a pressure of fifteen pounds to the inch within the cylinder, this will just balance the pressure of the atmosphere without, and the engine will move without any pressure on the boiler outward. It is only above this pressure that the strain on the boiler begins.

But in the high-pressure engines, there is no apparatus for condensing the steam. It is driven out, in the way described, against the atmosphere, and the first fifteen pounds of pressure on the boiler does nothing to move the engine. It is only above this that any thing is accomplished.

The engines of our locomotives, and our mills, shops, and factories generally, are high pressure. The condensing apparatus adds much to the expense, and requires much space. On all our eastern steamers, condensing or low pressure engines are used.

Perhaps this explanation will suffice. The manner of effecting the condensation of the steam, we will not now describe. The reader is satisfied, we trust, in regard to the peculiarity which gives the names high pressure and low pressure. The former are known by their puffing off a portion of steam, at every stroke, into the atmosphere.

Ladies' Waists.

Mrs. Swisshelm, in a savage article against the magazine fashion-plates, says: "We know women now, who are dying, dying by their own hands, and piously saying their prayers every day; and for their death the magazine publishers are accountable at the bar of the Eternal. They are murdering them as true as ever David slew Uriah by the sword of the Amalekites. No human agency can teach these victims of fashion-plate-mongers, that the long whalebones sticking down into their sides, the tight string tied round the small of the back, and weight of skirts dragging on them, are crushing their lives out, and driving them to their graves. They will not believe they are entailing misery and disease upon their children. But yet many of them do know it, and, with all their vaunted love to their offspring, would rather see their little ones suffer ten thousand deaths than that they themselves should fail to look like Prometheus in my picture here—'a long-sided funnel set on a jug.'"

PRACTICAL JOKES.—A costly joke came off in one of the Berlin coffee-houses recently. A young man was playing billiards. One of his companions, with an understanding with some of the bystanders, stealthily drew a pocket-book, which contained 400 thalers in paper money, from his pocket. When the game was finished, and the player wished to pay his share of the expense, the pocket-book was gone. For some time, the company amused themselves with the perplexity of the young man; at length his friend concluded to return the book, and relieve the poor fellow's feelings. But now it was his turn to be frightened, and endure the same pain which he had just inflicted upon his companion, for a real thief had relieved him of the pocket-book, and that, too, without joke; and had taken himself off. The joker was, therefore, forced to replace the 400 thalers.

The Fate of a Learned Man.

There is in Boston an old man of sixty, who graduated at the University of Dublin, Ireland; at the age of twenty-two was admitted as a surgeon in the British Army, and in that capacity visited this country with the English; was present at the destruction of the public buildings at Washington city—has been in India with the British army—has been present during his services as a surgeon at over 4,000 amputations, and fifteen severe battles—was shot twice, performed surgical operations on three hundred wounded generals, seven colonels, twenty captains, and over eleven thousand officers of lower grades. He has dined with two kings, one empress, one emperor, the sultan, a pope, innumerable great generals, &c. Has held the largest diamond in his hand known in the world, except one. Has held the British crown in his hand. Has been married three times, father to eleven children, all of whom he has survived. Broken down by disease, he could no longer practice his profession—too poor to live without employment, and too proud to become a pauper, he sailed in an emigrant ship to this country three years ago; and this man, of remarkable adventures, classic education, master of four languages, sixty years of age, poor, old, and decaying, is now peddling oranges and apples in the streets of Boston! We know what we are, but verily we know not what we may be.

An Indian Breakfast.

On the 17th, we were paddling along at daylight. On putting ashore for breakfast, four Indians, on horseback joined us. The moment they alighted, one set about hobbling their horses, another to gather small sticks, a third to make a fire, and a fourth to catch fish. For this purpose the fisherman cut off a bit of his leather skirt, about the size of a bean; then pulling out two or three hairs from his horse's tail for a line, tied the bit of leather to one end of it, in the place of a hook or fly. Thus prepared, he entered the river a little way, sat down on a stone, and began throwing the small fish, three or four inches long, on shore, just as fast as he pleased; and while thus employed, another picked them up and threw them towards the fire, while the third stuck them up around in a circle, on small sticks, and they were no sooner up than roasted. The fellows then, sitting down, swallowed them—heads, tails, bones, fins and all—in no time, just as one would swallow the yolk of an egg. Now all was but the work of a few minutes; and before our man had his kettle ready for the fire, the Indians were already eating their breakfast. When the fish had hold of the bit of leather or bait, their teeth got entangled in it, so as to give him time to jerk them on shore, which was to us a new mode of angling; fire produced by two bits of wood, was also a novelty; but what surprised us most of all was the regularity with which they proceeded, and the quickness of the whole process, which actually took less time than it has taken me to note it down.

Galls on Horses.

More than twenty years ago, when our large ferry-boats were propelled by horse-power, and the horses, by constant moving around in a circle, were exceedingly liable to be galled by the collar, I learned from the ferry-man the use of alum and whiskey. They bathed the neck and back, and wherever the harness rubbed, with whiskey, into which powdered alum had been put until no more could be dissolved. When the gall occurred, constant bathing would secure the continued use of the horse, and actually heal the wound while in service. I resorted to this remedy, carrying it with me when I journeyed, and have continued its use with undiminished approval, for more than twenty years. When a horse has been put out for the winter, and has not been used, his breast and back will be tender. A single hour's use of saddle or collar, in a hot day, will then scald his breast so as to produce serious injury. My uniform practice, therefore, has been, for a week before beginning to use the harness, to harden the breast and back by bathing them regularly two or three times a day. No injury has then resulted from the application of the collar. And when the bad gall has actually occurred, a frequent and persevering use of this remedy has secured the constant use of the animal, and healed the wound while in service.

CORRUPTION IN ARISTOCRATIC CIRCLES.—Respectable German papers contain obscure allusions to a gigantic criminal trial lately concluded at Berlin in the greatest secresy. The nature of the crime seems to be such as to forbid precise details, but it appears that a large number of persons, of high birth and station, in civil and military life, were organized in a sort of fraternity, with signs and passwords. The police had long been aware of the existence of this organization, but had refrained from acting on account of the protection or participation of an aged man in the most eminent official position. His death and the accidental discovery of the diary of another member rendered it impossible longer to permit the society to exist, and all the members were arrested and tried. The person whose diary had been found expressed the greatest surprise that the law should interfere with men of such rank, but this was by no means the general opinion in those circles; the more intelligent portion of the aristocracy admitted that vice must be treated with impartial severity, whatever the position of the guilty parties. How many persons have suffered the sentence of the Court is not known, but it is understood that many highly distinguished men are condemned to rigorous imprisonment for from one to ten years. All military officers implicated have also had their names stricken from the rolls of the army by the express order of the King.

SUBSTITUTE FOR MULBERRY LEAVES.—An Italian woman, named Theresa Ramos, has discovered and proved by practice, that the plant called the centinode is as good a nourishment for silk worms as the leaf of the mulberry. She has raised a large quantity of worms, in sixteen days only, upon this plant alive. Those, however, who have once tasted the mulberry, will not consent to be weaned from it, and it is necessary to bring them up exclusively on the centinode, if it is intended that they shall feed upon it. If this discovery is confirmed, speculation in the moris multicaulis is decidedly at an end.

It is calculated that every seven minutes a child is born in London, and that one dies every nine minutes! So close does sorrow tread on the heels of joy. This difference of time is equal to a daily increase of about 50 births over the deaths.

MUSICAL LIBRARY.—The London Leader learns that our distinguished countryman, Lowell Mason, has purchased the entire library of the late celebrated composer, Ruick, of Darmstadt, and it is now on its way to Boston. It adds:—

"The library contains, in addition to a very extensive collection of musical works, a large gallery of portraits, many of which are now exceedingly rare."

"Only lately the theological library of the celebrated Neander was purchased at Rochester, N. Y., and we now congratulate our American friends on this new addition to their treasures, through the liberality and public spirit of the purchaser, who has done so much to create a knowledge and love of the science of music in his native city."

TREATMENT OF PERSONS STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.—In a communication to the Portland Advertiser, Dr. Davis, of that city, says, "The popular impression in relation to the application of cold water to persons struck by lightning is a decided error." The Doctor observes: "The whole treatment necessary to counteract the injurious effects of lightning may be comprised in a few words. Expose the body to a moderate warmth, so as to prevent the loss of animal heat, and inflate the lungs so as to imitate natural respiration as nearly as possible, when the person breathes with difficulty, or when he has ceased altogether by his own efforts. The sprinkling of cold water over the face, in order to excite respiration by reflex action, may also be tried. Further than this it has no legitimate use."

VARIETY.

The Westchester (Pa.) Village Recorder has a statement to the effect that Elizabeth Parker, a colored girl, who, it was alledged, was abducted from Chester County some months ago, and sold under another name in New Orleans, has been returned to Baltimore. The citizens of Chester County, believing the girl to be free, interested themselves in her behalf, entered into a bond of $1,500 for her return, and conditioned for the payment of that sum if she did not prove to be Elizabeth Parker. The Legislature of Pennsylvania, having had the subject brought to their notice, authorized counsel in her behalf to be employed, and the payment of all expenses to regain her freedom. Rachel Parker is now in Baltimore County jail, awaiting a trial involving her freedom.

A new method of manufacturing sugar has been discovered and patented by Don Juan Ramos, of the island of Porto Rico, by the agency of which Muscovado sugars may be manufactured in increased quantities, of superior quality, and at much less expense than heretofore. The improvement consists entirely in the use of an ingredient for the cleansing of the liquor, and so wonderful are said to be its effects, that at a trial made in the presence of a number of planters, and subjected to the most rigorous tests, the new mode of manufacture showed a saving of forty-one per cent., or the production from the same quantity of cane of sugar and molasses to the value of $1,520 44, against $1,077 91 produced by the old mode of manufacture.

The Utica Gazette states that the Washington Mills, in that vicinity, were sold at auction a few days since for $40,000, cash. They were bought for Mr. Bushnell, of Utica. The property consisted of the real estate, factory building, water-power and machinery, which is said to have cost over $200,000, and was recently appraised at about $115,000. These mills were under the management and control of the Messrs. Hollister, and the sale grows out of the settlement of the estate of these gentlemen in connection with the Lewis County Bank and others.

A good joke is told of an individual, who, to raise the wind, advertised that on a certain day he would crawl into a bottle. A large audience collected to witness the wonderful feat, when, after getting all the cash in his pocket, and seeing a clear chance to make good his retreat, the performer came forward and apologized to the audience for disappointing them, but said it was impossible to perform the feat, as he could not find a bottle large enough! Immediately after this apology he left.

No man is a gentleman, who, without provocation, would treat with incivility the humblest of his species. It is a vulgarity for which no accomplishments of dress or address can ever atone. Show me the man, who desires to make every one happy around him, and whose greatest solicitude is never to give just cause of offense to any one, and I will show you a gentleman by nature and by practice, though he may never have worn a suit of broadcloth, nor ever heard of a lexicon.

The New York and New Haven Railroad offers the most liberal terms of yearly commutation of any road in this neighborhood; and the whole region through which it passes is feeling the benefit. The terms are, to Harlem, $30; beyond and not to New Rochelle, $40; to New Rochelle and beyond, $50; to Greenwich and beyond, $60; to Bridgeport and New Haven, $70.

Messrs. Munroe & Francis, of Boston, have lately published a volume of 300 pp., the types for which were all set up by themselves. The firm was formed in 1800; one of the members is now seventy-seven and the other seventy-two years old. They are gentlemen of property, but keep at work for amusement in their green old age. They are the oldest printers and publishers in Boston.

The rich have the most meat; the poor have the best appetite. The rich lie the softest; the poor sleep the soundest. The poor have health; the rich have delicacies. The rich hang themselves through fear of poverty; the poor (such as have always been poor) laugh and sing, and love their wives too well to put their necks into the noose.

The Tribune reports, from a compilation of official statistics, that out of 16,000 criminals committed to the Tombs of New York city the past year, over 4,000 were under 21 years of age!—and of these about 800 were between the ages of 9 and 15! A more frightful picture has never been presented to any community.

Seventeen persons have recently been received, on profession of their faith, into the 3d Congregational Church in Guilford, Conn., under the pastoral care of Rev. R. Manning Chipman, late of Athol, Mass.

Among the students of the University of Edinburg, are three Egyptians, one Russian, one Greek, one Chinaman, two Persians, three Germans, one Arabian, and two Frenchmen.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

Rev. 1 : 10.—"In the Spirit on the Lord's Day."

(Concluded.)

But even if it were distinctly proved, that the Apostle John's allusion, in the words referred to, is not to that which forms the great substance of his vision, and in which it all issues, the day of his Lord's glory, and the blessedness of His saints, still this would not render it necessary that we should adopt, without proof, and as the only alternative, the view so commonly taken, that he alludes to the first day of the week. "If a weekly day," says Cornthwaite, in his Essay on the Sabbath, "be intended by 'the Lord's day' here, and not the day of judgment, or the yearly day of our Lord's birth, death, or resurrection, as many have imagined, (see Dr. Hammond upon this place, and on Rev. xviii. 2,) and the Scripture is to be its own interpreter, then the seventh will be the day—that alone being called the 'Lord's holy day,' the 'Lord's Sabbath,' &c; so that, if Protestants would but in fact lay aside all practices which are not warranted by Scripture, and have nothing but tradition to plead, pursuant to their avowed principle, the notion of a First-day Sabbath would, I imagine, entirely vanish, there being neither precept, precedent, nor promise, that I know of, to encourage the practice, or threatening to those who neglect it, on which to graft this doctrine, in the whole Bible. Besides, it is generally allowed, that they who first called the first day of the week by the name Lord's day, never inferred a change of the Sabbath on that or any other account; because they who urge this text in favor of a change of the Sabbath, at the same time also suppose that the first Christians observed, for a considerable time, both the seventh and first day of the week; nor does the first day of the week appear ever to have been observed as a Sabbath, but only as a festival in memory of Christ's resurrection, till the fourth century, when Constantine made the first law forbidding labor on this day, (though in that very law he permitted all sorts of husbandry work to be done on it,*) being unwilling, as the historian informs us, 'that the Christians should have any thing common with the Jews†, and ready, it seems most probable, to please the people of Rome, who, with those inhabiting Alexandria, did not celebrate the holy mysteries every Sabbath day, though in a manner all the other churches throughout the whole world did."‡ p. 69.

Assuredly, there is nothing in the context of John's statement about "the Lord's day," from which we should be entitled to conclude that he used the term to designate the first day of the week. And as in no other part of either the [Old Testament or the New had this title been previously so applied, if now for the first time such an appropriation of it was being made, we surely have reason to believe that intimation would be given more or less distinctly of the fact.

The force of this remark is much increased when we remember that the Apostle John is the author, not of the Apocalypse alone, but also of the Gospel which bears his name, which, as we have already seen, contains the history of our Lord's death, resurrection, and ascension, without the least allusion, either to a new Sabbath, or to the first day of the week by the title of Lord's day, as he is so commonly supposed here to have given it. And the importance of keeping this in view is the greater, if those be correct who believe that John's Gospel and Epistles were written, not only at as late a period as the Apocalypse itself, but even many years after. Besides Epiphanius among the ancients, not a few eminent critics in modern times, assign a very early date to the Apocalypse—earlier even than many other of the books of the New Testament. Epiphanius states that it was written in the reign of Claudius, possibly, it is supposed, meaning Nero, who took the name of Nero Claudius Cæsar, in whose reign the Syriac version places expressly the Apostle's banishment to Patmos. Danbuz quotes Lind as saying expressly, "John, the Divine and Evangelist, returning from his banishment in Patmos, writes the Gospel." "Grotius, Sir Isaac Newton, Michaelis, Bishop Newton, and Dr. Tilloch, ascribe it to the reign of Claudius or Nero." (Carpenter's Biblical Companion, p. 239.) And the value of this consideration, while seeking to understand his meaning of "the Lord's day" is farther enhanced by the fact that such critics point to numerous allusions, as they believe, if not even direct quotations from the Apocalypse in the different Apostolic Epistles. For if, indeed, John at an earlier period used this title in reference to the first day of the week, we should be the more surprised at finding no mention of this in books of later date.

If, then, we repeat, this title were to be understood as referring to any day of weekly recurrence, and also applicable only to a day of sacred character, with far more propriety it would apply to the seventh day, the acknowledged Sabbath. Christ was indeed even the Creator of all things; but there is no evidence in John's context from which we can legitimately infer that the title "Lord" is here used as even exclusively applicable to our Saviour, except that which carries us forward to the day of His triumph. In other parts of Scripture God speaks, however, of the Sabbath, as His "holy day," "a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable." Is. lviii. 13. "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," points therefore to a day which might more appropriately than any other individual day be called "the Lord's day," as a day already so known to those for whom the Apostle wrote. Had a different day been really designed by John, all the associations of sacredness linked in the minds of men with the weekly Sabbath, at the period in which he wrote, would surely have more naturally suggested the day sanctified and blessed from the first, rather than another, concerning which he gives even no intimation of its being now divinely substituted in its room, assuming its privileges, and to be enforced by its sanctions.

But even if it could be distinctly proved that it was upon the first day of the week that John received this vision of the Revelation of of the Lord, and that from this circumstance he gave to it the honorable appellation of the Lord's day, still we should say that this would be no evidence that it was henceforth to be sanctified, or that it had already been so, as a day set apart from the ordinary occupations of life; still less could we admit this as evidence that the day hallowed and blessed of God from earliest time, and that period also known as such, was thus to lose its place, and change its character, and yield up the speciality of its blessing, all without one word of intimation to that effect. We can less easily suppose the Lord of heaven and earth to require this from His people, without the expression of such requirement, than we could imagine that, in addition to His own holy day, already sanctified and blessed, He should farther allow, in honor of His Son, if higher honor to that beloved Son could thereby have accrued, another day to be called by his name, and to be also sanctified from the ordinary avocations of life. This is indeed the very place which the first day of the week received from those by whom it first began to be observed—not that the Sabbath of the Lord was, or was meant to be, thereby supplanted, but that as sisters, to use the phrase which they adopted, both Sabbath and Sunday were sanctified together.

Had this, however, been the will of the Lord, we have no reason to believe, nor can we for a moment admit, that it would have been left as a matter of inference, and that, too, on such unsatisfactory grounds. We therefore repeat, that very undue use has been made of the Apostle's expression, when, detaching it from its context, such important results have been made to depend upon the use of the phrase "the Lord's day." There is no evidence of its being spoken in reference to the first day of the week, no probability that it was so; but supposing even this to have been manifest, nothing is said by the Apostle, nor elsewhere in Scripture, as to any special use to which that day is to be applied; nor whether, supposing some divine purpose designed in regard to it, the whole or only a part of the day should be consecrated by the church. Not only do the circumstances of the case, however, require that such explanation should have been given, were there any foundation for the current notions on the subject, but, as has been remarked, they "might have been reasonably expected from an inspiried writer, like John, who so often [in his Gospel] guards us against misconception by translating Hebrew words into Greek, as in the instance of Cephas and Siloam, which he tells us are, by interpretation, 'Peter' and 'sent.'" Burnside on the Sabbath, p. 200.

From this review of the several texts generally urged as the most direct evidence of a Change of the Sabbath at the Resurrection of Christ, we trust it has been made sufficiently apparent, that there is no reason from any or all of the texts to believe that the Spirit of God meant any change whatever in the day which He originally chose to be observed in commemoration of His own glorious handiwork, and which he at the same time gave to man as a channel of blessing for his soul and his body. Destitute of direct evidence as all admit it to be, we have thus farther seen, that the change of the Sabbath is an opinion for which even sound inference can give no sanction, when applied to the texts usually adduced as the highest authority for a custom which makes void, by its observance, the commandment of the Lord.

THE TRUE MARK OF GENIUS.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, in one of his recent lectures, describes with the clear sweep of a painter the vital necessity of energy and labor to even the most gifted. In the present day of steam and punctuality, the lazy man, no matter how extraordinary his acquirements, must always fall behind in the race of human life. He says :—

Genius unexerted is no more genius than a bushel of acorns is a forest of oaks. There may be epics in men's brains, just as there are oaks in acorns, but the tree and the book must come out before we can measure them. We very naturally recall here, that class of grumblers and wishers who spend their time in longing to be higher than they are, while they should have been employed in advancing themselves. These bitterly moralize upon the injustice of society. Do they want a change? Let them change—who prevents them? If you are as high as your faculties will permit you to rise in the scale of society, why should you complain of men? It is God that arranged the law of precedence. Implead Him, or be silent! If you have capacity for a higher station, take it—what hinders you? How many men would love to go to sleep and wake up Rothschilds or Astors! How many men would fain go to bed dunces to be waked up Solomons! You reap what you have sown. Those who sow dunce seed, vice seed, laziness seed, usually get a crop. They that sow the wind, reap a whirlwind. A man of mere "capacity undeveloped" is only an organized day-dream with a skin on it. A flint and a genius that will not strike fire are no better than wet junk wood. We have Scripture for it, that a "living dog is better than a dead lion." If you would go up, go—if you would be seen, shine.

At the present day, eminent position in any profession is the result of hard, unwearied labor. Men can no longer fly at one dash into eminent position. They have got to hammer it out by steady and rugged blows. The world is no longer clay, but rather iron, in the hands of its workers.

SABBATH-SCHOOL FESTIVAL.

The parents, teachers, and children, connected with the Sabbath Schools of the churches of New Market and Plainfield, N. J., held a Festival on First-day, August 1. The schools and congregations met at the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house in New Market, at 10 o'clock A. M., formed in procession, and took a circuitous route to a grove on the premises of Mr. Levi Clawson, where conveniences for the occasion had been prepared. The meeting was called to order by H. B. Lewis, Superintendent of the New Market School; and, on motion of David Dunn, Randolph Dunham was appointed President for the day, and A. D. Titsworth and Isaac Clawson, Vice Presidents. D. Dunn and H. B. Lewis were chosen Secretaries. After the reading of the programme for the day, the audience were invited to partake of a sumptuous dinner, prepared by the ladies of the congregations.

The repast being over, the meeting was again called to order by the President, and the exercises proceeded according to the following programme :—

1. Music by the Choirs.
2. Prayer by Wm. C. Whitford, of Union Academy, Shiloh, N. J.
3. Music by the Choirs.
4. Address by Eld. J. H. Cochran.
5. Music by the Children.
6. Address by Eld. W. B. Gillett.
7. Music by the Children.
8. Address by Wm. C. Whitford.
9. Music by the Choirs.
10. The following resolutions were presented, and unanimously adopted, viz :—

1. Whereas, the cultivation of the social elements of our nature is every way consistent with the moral growth of the soul, and has a most controlling influence upon our actions.—

Resolved, That we feel gratified—yea, we feel it our duty—to improve all suitable means which Providence has entrusted to us, to develop and mature the finer feelings of the heart, and thus, by throwing open the doors to the lively influences of a generous sympathy, make ourselves eminently useful in promoting the enjoyment and welfare of our friends, and more directly achieve that victory of present and future happiness.

2. Resolved, That we acknowledge with devout gratitude the kindness of our Heavenly Father in protecting the lives and health of the young and rising generation, and His great mercy in preserving our civil and religious liberty.

3. Resolved, That we view with delight the increased attention given to the instruction and benefit of the scholars of the Sabbath School.

4. Resolved, That it is the duty of parents to give special attention to the religious instruction and training of their children, and to see that they "remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy."

5. Resolved, That to use any part of the Sabbath for amusement, or unnecessary visiting, or roving about the fields, or traveling on the highway, is a violation of the law of Jehovah; and, if persisted in, will subject us to the frowns and displeasure and judgments of God.

6. Resolved, That it is of vital importance to our religious character, that efforts be uniformly made to elevate the standard of individual and family piety.

7. Whereas, God in his infinite wisdom and goodness has revealed to us his will, as contained in the Sacred Scriptures, a knowledge of which is essential to our present and eternal well-being; and whereas instruction imparted to the youth is more lasting and salutary in its effects than if left to more advanced age; therefore—

Resolved, That we hail with joy the organization of Sabbath Schools, as being peculiarly suited to the wants of the youth of our country, and particularly to those of the congregations here represented.

8. Resolved, That while we prosecute this enterprise, believing that all human efforts are unavailing, unless seconded by the Spirit of Divine Grace, we will most earnestly and incessantly beseech God to regard us graciously, and crown our efforts with abundant success, by the early conversion and ultimate salvation of the members of these schools.

The foregoing resolutions were made the subject of remark by Wm. Dunn, Superintendent of the Plainfield Sabbath School, by Thomas B. Stillman, Superintendent of the Sabbath School in New York, and by others.

The exercises were concluded with prayer and singing; after which the assembly were served with ice cream, lemonade, &c.

The day being exceedingly fine, all hearts seemed joyous; and while the gentle breeze was wafting upward those songs of praise, the cheerful countenances of some four hundred of our friends and children were sufficient evidence of the interest of the occasion. The addresses were in every way calculated to benefit and instruct the audience; and parents, teachers, and children, were made to feel more deeply their privileges and responsibilities. We trust that the exercises have done much for the benefit and interest of Sabbath Schools among us.

WEEP NOT FOR HER.

Weep not for her: she was too pure
For such a world as this;
No breath of guilt had dared to mar
Her spirit's holiness;
But sinless, as the golden flowers
That yield their breath in tropic bowers,
Or the bright gems that span the sky,
Her few but joyous years went by.

Weep not for her: her life was like
Long months of polar light,
That glide in fadeless beauty on,
Undarkened by the night.
She lived not to behold the dearth
Of friendship at the social hearth;
Or, with a crushed and baffled heart,
To bid hope's darling dreams depart.

Weep not for her: she passed away
Like music on the sea,
When wave to answering wave imparts
The dying melody;
Like rainbow hues, that leave the earth
To seek the Fount that gave them birth;
Or the sweet cherub-forms which bare
Their bright wings to the lower air.

Weep not for her: the glorious bands
Of heaven surround her now;
The wealth of immortality
Sits smiling on her brow.
Oh! rather give your tears to those
O'er whom long life its shadow throws,
Whose cares, and griefs, and follies, must Weigh down the spirit to the dust. [Evan. Mag.

SQUIRE D—— AND THE TEACHER.

Traveling in a mountainous region at nightfall of a tempestuous day, and having lost my road, I was directed for a lodging to "Squire D——'s, who keeps the ferry." After supper I had a pleasant talk with the father of squire D——, on whose head the snow of eighty winters had fallen, and soon the family were gathered around us, engaged in delightful converse. I had heard of the high-handed wickedness of a neighborhood not far off, with which my host was well acquainted, where, when a young man, who had wandered to a city, was to be hung for murder, his father and other relatives celebrated the day with a fine supper and a dance; no school could be kept, for the boys had whipped off every teacher who came among them; and meetings were frequently held in mockery of religious worship.

"Yes, yes," said the squire, with just enough of the Welsh accent to betray his origin, "and our neighborhood here was just as bad ten years ago; we were all alike; no church, no preacher, no Sunday school, no day school. One evening a minister and a young lady stopped at my house for the night; I thought them very inquisitive people. They asked if we had any preaching. No. Any schools? No; we have had several teachers, but no one will stay more than a quarter with us. The young lady said she would come and take a school among us, if we would employ her. After some further conversation, I told her I would see what could be done and write her the result. Next morning they left for the minister's home at M——, some fifty miles distant.

"In a short time I had a school made up and board engaged for the new teacher, and wrote her to that effect. She came and commenced her school at the time appointed. But soon there was complaint that the new teacher read the Bible and prayed in her school. And her troubles did not stop here. The man at whose house she boarded, insisted that she should leave, because she prayed, sung hymns, and would keep talking about religion all the time. Miss. H. then set out to look up another home for herself; she applied to most of her employers, but met with the same reply from all: 'We cannot receive you, unless you leave off praying and singing.'

"When she applied to me, I objected on the same grounds. Finally, I told her that if she would come on my own terms, I would take her into the family. She inquired what those terms were. Why, said I, you shall have such a room to yourself; there you are to stay from the time you return from school until you start to go back, only when you come to your meals; you must not sing hymns; you may pray as much as you please, but mind you don't let us hear you at it; and, remember, the first time you infringe this contract, you leave the premises. To all this she agreed, with as much meekness as if my terms had been reasonable and right. That evening she took up her abode under my roof; and little did I think what a blessing God was sending me in that frail, delicate girl.

"The children all loved the new teacher very much. So one day she told them to ask their parents' permission, and if they were agreed, she would teach them on Sunday too. This proposal pleased us all. If she taught on Sunday, that was so much clear gain to us. And to school the children went every Sunday, with clean clothes and clean faces.

"I soon observed that my children took to staying in the teacher's room much of their time. At length, one Sunday morning, they came down with some tracts; I looked over them, and found they were on the subject of religion. Ah, said I, my lady, I've caught you now. I called her down, told her she had violated her contract, and must be off. The poor girl began to weep; I felt ashamed. Dear sir, said she, will you read those tracts? If you do, and still continue in your present mind, I will leave your house immediately.

"Here was a pretty fix; the children were all crying, and begging me not to send Miss H—— away; and the books, Oh, they could not part with the books. I was mightily perplexed; at last I gave in. Said I, Miss H——, you may go back to you room; I will consider the matter. I shall never forget the smile that passed over hear face as she thanked me and went back to her room. Thanked me, indeed! I deserved a sound basting instead of thanks. Well, I set to work, read one of the tracts, felt self-condemned; read it again, felt dreadfully troubled. Then I read them all, felt that I was a great sinner. I said nothing more to Miss H—— about leaving my house. Each day my convictions became deeper. At last I could bear it no longer. Thought I, this wont do; I must talk with Miss H——. So I invited her to come and sit with us in the family room. She cheerfully complied. I asked her a great many questions about the doctrines of the Bible, not meaning to let her know any thing about my concern. But all would not do; my distress continued, or rather my agony, for I thought I was the greatest sinner on earth.

"At last, I sent one evening for Miss H—— to come down, and I told her my troubles; for my proud heart was well nigh broken. Said I, Miss H——, I feel so and so ever since I read those tracts of yours; and I related all that was passing in my mind; and, said I, do you think there is any mercy or hope for such a poor miserable sinner? The tears began to run down her cheeks; then she laughed; then she caught me by both hands, and looking up into my face, she said, Oh, my dear friend, I am so glad. Why, said I, are you glad because I am in trouble? Oh, my dear sir, says she, this is the Spirit of God operating on your heart. All at once a great light seemed to shine into my mind. All that I had been learning for so many weeks, seemed now just as plain as A B C. Said I, Come, Miss H——, kneel down, then, and pray for me; and she did pray for me; and I do bless God for his wonderful mercy to such a poor hardened sinner. I believe that God did change my heart just while that very prayer was going up. All at once it just came; I loved my Bible, and I loved to pray, and could not bear the company that I used to take so much delight in.

"On the next Sunday, Miss H—— asked me to go along with her and the children to the school—which was, and had been, a Sunday school, though we never suspected it—and here came a trial. If I go, they will say I am getting religious; if I stay, it will be a sin, for I know I ought to go; and then it will grieve Miss H——. These last considerations were the strongest; so I went. The room was crowded with children, all waiting for their teacher; I thought they all looked happy. After a little while, Miss H—— took the Bible, and coming to me, she said, Mr. D——, will you read and pray with us this morning? I was startled; my very heart trembled. Said I, Oh, no; not now. Then she read a chapter and prayed herself. Oh, how I felt, to think that I was ashamed to pray before those children! Ah, thought I, this will never do; I will come here and pray next Sunday. That night I read and prayed with my family; and the next Sunday I opened the school with prayer.

"The news spread soon, all through the settlement. D—— has got religion, and is praying in the Sunday school! D—— going to school on Sunday and praying! very strange news this. Very soon the people began to drop into our Sunday school; every Sunday a regular increase. Then Miss H—— said to me, You had better read us a sermon at the Sunday school, after the other exercises are over. She selected the sermons, and I read them. Our meetings grew very solemn. Presently we sent word to a good man at B—— to send us a minister; he did so. The minister came and preached for us. The little school-house could not contain one-half the people who crowded to hear him. We held our meeting in the open air, under the trees.

"Ah, that was a wonderful time; the cry of the anxious sinner went up from every hearth-stone and roof-tree. The Spirit of God was moving mightily upon the hearts of the people, and many were born into the kingdom every day. All this brought a great change in our settlement. Instead of the dance, and the gaming-table, and the foolish song, we had meetings for prayer and praise; and the tavern and still-house were exchanged for the temple of God." [Am. Mess.

A PLEASANT INCIDENT.

We take the following from the Personal Recollections of Charlotte Elizabeth, and commend it to our readers as showing how Roman Catholic prejudice and bigotry may be overcome by bringing them into contact with Revealed Truth :—

The affair of the little deaf mute, at the convent, led me to turn my attention to some poor children similarly circumstanced in the streets of Kilkenny; and while prosecuting this work, the Lord brought to me that dear dumb boy whom you well remember as the brightest, most lovely of Christian characters. He was then very little, and had a brother of sixteen, one of the most genuine paddies I ever beheld. This lad was living very idly; a fine, sensible, shrewd fellow, who could read and write, and very soon made a great proficiency in the finger language by helping me to instruct Jack. No one above Pat's own rank had ever taken an interest in him; I did, a strong one; and as he was much with me, and of a character most intensely Irish, he became attached to me with a warmth of devotion rarely met with among any other people.

One day Pat made his appearance with an important look, brogans stamping the carpet with unwonted energy, his fine bare throat stiffened into a sort of dignified hauteur, and his very keen hazel eyes sparkling under the busy luxuriance of chestnut curls that clustered about his face and fell on his neck. The very beau-ideal of a wild Irish youth was my friend Pat. Seating himself as usual, he began:

"I wouldn't like," said he, "that you should go to hell."

"Nor I either, Pat," said I.

"But you are out of the thrue church, and you wont be saved, and I must convart ye."

"That is very kind of you, my good lad; if I am wrong, you cannot do better than set me right."

"Sure, and I will."

"But how?" inquired I.

"With this," said he, pulling out a small pamphlet, nothing the cleaner for wear. "You must learn my catechism, and it's you that will be the good Catholic."

Delighted with the boy's honest zeal, I asked him where I should begin; and he, no less pleased at my docility, desired me to read it all, and then get it all by heart. I promised to do the first at any rate; and oh, what a tissue of falsehood and blasphemy that 'Butler's Catechism' was! Next morning my teacher came early. "Well, Pat, I have found out what makes you anxious about me; here it is said that none can be saved out of the true church."

"That's it, sure enough."

"But I do belong to the true church, and I'll show what it is;"—so I pointed out to him two passages, and added, "Now, I do love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, and therefore I am one of those to whom St. Paul wishes grace and peace; and do you think an apostle would send his blessing to anybody who was not of the true church?"

Pat shook his head; "That's your catechism, not mine."

"Very true; Dr. Butler wrote yours, and God wrote mine," holding up the Bible, "which is best?"

"That's not the real Bible," persisted Pat; "my priest has the true Bible."

"Then ask him to lend you his."

"I wouldn't get my ears pulled, would I?" said he, smiling. "But if he lent me his Bible he must lend me a cart to bring it home in, for it's as big as this table. Yours is too little, and doesn't hold half the truth. That is why you are so ignorant."

I soon proved, by showing him Matthew Henry's Commentary, that the Word of God would lie in a very small compass, the great bulk of the book being man's work. I also urged on him the absolute necessity of reading what God had given for our learning, and the danger of resting on man's assertion. Pat stood his ground most manfully, astonishing me by the adroitness with which he parried my attacks, while pursuing, as he hoped, the good work of my conversion. For many a day was the controversy carried on—Butler versus the Bible—without any other effect than that of bringing Pat to read the Sacred Book for himself; but it opened to me the awful wiles of darkness by which the poor and ignorant are blinded, while for the more educated class such polished sophistry as Milner's is carefully prepared. I reaped the fruit, however, six years afterwards, when, in a little English church, Pat kneeled beside me and his brother, a thankful communicant at the Lord's table.

DEATH AND SLEEP.

BY KRUMMACHER.

In brotherly embrace walked the Angel of Sleep and the Angel of Death upon the earth. It was evening. They laid themselves down upon a hill not far from the dwelling of men. A melancholy silence prevailed around, and the chimes of the evening bell in the distant hamlet ceased. Still and silent, as was their custom, sat these two beneficent genii of the human race, their arms entwined with cordial familiarity, and soon the shades of night gathered around them. Then arose the angel of Sleep from his moss grown couch, and strewed with a gentle hand the invisible grains of slumber. The evening breeze wafted them to the quiet dwelling of the tired husbandman, enfolding in sweet sleep the inmates of the rural cottage, from the old man upon the staff, down to the infant upon the cradle. The sick forgot their pain; the mourners their grief; the poor their care. All eyes closed. His task accomplished, the benevolent angel of sleep laid himself again by the side of his grave brother. "When Aurora wakes," exclaimed he, with innocent joy, "men praise me as their friend and benefactor. Oh, what happiness, unseen and secretly, to confer such benefits! How blessed are we to be the invisible messengers of the Good Spirit! How beautiful is our silent calling!" So spake the friendly angel of slumber. The angel of death sat still with deeper melancholy on his brow, and a tear, such as mortals shed, appeared in his large dark eyes. "Alas!" said he, "I may not, like thee, rejoice in the cheerful thanks of mankind; they call me, upon the earth, their enemy and joy killer." "Oh, my brother," replied the gentle angel of slumber, "and will not the good man, at his awakening, recognize in thee his friend and benefactor, and gratefully bless thee in his joy? Are we not brothers and ministers of one Father?" As he spoke, the eyes of the Death Angel beamed with pleasure, and again did the two friendly genii cordially embrace each other.

DEATH OF JOHN STERLING.

On his last day of life, after "scribbling some little verses of thanks" to valued friends, who had comforted him by letters just received, he writes a few lines in pencil, and giving them to his sister, says, "This is for you: you will care more for this." Read the last words written by him of whom Thomas Carlyle would have us think that he died a 'victorious' Pantheist:

"Could we but hear all Nature's voice,
From glow-worm up to sun,
'Twould speak in one concordant sound,
'Thy will, O God, be done!'

"But hark, a sadder, mightier prayer,
From all men's hearts that live—
Thy will be done in earth and heaven,
And Thou my sins forgive!"

He murmured over the last two lines to himself. As it grew dark, he appeared to be seeking for something, and on his sister's asking what he wanted, said, "Only the old Bible which I used so often at Herstmonceux in the cottages." A brief, cheerful conversation with his brother followed; he soon grew worse, and before eleven o'clock his spirit had gone to Him whose forgiveness he besought in his last hours, and whose forgiving love he had rejoiced in years before.

THE TRUE CHRISTIAN.—No man ought to think he hath found peace, when nothing troubles him; nor that all is well, because every thing is according to his mind; nor that he is a holy person, because he prays with great sweetness and comfort. But he is at peace who is reconciled to God; and God loves him when he hath overcome himself; and all is well when nothing pleases him but God, being thankful in the midst of his afflictions; and he is holy, who, when he hath lost his comfort, loses nothing of his duty, but is still the same when God changes his face towards him. New York, August 12, 1852.

FORGIVENESS.

We are expressly commanded to forgive our enemies. He who should say it is not a duty, might as well proclaim himself an infidel at once.

Christianity illustrates the nature of forgiveness, and greatly strengthens our obligation to practice it, but does not originate it. It has its origin in the great natural law of love. He who loves his neighbor as himself, will not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of his people. Lev. 19 : 18.

If it is a duty as old as man's relation to his fellow man, it is idle for any one to argue that he is not bound by it, because he makes no pretensions to Christianity. It is his damning guilt, that he is not willing to exercise towards his neighbor the same leniency which he naturally wishes to be exercised towards himself.

In the Christian Religion, the forgiveness of injuries is made an express condition of our acceptance with God. "And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have aught against any: that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses. But if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive your trespasses." Mark. 11 : 25, 26. The importance of understanding the nature of the duty, and of being always found in the prctice of it, cannot, therefore, be too highly estimated.

What, then, is the nature of this duty? For it is notorious, that some criminally deceive themselves on this point, and profess to have forgiven their enemies, notwithstanding they find it difficult to show them common civility.

It certainly includes the exercise of kind feeling; that feeling which leads us to speak pleasantly to those who have injured us, and to salute them, when thrown into their company, as if no offense had been offered. So, at least, we understand our Saviour; for, says he, "If ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others?" Yet it is very common, when two neighbors have had a misunderstanding with one another, for them to withhold the salutations which they have been accustomed mutually to interchange; or, if not to withhold them altogether, to be, at best, so dry in their greetings, that each cannot help feeling that a great change has taken place. Ask either one of them, however, if he cherishes any unwillingness to forgive the other, and he will at once say, that he does not, only he wishes to have as little to do with him as possible.

Now we ask, what does this unwillingness to hold the usual intercourse mean? What is the design of it? The design is, evidently, to punish the offender; and it is useless for any one to imagine that he is not seeking revenge, because he does not resort to personal violence, or pour out a torrent of abuse upon the one who has trespassed. As far as it goes, it is laying the offender under a penalty for what he has done. The offender suffers the loss of that cordiality of greeting which he has been wont to receive from you; and the penalty is more or less severe, according to circumstances. Does the Saviour allow us to revenge ourselves a little? Or does he command us to remit the offense wholly? "O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me. Shouldest not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee." Matt. 18 : 32, 33.

But perhaps you reply, that you only resort to what is necessary for self-protection. Take care that you do not deceive yourself here. He who resorts to personal violence for the redress of injuries received, might plead the same excuse. There is, at least, plausibility in the pretence, that a sound thrashing will more effectually teach an enemy to behave himself for the future, than the simple withholding of customary greetings. But what right have you to protect yourself by punishing your neighbor? God tells you to forgive him, and so far as your protection is necessary, He will see to that. "Avenge not yourselves; vengeance is mine, I will repay." Rom. 12 : 19. It is not true, however, that retaliation is the means of self-protection. The surest way to disarm an enemy of all power against us, is to forgive him, and treat him kindly. This all experience shows.

There is no great difficulty in understand-what forgiveness implies, if we consider it as it is exercised by God towards his offending creatures. With him, it is a remission of the punishment due to the transgressor. He rightfully claims from us the performance of that righteousness which is prescribed in his law. If we fail to perform it, then he claims that we undergo the penalty, or that we suffer punishment. Hence, when we ask him to pardon us, we ask him to relinquish his right to punish us. We ask to be as completely discharged from punishment, as if we had not sinned at all.

But does he who refuses to hold intercourse with his offending neighbor, or who gives him only dry salutations, discharge him as completely from punishment as though he had not offended at all? And when he reads the inspired command to be "kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you," can he then kneel down in his closet, and say, "Father, forgive me my sins; for I also forgive every one that is indebted to me?"

Let him not say, that he wishes his neighbor no evil. For his withholding his accustomed kind greeting is the actual infliction, of evil upon him. What though it be not an evil like the infliction of violence upon his person, it is nevertheless an evil. It is depriving him of a portion of that love, which, according to the law "thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," he has a right to receive from you.

Perhaps, however, you say that he has forfeited his claim to your love. But that cannot be. If he is your neighbor; that is, if he is your fellow creature—for such is the meaning of the term in the Scripture vocabulary—he has, on this very account, a claim upon your love, even to the extent of receiving your forgiveness of all his offenses. Be it, however, as you say; be it, that his ill conduct shuts him out of all claim to your love. It is equally true, that the ill conduct of sinners has shut them out from all claim to God's love. Nevertheless, in the exercise of forgiving mercy, he extends his love to them still. And if we pretend to forgive our fellow creatures at all, we ought to cease talking about their having forfeited all right to our love. For when we place our intercourse with them upon the ground of right or justice, we lose sight of mercy, plainly confessing that the tender-heartedness which forgives faults, is not the principle which governs us in our treatment of them. But "he shall have judgment without mercy, that hath shewed no mercy." James. 2 : 13.

We have penned these few remarks, in compliance with a request from one of our correspondents, who thinks that the discussion of the subject is needed. Perhaps we may recur to the subject again. A readiness to forgive his enemies is one of the distinguishing marks of a regenerate man; and the duty cannot be too strongly insisted on. T. B.B.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Doings—The Queen—Elections—The Newman Case—Papal and Prelatical Matters.

GLASGOW, July 23, 1852.

Although there is no indication of a spirit to return to the Sabbath, nor yet a willingness to devote even Sunday fully in its place, there is yet a desire to maintain certain appearances, as if there was also the reality. In Glasgow, our Exchange News Room is always open on Sunday, but the entrance is not by the front, but by a side door, on that day. The inconvenience thereby suffered is not great, as even the Sunday entrance is sufficiently capacious for the admission of our greatest merchants. In Liverpool, they seem to take a different way of it; without intimating any difference in regard to the mode of admittance, their Exchange News Room Committee have resolved to close the room at half past two o'clock on Sundays. In London, also, there seems to be manifesting itself a greater care; for the Brittania newspaper of last week informs us, that "on Sunday determined measures were adopted to prevent the overcrowding of steamboats on the Thames, by the city and metropolitan authorities."

Our Queen, liberated for a time from the cares of State, has commenced her summer excursions, having reached Plymouth, two days ago, by sea. Her immediate movements are not announced, but she is expected in Scotland within a week, on her way to Balmoral—"her Highland Home."

Our elections are nearly over, and it has been remarked that, as regards Scotland and England and Wales, the only Roman Catholic returned to Parliament is Lord E. Howard, whose marriage with Miss Talbot excited so much attention—and his Lordship is probably indebted for his election wholly to the influence of his father, whose "nominee" he has been called. What effect on political parties the elections may have produced, is not yet obvious; but undoubtedly the success at the poll or the contrary of not a few, has been much influenced by their views in regard to the measures to be adopted for re straining the power of the Pope in our land. In Ireland, the whole power of the priesthood, in relation to time and eternity, has been brought to bear to force the electors of their faith to vote for the men of their nomination. Besides the opportunities in the confessional, and otherwise privately, their placards have, in some instances, been the strongest expressions of bigotry and blasphemy; and outrages committed on electors unfavorable to their cause have been perpetrated with their connivance, if not also of their devising. All considerations of the nation's welfare seem to have been wholly merged in the determination to provide the Pope agents in the British Legislature. They have, however, in some cases, signally failed; in no case more decidedly than in that of Mr. Reynolds, formerly one of the members for Dublin, and who in the House of Commons seemed never to forget by whom he had been sent or for what purpose.

It is sad enough to observe with what indifference men eminent for talent and attainment look upon the encroachments of Rome, and even what opportunities are afforded them for promoting their purposes. The Standard newspaper, a week ago, gave the statement of a correspondent, who furnished them with his name, that a brother-in-law of Dr. Newman, the pervert, is a frequent writer in the Times, and the author of a most vituperative leading article on the judge who tried the case of Achilli against Newman. That he should abuse the plaintiff was, in the circumstances, little to be wondered at; but surely there was more spite than prudence in attacking the judge before even the award was given—which, it is understood, will not be done till the November term. Even independently of what that award may be, the Roman correspondent of the Daily News writes that "the Cardinal Vicar had spent $60,000 on the Newman trial." A sad amount this to expend in hunting for dishonored women, in reality or pretence, which, even if true, shows the more effectually what the tendency is of the celibacy of her priesthood, and what the opportunities are for the secret gratification of its fostered licentiousness.

The accounts from the Continent more and more indicate an extension of Papal power, and, as might be expected, a more open use of that power, in interfering with the religious rights and civil liberties of Protestants. Increasing difficulties are being thrown in the way of their even meeting for public worship in France. And the official journal of the Two Sicilies, in the beginning of this month, contains a royal decree entrusting the Lyceum of Salerno to the Jesuits.

The favor with which a large proportion of the clergy in the Church of England seem to look upon what constitutes the real essence of Popery, is one of the sad signs of the times. Those in that church are in danger if they even openly testify against the prevailing spirit. Mr. Gladstone, who ventured to point to the responsibility of the Bishop of London in fostering Puseyism, having been dragged into the Arches Court, and having had heavy expenses to pay, and seeing no purpose to be served in contending farther, addressed a letter of secession to the Bishop a month ago, intimating respectfully, that he had determined to accept an offer made to him on the part of Sir Culling E. Eardley, and some friends, to become the minister of the new Furrow-Cross Free Episcopal Church, (St. Mary's,) Forquay, Devonshire. Woolmer's Gazette, the organ of the Bishop of Exeter, a week ago intimated the intention of this Bishop to take legal steps to prevent his ministrations. The new charge is in the diocese of Exeter, and those who know its Bishop, and the nature of the causes in which with most ardor he engages, were not surprised that he should so purpose to labor in his vocation, while he would also confer a favor upon his brother of the diocese of London. On Sunday last, Mr. G. was to have preached in the New Chapel, which, however, he did not, having been meanwhile required by the Dean of the Arches Court to obey their decision, forbidding him to preach within the bounds of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Even Bishops, however, do not always repose on beds of roses—although their revenues in some cases might enable them to secure a large supply. He of Exeter was thrown into great wrath, last month, by the Earl of Shaftesbury's having publicly made very strong remarks on the Bishop's alledged negligence as to an Episcopal clergyman of Plymouth, who, having adopted the Romish practice of confession, had questioned a child as to her thoughts of uncleanness. Even the Episcopal revenues are in danger, in some cases, of curtailment. A paper has just been printed, obedient to an order of the House of Commons, which it is understood Mr. B. Hall, in moving for the return, had some object different from their augmentation. The new Parliament will want the presence of Mr. Horsman, the greatest scourge the Prelates had, as by a determined effort the High Church party have succeeded in preventing his re-election for Cockermouth.

Nearly another week of thunder storms has much increased the loss of life and property throughout the country. A large number of cattle have been struck dead by the electric fluid. The storm seems now over. It has been very judgment-like. J. A. BEGG.

"DENOMINATIONAL SINS."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

From several articles on this subject, pro and con, which have appeared in the Recorder, the thought has been suggested to my mind, that our discordant habits may in some cases rather require an apology than severe censure, where, under other circumstances, censure would be justly laid. The Seventh-day Baptists have formerly been an isolated people, to a great extent. Their intercourse with other denominations, especially the popular ones, was not as cordial as at the present time it may be. Strong prejudices were engendered, often, against the practices of each, which those who are unacquainted with the state of things in New England half a century ago, cannot understand or apologize for.

The writer of this article was by birth and education a New Englander; and all who were acquainted in Connecticut and Massachusetts fifty years ago, know that that people, generally, were a praying people, because religion was there established by law; and although what has been denominated the "blue laws" had in a measure passed away, still for the land was claimed the appellation of the "land of steady habits." One of these habits was to make the children half-covenant members of the church, and teach them the duties and practices of the church, among which family prayer was prominent; and a man was scarcely eligible to office in the train-band, who was not a member of the church, and prayed in his family, while a large portion of such were known to be profane and rude in their lives.

The State of Rhode Island, it is well known, was settled by Baptists and Quakers, who were not permitted to dwell in the before-mentioned colonies, without a strict conformity to the established usages, and these they repudiated, considering them mere formalities in religion at best, and in many cases as hypocrisy and Phariseeism. The Baptists and Quakers used the same language, and sympathized much with each other in dispensing with the formalities of religious worship, professing to be governed by the "movings of the Spirit." The Quakers seldom used vocal prayer, and confined themselves more generally to the practice of mental prayer, by their "silent sittings." Notwithstanding the sympathies of the Baptists were with the Quakers, rather than with the established order, they nevertheless used public and audible prayer, and in the family circle always, when the state or condition of their minds would in their estimation justify them in the duty, and secure them from the charge of being "formalists," "Pharisees," or hypocrites. Notwithstanding there was a great want of uniformity in practice, as such sentiments would naturally imply, they claimed to be pious when they professed religion, and wished not to bring religion into contempt by empty formality or canting hypocrisy, as they regarded the practices of the "established order." This engendered prejudices in the minds of children, and those under their influence, against perhaps many of the most unexceptionable practices of that order.

The churchmen of the adjoining States looked upon these irregularities as an evidence of barbarism and semi-heathenism; and it was not unusual for them, in their strictures on the state of society in the eastern part of the State of Rhode Island, to represent it as a field of missionary operations for the purpose of christianizing them. In this part of the State dwelt the progenitors of the Seventh-day Baptists. They regarded such allusions as arising from ignorance of their true condition, and had drank deeply in the prejudices against the practices of their neighbors. They had confidence in their own practices and habits, for in the churches there were general and glorious revivals, and there was evidence of spirituality in the converts rarely discovered among the established order. Their dead formality was charged very much to their established practice of prayer, without any apparent interest, or feeling sense of its solemnity. This irregularity, though perhaps to be lamented at the present time, was however honestly and conscientiously imbibed in early times, and the present and future generations, it is feared, will be more or less influenced by it. Those of our denomination who are from other localities, and from other orders, cannot make so much allowance for what they deem irregularities and deficiencies in their brethren, as those can who know the origin of their habits, or as perhaps charity would dictate. Still, we should be careful not to make the mantle so large as to cover up practices and habits inconsistent with the profession of piety and religion. No consistent Christian can object to family prayer or worship, provided it is offered from a heart-felt sense of the duty, with the spirit and understanding; but when I find my brother spiritual-minded, tender, and loving, ready to discharge the duties of charity and benevolence, I will not inquire whether he prays audibly or not, before I give him my heart and hand; for I know he must be a man of prayer; and I know, also, that education or early habit is hard to change. It is like the Ethiopian's skin, or the leopard's spots. If, however, we live in the life and power of religion, we may, under all circumstances, and at all times, do the duties openly which religion requires, without incurring the charge of formality or hypocrisy. J. M.

RELIGION AT THE WEST.

The progress of religion at the West (says the Rev. J. F. Tuttle) has been of itself a prodigy. The first sermon preached to the white people in the North-western Territory was by a Mr. Breck, on the 20th of July, 1788, in the Block House, at Marietta. But now, in 1852, not less than six hundred Presbyterian and Congregational ministers hold forth the word of life in Ohio alone, to some seven hundred congregations. In 1820, two years before the State was admitted into the Union, there were probably not half a dozen ministers in Indiana; now there are more than 200 ministers and 300 churches of these denominations, the most of which are the nurslings of Home Missions. In 1814, as far as I can ascertain, there was not a Presbyterian or Congregational church or minister in Illinois. In 1829, the first Presbytery was formed of seven members; and on the Mississippi, above St. Louis, there was not a single minister or church, nor one within 200 miles in any direction of Galena, where Kent, the veteran pioneer of the A. H. M. S. had just been stationed. But now there are more than 350 churches on the same field, and the gospel is preached to listening thousands. In 1829, Mr. Kent visited Wisconsin, and tells us that, losing his way, he was led to the cabin of a backsliding Englishman, who had been converted in Calcutta. There was not to his knowledge a man within twenty miles who could pray with him, nor an evangelical Christian church within 200 miles. In 1835, the work of Home Missions began in earnest in Wisconsin, and now it has some 200 churches, and 150 ministers.

RESULTS OF HOME MISSIONS.

The Baptist Home Mission Society has been in existence twenty years. A review of its operations during that period shows much progress, and furnishes great encouragement for future effort. Such a review was embodied in the Annual Report presented to the meeting recently held in Cleveland, O. We copy a portion of the report. The first two paragraphs glance at the work accomplished within the ten years immediately preceding the last anniversary. The last two paragraphs refer to the entire work which the Society has achieved:—

During the decennial period just closed, the Board have employed 877 ministers of the gospel, the aggregate of whose labors are equal to those of one man for 828 years. As a part of the results of their labors, they have baptized 9,468 persons, organized 354 churches, ordained 246 ministers, and obtained 15,263 signatures to the temperance pledge. The people under their pastoral care have built 105 houses of worship, the most of which are unincumbered with debt; and while struggling with difficulties and bearing heavy burdens to maintain the gospel amoug themselves, they have paid for various objects of Christian benevolence not less than $18,845 57.

Sixty-five of the churches, once aided, have become sufficiently able to dispense with that aid, and to sustain the gospel themselves. These, with others, once under our care, and many more influenced by their example, are now cheerful contributors to the fund of benevolence annually raised to spread the gospel to the ends of the earth.

By adding the above statistics to those reported at the termination of the first ten years of our operations, it appears that the total number of missionaries who have acted under our commission, is 1633; that they have jointly performed 1428 years of labor, baptized 20,467 persons, organized 785 churches, ordained 406 men to the work of the gospel ministry; and the people among whom they have labored have built, and in most cases paid for, at least 144 houses of worship.

In these representations very satisfactory evidence will be found of the importance and utility of the Society's operations; of its beneficial influence in the conversion of sinners, the upbuilding and establishment of gospel churches, and the reformation of public morals. And yet these are but a part of the known and acknowledged result of its operations. Many, very many of its benefits to a fallen world are yet to be learned, amidst the glorious developments of eternity, around the throne of the Most High.

Religious Instruction of Slaves.—The following extract from the Narrative of the Chickasaw Presbytery, Georgia, shows that Southern ideas of giving religious instruction to slaves do not rise above "negro pews" and separate congregations:—

"The religious instruction of the colored people engages the frequent and serious attention of Presbytery. Most of our churches have sufficient accommodation for the black people, in seats appropriated to them, where they can hear the gospel whenever it is preached to the whites. In addition to this, it is the general and almost universal practice of our ministers, wherever there is a sufficient number of blacks to afford a congregation, to preach statedly to them by themselves, adapting the discourses to their peculiar necessities. Sabbath Schools for our whole colored population, children and adults, meet increasing favor among our people; and the practice is growing in private families of regularly instructing the servants, with the invaluable aid of Dr. Jones' Catechism."

Sabbath-keeping Emigrants.—A correspondent of the Louisville Herald, states that the Sabbath-keeping Oregon emigrants were encamped on the 23d of May, (it being the Sabbath,) 15 miles west of New Fort Kearney, 220 miles west of the Missouri river. The writer says: "I am in excellent health, and so is all our company, and we are getting on finely. We have now traveled by land 300 miles (or more,) but one hundred of these were in the State of Missouri, by the Old Fort Kearney. Our teams stand it well—they have improved since we crossed the river."

We clip the above paragraph from one of our religious exchanges. If "our teams" should "stand it well" throughout the journey, what a proof it would furnish of the duty and policy of keeping the Christian Sabbath! And if another company of emigrants should conclude to lie by on Fridays, and their teams should "stand it well," what a proof that would furnish of the duty and policy of keeping the Mahommedan Sabbath! And so on through the seven days of the week.

Missionary Operations in New Mexico.—Rev. Mr. Smith, Baptist missionary in New Mexico, writes to the Christian Chronicle, that he has commenced preaching in the Spanish language in that territory. "For three Sundays past," he says, "I have had the privilege of telling the Mexican population of this city the wonderful works of God in their own language. I believe that I am the first Protestant missionary who has spoken God's truth to this people in the shape of a sermon in the Spanish tongue. Excepting yesterday, we had a crowded house, and I had the satisfaction of knowing that I was very well understood. The thing has created quite a sensation, but I am told by an intelligent Mexican, that if such preaching had been commenced two years ago, the influence would have been much more extensive and decided than it will now. Yesterday some rope dancers had a great performance about the time of service, and drew away nearly all my congregation. Sunday in New Mexico is the greatest day of all the seven for amusements."

Not Means, but Men, Wanted.—Speaking of the call for home missionary effort, and the probability of its being met, the Christian Watchman and Reflector makes the following remark, which will doubtless apply to other churches as well as to the Baptist churches:—

"We think the Home Mission Society will have no difficulty in raising any amount of money that can be judiciously expended. Our great missionary want is MEN. We have talked about liberality till we have forgotten to pray that God would raise up laborers for the harvest. Our ministry is inadequate to the wants of our churches as they are, and church extension must multiply destitute churches, till God gives us more ministers."

The National Magazine.—Under this title the Methodist Book Concern in this city has just started a monthly, which is intended to surpass any thing of the kind now in existence. Each number is to contain ninety-six pages of carefully-arranged and handsomely-printed matter, for $2 per annum in advance. Rev. Abel Stevens, D. D., editor; Carlton & Phillips, publishers.

The Cholera.—At Buffalo, there have been a few cases of cholera, but not enough to cause much alarm or panic. At Rochester, more cases have occurred, principally in unfavorable neighborhoods. On Second-day, Aug. 2, there were 25 cases; on Sabbath, Aug. 7, there were 13 cases. In New York no recent cases are reported.

The Southern Baptists have fifteen missionaries and assistants employed in China, and three more are soon to sail for that country. They have also seventeen missionaries and assistants in Western Africa, and one in Central Asia.

A CARD.

To all who have contributed towards the erection of the Chapel at Shanghae:

Dear Brethren,—Although your contribuitons for a Chapel in Shanghae have been made as a duty you owed to God and the heathen, yet, since we have had the handling of those funds, and with them have builded not only a good, substantial, commodious Chapel, but have also nearly completed two Dwellings, one directly over the Chapel, and the other outside of the City, we therefore beg you to pardon the diversion of a part of your contributions from the specific object of building the Chapel, and to accept our sincere and hearty thanks for the means to erect both the Chapel and dwelling-houses, for our personal comfort, and for the comfort of those who shall come after us. We do thank you, on our own behalf, and on behalf of those whose minds, at present, are too dark to appreciate the value of your liberality, but who, we hope, may hereafter rise up from among the heathen and call you blessed.

Yours in the labor of love and patience of hope,

S. Carpenter,
N. Wardner.

The Memorial.—The third number of the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial is published this week. It contains a portrait of Eld. John Davis, of Shiloh, N. J.; biographies of Edmund Dunham and Jonathan Dunham, pastors of the Church in Piscataway, N. J.; a continuation of the history of the Church at Newport, R. I., including its records from 1692 to 1700; another chapter of the History of Missions, with the Missionary Address adopted by the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference in 1818; Statistics of Seventh-day Baptist Churches, prepared since the meetings of the Eastern, Central, and Western Associations; a list of Seventh-day Baptist Ministers, with their post-office address. Persons intending to possess themselves a copy of the work, should make early application. Terms, $1 per year, 25 cents per number. Address Geo. B. Utter, New York.

Tract Contributions.—Most of the Seventh-day Baptist churches have been in the habit of contributing annually to the funds of the American Sabbath Tract Society. It is hoped that the matter will not be overlooked this year, because there is no collecting agent in the field. The Society continues its operations, and will gladly use all the means placed at its disposal for the dissemination of right views relative to the sabbatic institution. T. B. Stillman, of New York, is the Treasurer.

The Pardoning Prerogative.—Governor Hunt, of N. York, having been beset with petitions to exercise the pardoning power on behalf of two infamous criminals, condemned to death for murder, has written a letter, full of good sense and sound truth, justifying his refusal of these petitions. Among other things, he says:—

"It would seem that many of our citizens regard the pardoning power vested in the Executive as a personal prerogative, to be exercised at pleasure, from the promptings of compassion, without reference to the provisions of law or the guilt of the offender. This partial and erroneous view of the subject, and the appeals which it naturally suggests, add much to the embarrassment necessarily incidental to the discharge of my duty in capital cases. On recurring to the real design of the constitution, every candid mind must perceive, that the power to pardon, lodged with the Executive Department, was not intended to defeat the objects of the law, by arresting its execution or changing its penalties, in cases of well-established and deliberate guilt. It is a remedial power, to be resorted to for the correction of errors and prevention of injustice. Its exercise is legitimate, whenever the conviction is found upon inadequate proofs, or when the verdict is inconsistent with newly-discovered facts; and in cases of frequent occurrence, when the crime is accompanied with mitigating circumstances which diminish the moral guilt of the offender."

Dedication of a Jewish Synagogue.—A Jewish Synagogue just completed in Williamsburgh, was dedicated on Sunday, August 1st, on which occasion addresses were delivered by several distinguished Jewish rabbis, and a collection of $400 towards the building was taken. The opening services are thus described in the Tribune:—

The audience having assembled, Rev. Messrs. Raphal, S. M. Isaacs, and Dr. Lilienthal, approached the Synagogue from a neighboring house, bearing the sacred manuscripts or scrolls of the Old Testament, which were rolled up like maps, and covered with silk cases. One of them was decorated with silver plates, chains, and bells. Within, near the partly-opened door of the Synagogue, stood the reader, who chanted the following Hebrew sentence:

> "Raise the hymn with the sound of gladness and joy; a voice proclaiming, Give thanks to the Lord, for his kindness endureth forever."

Those bearing the scrolls stood outside of the door, and the reader exclaimed—

> "Open for us the gate of righteousness, that we may enter, and give thanks unto God."

From within the minister responded,—

> "This is the gate to the Lord; the righteous enter therein. Enter ye his gates with thanksgiving, his courts with praise. Give thanks to him; bless his name."

The door being thrown open, the audience arose, and those bearing the scrolls chanted a sentence; after which the sacred manuscripts were borne to the ark or closet at the eastern end of the Synagogue, while the officiating minister chanted.

The lamp was lighted, the ark was opened, and the services continued for a short time, when the scrolls were borne around the Synagogue seven times, during which psalms were chanted in the Hebrew tongue.

Rev. A. D. Gillette, of Philadelphia, has accepted a call to the pastoral care of the Broadway Baptist Church, New York.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, AUG. 2.

In the SENATE, the River and Harbor Bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce. The Bill making provisions for the Public Printing was referred to the Printing Committee. The Indian Appropriation Bill was taken up and postponed. Nothing else done.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Hascall, by leave, introduced a bill to amend the Postage Law, proposing, among other things, to reduce the postage on letters, when prepaid, to two cents, and on newspapers to one-fourth cent on distances not exceeding 500 miles, and one-half cent for any distance over 500 and not exceeding 1,000 miles, and one cent for any distance exceeding 1,000 miles; newspapers to circulate free within fifty miles of the place of publication. It also abolishes the franking privilege. Referred to P. O. Committee. The amendment of the Senate, fixing Tuesday, August 31, for adjournment, was concurred in.

THIRD-DAY, AUG. 3.

A Message was received from the President in answer to Mr. Mason's resolution calling for information respecting the fisheries, transmitting a report of the Acting Secretary of State, and stating that Com. Perry, with the steam frigate Mississippi, had been dispatched there to protect American rights. The discussion of this subject occupied most of the day, but nothing particularly new or interesting was elicited.

The HOUSE agreed to close the debate on the General Appropriation bill in one hour after it shall be taken up again. The bill was then discussed in Committee of the Whole, but the House adjourned without coming to a vote upon it.

FOURTH-DAY, AUG. 4.

The SENATE spent most of the session discussing the salary of the Superintendent of the Census.

In the HOUSE, the Appropriation bill was under discussion, and an interesting topic was started in relation to the collection of light-house fees from foreign vessels equal to those levied by their respective Governments upon American vessels.

FIFTH-DAY, AUG. 5.

The SENATE spent the morning hour in discussing the fishery question. The Indian Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and discussed during the remainder of the session.

The HOUSE spent the early part of the day in talking about the costs and fees of the officers of the United States Circuit and District Courts. The General Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and an amendment was adopted appropriating $18,000 instead of $6,000 for the salary and outfit of the Commissioner to China.

SIXTH-DAY, AUG 6.

In the SENATE, the Public Land Committee reported against the Homestead Bill, Bennett's Land Distribution Bill, and Walker's Bill to cede Public Lands to the States in which they lie, to be sold to actual settlers, at the cost of transfer only. Mr. Seward called upon the President to state whether any proposition has been made by the King of the Sandwich Islands to us to place the sovereignty of those Islands under the protection of the United States, and all information in the possession of the Departments on the subject. The Indian Appropriation bill was debated, two or three amendments rejected, and the Senate adjourned to Second-day.

In the HOUSE, the General Appropriation bill was taken up, debated, nothing important done, and the House adjourned.

SABBATH-DAY, AUG. 7.

The SENATE was not in session.

The HOUSE occupied most of its session with the Appropriation bill, on which various amendments were offered and agreed to. Among them $10,000 for the support of insane paupers in the District of Columbia; $5,000 for a pedestal for the equestrian statue of Gen. Jackson; $90,000 for six revenue cutters, $115,000 for books to new members, $21,000 for reporting during the present session, and over $50,000 for the publication of debates in The Globe, and to furnish The Congressional Globe to each member of and delegate to the House, and for binding that work. The bill was not disposed of when the House adjourned.

Burning of the Henry Clay.

The following is a summary of the fatal results of this sad catastrophe:—

Bodies recognized by names at Yonkers	51
Unrecognized bodies at Yonkers	7
Bodies found in the waters of New York	9
Bodies found on the Jersey shore	3
Dead bodies recovered	70
Missing	11
Total	81

The Coroner's Jury rendered their verdict on the 4th inst., which was as follows:—

The Jury find, that on the 28th day of July, 1852, the persons described as having been found dead at Yonkers were passengers on board the Henry Clay, that she took fire and was consumed, and that J. K. Simons, one of the persons, was burned to death, and that all the other persons, either by reason of the shock occasioned by the collision of the boat on the land were thrown overboard, or that in order to save themselves from being burned, cast themselves overboard and were drowned in the Hudson River. That on the above-named day the Henry Clay left Albany, with passengers, about 7 o'clock in the morning; that Capt. John F. Tallman was Captain, and part owner; that Thomas Collyer was also one of the owners, James L. Jessup was clerk, Edward Hubbard was pilot, James Hubbard assistant pilot, John Germain was engineer, Charles Merritt assistant engineer; that a certain young man (whose name is unknown to the Jury,) was employed to tend the bar of the steamboat, and that these persons were on board at the time, and had each of them part of the charge of the said boat; and that for the purpose of excelling in speed a certain other steamboat called the Armenia, or for the purpose of increasing the speed of the Henry Clay, created an unusual and unsafe quantity of steam, and in so doing made excessive fires, and did not use ordinary prudence in the management of said fires; and, although often being remonstrated with by different passengers, did for a long time continue the seexcessive fires, and in consequence thereof, through their culpable negligence and criminal recklessness, the Henry Clay did, at 15 minutes after 3 o'clock P. M., take fire, and all the deaths of the passengers afore described ensued;—so the Jurors say, that the deaths of the said persons, and of each of them, were the result of anact perpetrated by the said John F. Tallman, Thos. Collyer, James L. Jessup, James Ellmendorf, Edward Hubbard, John Germaine, and said bar-keeper. The act was imminently dangerous to others, and evinced a depraved mind, regardless of human life, although it was perpetrated without any premeditated design to effect the death of any particular individual.

After the above verdict was rendered, the parties named in it as culpable were arrested on a charge of man-slaughter, and held to bail in the sum of $10,000 each.

European News.

One week later news from Europe has been received since our last.

The English elections are nearly over, and the House is divided, for the Ministry 325, Opposition 272; majority for the Ministry 53, so far as heard from.

At a yacht race at Cowes, recently, the America was distanced two minutes and three seconds, by a yatcht named the Arrow.

The President of France has been on a grand tour, and the French papers are filled with accounts of his reception at Strasbourg, where he appears to have been received with every demonstration of respect. The most striking thing in the reception ceremonies was a cavalcade of 1,200 peasants, acting as an escort to 120 car-loads of young girls, the prettiest in their respective villages, and dressed in their holiday costumes. Each car was decorated with flowers and inscriptions, testifying devotion to the President. All the other ceremonies were on the same extensive scale. It is estimated that 20,000 strangers were attracted to Strasbourg by the fete.

On Wednesday evening, Field Marshal Exceimons was thrown off his horse on the road from Sevres, and killed.

Petitions for the establishment of the Empire are being got up in several places under the patronage of the local authorities.

Four days Later.

After the foregoing was in type, the U. S. Mail steamer Pacific, with Liverpool dates to July 28, four days later, arrived at New York

In Ireland, deplorable scenes have taken place. At the election in County Clare the military were called out, and several lives sacrificed. On Thursday, while polling for Sir J. F. Fitzgerald, Cornelius O'Brien and Col. Vandeleur, at Six-mile Bridge, about seven miles from Limerick, a riot rose between the voters on the respective sides. No clear statement of the affray can be had, but the most probable version of the story is, that the country people threw stones at a party of Lord Conyngham's tenants, who were proceeding to the poll under an escort of military, and that some of the missiles striking the soldiers, they fired a volley among the crowd and killed five men on the spot, besides wounding five or six others—three mortally. Twelve shots were fired by soldiers, and all took effect. Most of the Irish provincial papers teem with accounts of election outrages. At Ballina, the police had to charge the crowd with the bayonet. At Roscommon, and elsewhere, the same disturbances took place, fomented, in most instances, it is said, by the priests.

Accounts received from Scotland and the North of England, of the prospects of harvest, are extremely favorable.

The American-built yacht Truant, belonging to Mr. Grinnell, came in first at the Liverpool yacht race, and gained her owner a piece of plate.

Another attempt was recently made at the Hippedrome, Paris, to solve the problem of steering balloons. A balloon, in shape like a whale, was filled with gas, and attempted to be guided by means of a shaft of wood suspended horizontally, with a sail at the end, to act as rudder. To this shaft was affixed a platform, with a steam engine of four horse power, working a screw with three terminal paddles, like three sails of a windmill. The experiment was made in the presence of several scientific men, but was unsuccessful.

Accounts from the Cape Verde Islands mention that an eruption of the volcano on Ilha de Fogo had occurred, but the date is not given.

From Madeira, we learn that the vine-growers are much alarmed by the appearance of blight among the vines.

Cholera is severe at Astrowo, Prussia. On the 19th ult. a fire took place at Kaisch, which destroyed 60 houses. The cholera had previously committed great ravages in the town.

From several parts of Switzerland there are unfavorable accounts of the crops, particularly in the Cantons of Argovia and Thurgovia, which have been visited by terrific storms. Considerable damage has also been done in Lucerne, Basle and Vaud.

SINGULAR CHASE.—On Sunday evening, July 18, the Otilla sailed from Liverpool for Australia, leaving behind no fewer than 23 passengers, who had come ashore under the impression that the vessel would not take her departure before Monday. On Monday morning they were thunderstruck at finding she had sailed, taking with her their outfit, necessaries, extra stores, and money. In a state of the most frantic excitement they repaired to the office of the agent, who instantly telegraphed to his agent at Holyhead, directing him to put a steamer in readiness to go in search of the runaway ship, and the whole of the passengers went by the first train. Arrived at Holyhead, little time was lost in transferring them to the steamer and putting to sea. After a cruise of some hours, the Otilla was discovered at a considerable distance to the westward; but being on what is called in nautical phrase "a wind," and being, moreover, a vessel of first-rate sailing qualities, she gallantly pursued her course. Every possible means of attracting the notice of the vanishing vessel was put into requisition, but without avail. The chase was finally given up in despair, after an exciting trial of five hours.

Two lads, Paul Bienvenu and Adolphe Nichols, 14 or 15 years of age, got into a fight at New Orleans, the other day, in which Nichols, who is the son of a tinsmith, doing business near where the fight occurred, drew a large knife, and inflicted two severe and probably fatal wounds in the breast of Bienvenu.

CURIOUS AND FATAL CASUALTY.—A casualty, resulting in the death of five persons, happened to the U. S. Revenue Cutter Taney, on the 3d inst., as she was proceeding down New York Bay. At about 1 P. M., after having proceeded a mile below Governor's Island, with a very light air, the vessel was struck by a white squall, which seemed to fall aboard almost vertically, causing her to capsize and fill in an instant. So limited were the extent and duration of the squall, that the pilot boats and other vessels in various directions, within 150 yards of the spot, were becalmed at the time, and immediately afterward scarcely more than a breath of air could be perceived. The Captain also states, that it was so sudden, that not a ripple was observed to indicate its approach. From this circumstance he is convinced that it did not strike in a horizontal direction; and as a proof of its great force, the vessel, when knocked down, was simultaneously submerged. Five men were drowned. Their names were, Thomas Jackson, James F. Stiff, Thomas Doran, Henry McGregor, and James McGlue.

CLAIMING HIS OWN.—A colored man, calling himself William Holmes, recently went into the County Clerk's Office, Lockport, N. Y., and stated that he formerly lived in that place, and was enticed away, gagged, and placed in a wagon, in which he traveled three days. After arriving in some part of the South, he was sold as a slave, and has remained in bondage ever since, until a few days ago, when he contrived to make his escape. His capture, as reported, occurred some twelve years ago. At the time of his being kidnapped, he owned a house and two lots in the lower village of Lockport, and on searching the record at the time he stated they were recorded, it was found that the lots were entered in that name; and other circumstances stated by him lent the appearance of correctness to his statement.

CALIFORNIA-BOUND CHINAMEN.—Under date of Hong Kong, April 22, Mr. Dean, the Baptist missionary, writes as follows:—

"The topic which more than all others engrossess the Chinese in the neighborhood, at present, is the emigration to the gold hills of California. A dozen ships are now taken up, and twenty more are advertised here and at Whampoa for this purpose, and each is to take from two hundred to five hundred Chinese emigrants to San Francisco; and, as if it were not enough to send wooden houses, they are now building stone houses, cutting the granite into blocks and pillars, that the buildings may there be put together, like Solomon's temple, without the sound of the hammer."

ACCIDENT LAST SABBATH.—On Sabbath, (Saturday,) Aug. 7, an express train on the railroad from Buffalo to Albany, met with a casualty at Waterloo. In consequence of a misplaced switch, the engine ran off the track, smashing it, together with the tender and baggage car. One of the passenger cars was literally demolished. A number of passengers were injured—three so dangerously that they were left at Waterloo. Mr. Erastus Corning, of Albany, had one of his legs injured, but was able to reach home in the train.

SUMMARY.

A Buffalo paper says that the Knox County (Ohio) Delegation, together with several others, about three hundred in all, arrived in town en route for the Falls, to attend the Lundy's Lane celebration. Supposing the steamer Ohio was to run to Schlosser with a load, they boarded her at once, leaving their baggage at the hotels in this city. The Ohio not knowing but all was right, started on her regular trip to Sandusky, taking with her the three hundred individuals, none of whom discovered their mistake until they were in the neighborhood of Erie.

The powder magazine on Vine-st. Hill, Cincinnati, was attacked a few evenings since, by a mob of not less than one hundred men, who broke open the door, then entered, and carried to a large pond near by and threw in upward of 700 kegs of powder. The mob then returned to the building, did considerable damage to the inside, and left. The powder was valued at near $4,000. Cause—the failure of the authorities to remove the depot, which was believed to be dangerous to the lives of the citizens.

The Springfield (Ill.) Register relates the following: In March last, three men in this city agreed to drink themselves to death. The first died in April, the second in May. The survivor, on the happening of the last event, showed signs of breaking the compact, and he kept sober for two or three days afterward; but honor revived, and he died in the month of June. This is literally true.

A woman had been begging in Williamsburgh, on the pretence that her child had died, and she had obtained a coffin, but had not means to procure a shroud. One lady, to whom she applied, declined giving her money, but made a shroud, and went to her pretended residence, thus discovering that the beggar was an impostor.

Some fifteen hundred citizens of Milwaukee have signed a letter to the Mayor, asking him to put a stop to the Sunday evening Balls now regularly held at several halls in that city. Seventeen clergymen (nine of them Germans) are among the signers.

At Mr. Pethrick's mine, near Valley Forge, in Pennsylvania, a vein of copper has been struck, of unsurpassed richness. At the Chester County Mining Company's works, they are working a vein of pure galena of 16 inches. The company is mining 800 tuns weekly.

A young man by the name of Lopez, book-keeper and confidential clerk in the house of North & Scott, shoedealers at St. Louis, was arrested on the 28th ult., for embezzling $10,300 from his employers. He had been in the habit of frequenting the gambling hells of that city, and this was the result.

The British brig Adah, Port-au-Prince, 16th ultimo, lost her captain (named Wright) and two of her seamen of yellow fever while lying in the harbor of Port-au-Prince. The yellow fever had been quite fatal at several ports on the island.

The wreck of the Henry Clay has been taken completely out of the water. Nothing has been found among the cinders which resembles human remains. Stair rods, metal sheathing and copper cents were melted by the intense heat of the burning boat.

The ship Sovereign of the Seas, Capt. L. McKay, sailed from New York for San Francisco, August 4th, with the largest cargo ever dispatched from this port, amounting to about 2,950 tuns of assorted merchandzie, exclusive of stores for a year's voyage; and also, probably, with a larger freight list than ever before cleared from the country by one vessel. She carries a crew, including officers, of 103 men and boys, exclusive of the master, consisting of four mates, two boatswains, three carpenters, three stewards, two cooks, eighty able-bodied seamen before the mast, and ten boys.

The Wilmington Republican says that Capt. Enoch Williams died at his home in Cape May recently from hydrophobia. He was bitten about five weeks ago, by a dog belonging to a negro in Brandywine village, on the hand, from which at the time he suffered no serious inconvenience. Some time afterward he was in Philadelphia, and, feeling unwell, determined to go home. He reached his home, and shortly afterward was attacked with the dreadful disease, and continued to rave till death ended his sufferings. He was a young man about thirty years of age, and leaves a widow to mourn his loss.

The Twenty-Third Annual Meeting of the American Institute of Instruction will be held at Troy on the 6th, 7th and 9th of August. Among the distinguished friends of education announced to take part in the exercises of the Institute, we notice the names of Rev. John Pierpont, Mr. Geo. B. Emerson, and Hon. Henry Barnard.

We hear from Albany, that the Banking Department has never been so busy as at present. A large amount of Securities has recently been deposited as a basis for circulating notes, and the officers of the Department are fully employed in preparing the notes. A larger portion than usual of the Securities are Bonds and Mortgages, in consequence of the high price of Stocks.

Mr. Towers, one of the first settlers of Cattaraugus Co., was found dead in his room, on the morning of the 22d ult., at the residence of his son, J. Towers, in Conewango. He was discovered by the family seated in a chair, with folded hands, leaning forward, his neck resting upon a rope attached to a rafter above, and his throat cut. He was about 75 years of age, and has been for some time in feeble health.

At Baltimore, Wednesday, Aug. 4, 1852, a camphene lamp exploded in a store on Fayette-st., in consequence of carelessness in filling, seriously burning three persons—Mrs. Eckhardt, the keeper of the store, Miss Agnes Ficke, and a young girl named Augusta Steiner. Miss Ficke died, and the others are in a dangerous condition.

An enormous rattlesnake, five feet two inches in length, and as thick as a snake of the tropics, was killed by H. A. Richmond, on the 24th ult. He weighed eight or ten pounds, was eighteen years of age, and was coiled for a spring when Mr. R. discovered him, in the town of Hebron, Ct.

The receipts of the Hudson River R. R. for July exceed $86,000, which is in excess of the estimate made late in the month. The number of passengers transported was 135,000. The lamentable burning of the Henry Clay undoubtedly increased materially the business of the Road, during the last few days of the month.

There are now forty-three newspapers published in Texas, and prospectuses of some four or five more have been issued. The Austin State Gazette remarks, that this is a greater number of papers, according to the population, than are published in any other State of the Union, and speaks volumes for the intelligence and public spirit of the people of Texas.

A man by the name of C. Godfrey, a resident of St. Paul, and a carpenter by trade, came on board the steamboat Nominge, at that place, with his child, and registered his name. He then left the child, and went to the Tremont House and murdered his wife by shooting her. Two balls entered her body. Godfrey then escaped across the river. Jealousy was said to have been the cause.

The Governor and Council of New Hampshire have granted a pardon to Kate Virginia Poole, to take effect the 12th of August. She was sentenced to the State Prison for life, for killing her infant child by throwing it from the window of a railroad car, probably in a fit of insanity brought on by excessive grief and ill-usage.

A late number of the London Illustrated News says that the Democrats refused to nominate Rufus King for the Vice-Presidency at the late Baltimore Convention, and that the Whigs balloted lustily for Douglas for the Presidency. It says also, that Albany contributed $300 to the Kossuth Fund, while "the State of New England" forked over $1000!

We learn from the Beach Bird, published at Newport, that Mr. Greenough, the sculptor, who is spending the summer in Newport, has offered, in case the town or any company of persons will buy the Mill lot, and fitly inclose it for the purpose, to present and place there the statue of Cooper, which he is about commencing.

The Cincinnati Times says that two funeral trains met at the Two-Mile House, near that city, the one going to the cemetery and the other returning from it. Both stopped, and the men alighted to drink. A general fight ensued, in which several persons were severely bruised, and the coffin considerably damaged.

The next meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science will be held at Cleveland, Ohio, commencing on the third Wednesday in August, (Aug. 18.) Professor Pierce, of Harvard, is President for the session, and for the ensuing year.

On Sunday, August 1, a young lady deliberately walked out into the rapids on the Canada side at the Falls, and gave herself up to the waters. Of course she was carried down the frightful depths. Her body was recovered on Monday. No cause is assigned for this strange deed.

On the 29th ult. the lightning struck the barn of John Wilcox, in Augusta, Oneida County, killing two valuable horses, and much injuring a boy who was engaged in cleaning one of them.

Major J. W. Fairfax, lately of Alexandria, has purchased Oak Hill, the farm formerly belonging to President Monroe, containing about 800 acres, near Aldie, Loudon County, Va.

By the schooner Mary B. Knapp, Capt. Wilson, from Cape Haytien, July 22, we learn that a most malignant epidemic was raging at the time, somewhat resembling the plague in its effects, carrying off large numbers of the inhabitants daily, principally of the younger class. The Mary B. Knapp lost two of her crew in port.

Robert Rantoul, Jr., Member of the House of Representatives from Massachusetts, died at Washington on Sunday morning last about 11 o'clock, of acute erysipelas. Mr. R. was born at Beverly Mass., was educated at Harvard College, at which institution he graduated in 1826. He must have been at the time of his death not far from forty-five years of age.

On Thursday evening, 29th ult., about 6½ o'clock, a violent tornado suddenly passed over Sunbury, Pa., and in its course swept from its foundation that portion of the Northumberland Bridge spanning the river from the island to the Sunbury shore. The bridge now lies crushed in a mass of ruins, above the piers.

The Louisiana Constitutional Convention now in session, has, by a decided majority, refused to strike out the clause in the Constitution prohibiting and punishing dueling. The vote on the motion to strike out stood 26 for and 73 against.

The meeting of the American Scientific Association, to be held on August 18, at Cincinnati, has been postponed in consequence of the cholera along the principal routes and at the West.

Rev. Abel C. Thomas, well known as a Universalist preacher and debater, is now in England as a Missionary, writing letters to the Christian Ambassador.

In the month of June, Rachel, the French actress, gave 24 performances in different cities of France and Belgium, by which she made $16,800.

Judge De Veaux, of Niagara Co., and the richest man in that section, died at the Falls, of cholera morbus, August 3. He was 63 years of age.

The schooner Moro, which sailed from Bangor July 20, for Bridgeport, Conn., was found water-logged, and towed into Portsmouth. Crew supposed lost.

Major John Allebaugh, of Rockingham County, Va., threshed one hundred bushels of wheat from ninety-five dozen of sheaves.

The Sea Serpent, Capt. Howland, hence to San Francisco, made the passage in 112 days, calms included.

Humphrey Marshall has been confirmed as Minister to China, and will resign his seat in Congress soon.

Many of our exchanges head their paragraphs in relation to the Henry Clay catastrophe, with "The Steamboat Murders."

Col. Thos. H. Benton has been elected a Representative in Congress from the St. Louis District.

It is said that since the burning of the Henry Clay the daily receipts of the Hudson River Railroad Company have been increased $1,500.

At Rockville, R. I., on the 1st inst., by Eld. C. M. Lewis, Mr. ANDREW R. BRAY, of Hopkinton, to Mrs. SARAH A. RATHBONE, of Richmondtown.

DIED,

At Shiloh, N. J., on the 1st inst., of consumption, EDMOND D. RANDOLPH, in the 39th year of his age. He was a native of Shiloh, but for a number of years had been living in Rhode Island. Some months before his death, though emaciated, he came to this place to visit his friends and the scenes of his youth, hoping to improve his health, but, as it has been ordered in the providence of God, to be buried with his fathers. He was possessed of much firmness, and was pleasing and affable in his manners. His sickness, which was attended with much suffering, was borne with Christian fortitude and resignation, and he died in hope of a blessed immortality. Funeral on the 2d inst; sermon by the writer, from 2d Tim 1: 10—"Who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel?" D. C.

At Bridgeton, N. J., on the 30th ult., of consumption, CHARLES, son of Joseph and Ann Burt, aged 11 months and 25 days.

At Burr Oak, Mich., July 25th, LUCY MARIA, youngest daughter of Clark and Mary P. Needham, aged five years and five months.

Mrs. ELIZABETH P. JONES,
Teacher of the French Language and Literature.

At the opening of the Fall Term and middle of the Winter Term, TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, and continue seven weeks, for the purpose of reviewing those branches taught in District Schools, and giving each teacher an opportunity to test his own abilities in teaching and governing, by taking charge of a Model Class.

The AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT, during the Winter Term, is under the instruction of Prof. GURDON EVANS, A. M., and embraces the study of and daily recitation in Agricultural Science. Three hours each day are spent in the Laboratory, well furnished with good apparatus and chemicals, where students are instructed in the Elementary Analysis of Soils, Marls, Ashes of Plants, &c. Also, a course of Public Lectures is delivered on the application of scientific principles to practical farming.

Expenses:

Tuition, per term,	from $3 50 to $5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

Extras, per term—Penciling, $1 00; Embroidery and Monochromatic Painting, each, $3 00; Oil Painting, $6 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, $8 00; Piano Music, $10 00.

Tuition settled in advance, or by satisfactory arrangement.

Board in the Boarding Hall or Private Families, from $1 25 to $1 75 per week. The entire expense of the year, including board, room, fire, lights, and tuition, need not exceed $82 00.

The aim of the Institution is to impart a thorough, practical, and complete academic education. In the Natural Sciences, all the facilities usually enjoyed in Academies, are presented to the student. In the Classical Department, those Latin and Greek authors read in a College Course are studied. A strict and wholesome discipline is enforced. Courses of Lectures, either moral, miscellaneous, or scientific, are given each term in the year.

For further information, address the Principal, the President, Rev. Wm. M. Jones of Shiloh, or Rev. Sheppard R. Kollock, D. D., of Greenwich, N. J.

SHILOH, N. J., July 19, 1852.

Milton Academy.

THE Fall Term of 1852 will commence Aug. 24, and close Nov. 25.

The Second Term will commence Nov. 30, and will also continue 13 weeks and 2 days.

Tuition:

Tuition must be paid before entering classes, which will vary, according to studies, from $3 00 to $5 00 per Term.

Advantages:

The New Hall, in which the School is at present conducted, affording convenient recitation-rooms, presents increased advantages to those attending with us.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Miscellaneous.

The New Crystal Palace.

This wondrous production of the century is not to be destroyed in a day, as seemed at one time to be its destiny. Enlarged and beautified in its outward appearance, and filled with the most elegant productions of nature and art, it will present one of the chief objects of attraction to the traveler, and a lasting source of interest to the residents of London. The London Inquirer gives the following description of the intended arrangement of the building:

"In a twelvemonth, we are assured, the late Crystal Palace will have been transferred from Hyde Park to the hill between Sydenham and Norwood. As the site is said to be only a few feet below the crest of a hill which cannot be less than three hundred feet above high-water mark, and as the whole nave of the new building is to be arched like the existing transept, and a new center transept substituted, twice as high as the present, the Crystal Palace will not lose by the change. The whole of the vast building, from its arched roof to the platform on which it stands, will be seen from every eminence near London; at some points, forty miles off, it will be a conspicuous object in the distant horizon; it will be visible from its present site, and will be the first sign of this metropolis that meets the eyes of most foreigners arriving from Germany or France. The total length of the building will be one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three feet, the extreme width three hundred and eighty-four feet. The sloping form of the ground on which the building is to stand will be made available for the various works below the floor line, necessary for the heating of the interior, for machinery, and for the stores required in a building of a permanent character. The interior will be arranged on the following "general principles." At one end the climate and vegetation will be those of the tropics, gradually changing, until, at the center transept, a temperate climate and temperate vegetation are reached, which will prevail throughout the remainder of the building. Portions of the Palace will be converted into quadrangles similar to the fine art or mediæval courts of the Exhibition. These courts will be made to represent the manners, customs, &c., of different countries. For instance, one court will form an Indian bazar, with adjoining durbars and reception-rooms. Here all the illustrations of Indian life will be collected in as vivid and characteristic a manner as possible. Another quadrangle will be devoted to the illustration of China. A third will contain a reproduction of one of the courts of the Alhambra by Mr. Jones; and a fourth will exhibit a Pompeian house fully restored. In one of the smaller transepts there will be Egyptian antiquities, casts from the celebrated reliefs, illustrative of the trades of Egypt, and from the most noted statues; all colored exactly like the originals, and so disposed as not to be a mere dead collection of individual objects, but a living reproduction of Egyptian manners and things. In another part there will be presented a Nineveh palace. Steps have been already taken to procure collections of sculpture, of architecture, and of ornaments illustrating the progress of those arts from their commencement to the present time. The sculptures will include the finest works of the great European galleries, and of the modern schools. A large space will be set apart for geological specimens, arranged in the order of the strata, accompanied by maps, views and sections of the country, specimens of vegetation, &c. Modern machinery and manufactures will be largely represented in exhibitions of materials from their raw states, in every progressive condition up to manufactured articles. Up the center of the nave, fountains of various descriptions will play. The principal, or Victoria Fountain, in the park, will play one hundred and fifty feet high; that is to say, twenty feet higher than the Nelson column in Trafalgar Square.

From the Memoirs of Margaret F. Ossoli.

A Night on Ben-Lomond.

On reaching the peak, the sight was one of beauty and grandeur, such as imagination never painted. You see around you no plain ground, but, on every side, constellations or groups of hills, exquisitely dressed in the soft purple of the heather, amid which gleam the lakes, like eyes that tell the secrets of the earth, and drink in those of the heavens. Peak beyond peak caught from the shifting light all the colors of the prism, and on the farthest, angel-companies seemed hovering in white robes.

About four o'clock we began our descent. Near the summit the traces of the path are not distinct, and I said to Mr. S., after a while, that we had lost it. He said he thought it was of no consequence; we could find our way down. I said I thought it was, as the ground was full of springs, that were bridged over in the pathway. He accordingly went to look for it and I stood still, because I was so tired that I did not like to waste any labor. Soon he called to me that he had found it, and I followed in the direction where he seemed to be. But I mistook, overshot it, and saw him no more.

* * * I soon sank down utterly exhausted. When able to get up again, and look about me, it was completely dark. I saw, far below me, a light that looked about as big as a pin's head, that I knew to be from the inn at Rowardennan, but heard no sound, except the rush of the waterfall, and the sighing of the night wind.

For the first few minutes after I perceived I had got to my night's lodging, such as it was, the circumstances looked appalling. I was very lightly clad, my feet and dress were very wet. I had only a little shawl to throw around me, and the cold autumn wind had already come, and the night mist was to fall on me, all fevered and exhausted as I was. I thought I should not live through the night, or, if I did, I must be an invalid henceforward. I could not even keep myself warm by walking; for now it was dark, it would be dangerous to stir. My only chance, however, lay in motion; and so convinced was I of this, that I did keep in motion the whole of that long night, imprisoned as I was on such a little perch of that great mountain.

For about two hours I saw the stars, and very cheery and companionable they looked; but then the mist fell, and I saw nothing more, except such apparitions as visited Ossian on the hill side, when he went out by night. To me, too, came those visionary shapes. Floating slowly and gracefully, their white robes would unfurl from the great body of mist in which they had been engaged, and come upon me with a kiss pervasively cold as that of death. Then the moon arose. I could not see her; but her silver light filled the mist. Then I knew it was two o'clock, and that, having weathered out so much of the night, I might the rest; and the hours hardly seemed long to me any more.

It may give an idea of the extent of the mountain, that, though I called every now and then, with all my force, in case, by chance, some aid might be near—and though no less than twenty men, with their dogs, were looking for me—I never heard a sound except the rush of the waterfall, and the sighing of the night wind, and once or twice the starting of the grouse in the heather. It was sublime, indeed—a never-to-be-forgotten presentation of stern, serene realities. At last came the signs of day, the gradual clearing and breaking up, some faint sounds from I know not what; the little flies, too, arose from their bed amid the purple heather, and bit me. Truly, they were very welcome to do so. But what was my disappointment to find the mist so thick that I could see neither lake nor inn, nor any thing to guide me. I ascended the hill, crossed the torrent in the waterfall, first drinking some of the water, which was as good at that time as ambrosia. I crossed in that place because the waterfall made steps, as it were, to the next hill. To be sure, they were covered with water; but I was already entirely wet with the mist, so that it did not matter. I kept on scrambling, as it happened, in the right direction till about seven, when some of the shepherds found me. The moment they came, all my feverish strength departed; and they carried me home, where my arrival relieved my friends of distress far greater than I had undergone; for I had had my grand solitude, my Ossianic visions, while they had only doubt, amounting to anguish, and a fruitless search through the night.

A Visit to Abbottsford.

BY HENRY P. TAPPAN.

We came upon Abbottsford suddenly, for it was hidden from our view by a thick mass of foliage. Visitors were not allowed to drive round to the grand entrance, but stopping in the road above the mansion, passed into the grounds by a rustic gate, and descending from the garden side entered the court-yard by a postern. In the walls of the court-yard are inserted at random, stones collected from various old buildings, some with figures carved upon them, some with armorial bearings, and some with inscriptions.

The strange medley of a building which now presented itself to us, has been often described. It is a sort of fancy work, and conforms to no style of architecture. It is orginal in the very confusion which prevails, and the effect to my eye was very pleasing. In conformity with his taste, his studies, and his occupation, Scott designed to erect a building which in its very structure should be a collection of antiquities. Hence the projecting porch which forms the main entrance is copied from Linlithgow Palace; the door of the old Tolbooth of Edinburgh, with its inscription and date, is placed half way up the wall, without being used as an entrance; a doorway at the west end is built of the stones which formed the portal of the Tolbooth; a stone with a rude carving of a sword and an inscription is placed in the east side; a stone fountain which formerly stood upon the cross of Edinburgh is placed in front of the western part of the mansion; the paneling of the hall is in the main composed of the carved wainscot from the Palace of Dumfermline; and many rich carvings in the hall, as well as in other parts of the house, are copied from Melrose Abbey and Roslyn Castle. The house is about one hundred and fifty feet long, and has really a stately without an ambitious effect.

The hall is filled with curiosities, chiefly warlike. The ceiling is painted with the armorial bearings of Scott's ancestors, and the escutcheons of other families. At the east end of the hall a door opens into the study. Here are the shelves with books for immediate use, arranged above and below a gallery running along the wall and leading to the door of his dressing-room. Here is the writing-table and the armed chair, where he sat and wrote. In a case just by, are preserved the country dress which he last wore. I felt oppressed with sadness as I stood gazing at these memorials. All must die—all must die. It comes to this at last. The man of genius no less than the most insignificant creature. There is no escape—we must go and leave the nest empty behind us.

"He that hath found some fledg'd bird's nest may know
At first sight if the bird be flown;
But what fair dell or grove he sings in now,
That is to him unknown."

From the study a door leads into the library. This, as it should be, is the largest and most elegant room in the house, and contains from fifteen to twenty thousand volumes of general literature. The collection of books on Scottish history, antiquities, and legends, is very complete and curious. There is a likeness over the mantel-piece of Sir Walter's eldest son. A bust of himself, by Chantrey, placed there since his death, a bust of Shakspere copied from one at Stratford, and a silver urn presented by Lord Byron, arrest the eye of every one.

The windows look out upon the Tweed. Between the house and the river is a fine sloping lawn. Beyond the river the country rises into undulating and cultivated hills.

At the west end of the library you enter the drawing-room, which is furnished with ebony chairs, presented by George IV. The next room in succession is the armory, filled with a very curious collection of arms of different ages and nations. A pistol of Claverhouse, and a musket of Rob Roy, bearing his initials, were the most appropriate. Then follows the dining room, filled with family and other pictures. A small parlor, containing a fine collection of drawings, terminates the suite of apartments. We again entered the hall and were ushered out. The individual who waits on visitors is a jaunty housekeeper, with all a housekeeper's importance, and who, if you do not make a firm resistance, will hurry you through the apartments. Perhaps she ought to be excused, for her duty is to her like a perpetual repetition of the alphabet.

The estate of Abbottsford contains two thousand acres. Sir Walter found it bare and unsightly, but it was to him a charmed region. Although generally of a light soil, he has made it valuable as well as beautiful by a judicious planting of trees, which are now well grown, and if properly managed must in time yield a considerable income.

At the death of the second Sir Walter the title became extinct, and the property passed into the hands of Lockhart, the grandson of the poet. The mortgages had been paid off by the sale of his works, when the grandson, as I am informed, who belongs to the Queen's Life Guards, again incumbered it; and it has now passed into the hands of Mr. Hope, a broker of London, who married a sister of young Lockhart.

Abbottsford impressed me as a very proper, and not an ambitious residence of the great novelist. It was entirely adapted to his own tastes, and must be a most incongruous residence for a London banker, or any one but a poet or a man of letters.

The Crops in New York.

Having run over a good part of our State within the past ten days, (says the editor of the N. Y. Tribune,) we have made notes on the growing or harvested crops of 1852 throughout this State, which sum up as follows:—

Wheat.—The general yield has been good, and the grain is bright and sound. We hear of partial failure in certain localities, but believe the average yield is a large one. It is now all secured. Very little is now grown in the eastern half of the State, while throughout the valley of the Genesee and its neighborhood it is a chief staple.

Rye.—Little grown, but that little has come in well. Rye is a sure crop, and this has been a good year for it.

Oats.—A great breadth sown, especially through the eastern half of the State. So much as was got in early is turning out pretty well, though rather short in the straw, by reason of the general drouth; the late sown is not yet ripe throughout the northern and hill country, but will probably come in light.

Indian Corn.—A large area planted, but the yield will not be more than two-thirds of a full one. The Spring was cold and backward; the Summer has been dry and not particularly warm; and, though there are some good fields on the warm plains of Long Island and in the rich bottoms of the rivers, the general aspect in discouraging. On the uplands of Delaware, Chenango, Madison, Herkimer, &c., we think there will not be half a crop.

Potatoes.—A great breadth was planted last Spring, and, in spite of the severe drouth, they generally promise well. We never saw the Potato look more healthy and thrifty when in blossom than it does now through most of our State. Since the rot attacked the Potato, its yield has been greatly diminished, but we shall be disappointed if the crop of 1852 is not a good one, and the price more moderate than it has been for five or six years.

Hay and Grass.—Hay has come in light almost universally; there certainly cannot be two-thirds of a crop throughout the State; we think not half a one through the southern half of it. Oat straw must be largely relied on for fodder the coming winter. We have not observed that the farmers have provided for the inevitable deficiency by sowing Roots as they should have done through the last month. Pasturage is very short; many of the hill pastures of Chenango, Delaware, &c., are utterly bare of grass, and cattle are suffering in consequence. The drouth is most severe throughout the Delaware and Susquehanna region; we crossed streams whereon saw-mills are run for several months in each year now destitute of a drop of running water. Butter and Cheese must inevitably be deficient, and lean Beef superabundant this fall, unless other grazing sections have fared better for rain than ours have.

Fruit.—Fall Fruit will be scarce this year. Peaches are scarce and late; a great many trees were killed by the severe cold of last winter. Apples were in good part cut off by late frosts in May; those which were not are small and late, but rather numerous than otherwise. There never before was such a scarcity of Dried Fruit in our City as this summer, and we advise all who have either Apples of Peaches fit to dry, to save them carefully.

A Brick worth putting in one's Hat.

The Courrier des Etats Unis contains the following curious French anecdote: A working mason, named Jaques Brefond, having a job to repair a chimney for M. Lucien T——, a literary man of Rue des Francs Bourgeois, Paris, picked up a brick and broke it to use the pieces. He noticed with surprise that it was hollow, and had in the cavity a folded paper, which he at once recognized as a bank note for five hundred francs. The workman was alone, and might have appropriated this singular treasure-trove, but he hastened to inform M. Lucien T., who was the unconscious owner of the sum. The truth was, he had two months before sent a request for some money to his uncle, recently established in Amsterdam. In return he received a small package carefully done up, on which he paid the freight. After having removed the envelop, he saw the brick in question. He angrily threw it away, and, supposing he had been insulted by his uncle, sent him an acrimonious letter, to which he received no answer. M. Lucien T. was ignorant that it is the custom in Holland to send gold and bank bills in brick prepared for the purpose, in order to make a saving by substituting the trifling freight of a small parcel for the heavy postage on the money. He applied himself to remove the misunderstanding with his uncle, after having offered the mason a reward, which the latter refused to accept.

Slave Decision in Texas.

A case has been decided in the District Court for the country of Bexar, in Texas, which, if confirmed in the Supreme Court, will operate, it is said, to declare several thousands of blacks free, who have been held heretofore as slaves. A slave woman was carried from the United States to Austin's Colony, in Texas, in 1826. Slavery was not recognized by the laws of Mexico at the time. The Constitution of Coahuila and Texas was proclaimed early in 1827, and the woman, the subject of suit, daughter of the original slave, was born on the Brazos about the middle of 1827. When the Constitution of 1830 was adopted by the Republic of Texas, Slavery was established, and the mother slave was of the class enumerated in that Constitution as slaves. The daughter, having been born in the country, was not included by the provisions of the Constitution.

In a suit, involving the question of the freedom of this girl, it has been decided that the condition of blacks in the country during the existence of the Mexican law was that of freedom, and that the act of sovereign power in remanding them to the original condition of slaves, which they held when imported from the United States, did not affect their offspring born in the country, before the adoption of the Constitution of the Republic, who are consequently free.

The World is Bright before Thee.

BY FITZ GREENE HALLECK.

The world is bright before thee,
Its summer flowers are thine;
Its calm blue sky is o'er thee—
Thy bosom virtue's shine;
And thine the sunbeam given
To nature's morning hour,
Pure, warm, as when from heaven
It bursts from Eden's bower.

There is a song of sorrow—
The death-dirge of the gay—
That tells, ere dawn of morrow,
These charms may fade away,
The sun's bright beams be shaded,
That sky be blue no more;
The summer flower be faded,
And youth's warm promise o'er.

Believe it not, though lonely
The evening home may be,
Though beauty's bark can only
Float on a summer sea;
Though time thy bloom is stealing,
There's still beyond his art
The wild flower wreath of feeling—
The sunbeam of the heart.

Society in the Australian Gold Fields.

The following letter appeared in the Geelong Advertiser, and is stated to be furnished by a very respectable correspondent:—

"A month's sojourn on Fryar's Creek has given me a deep insight into the morale of the diggings, and opened up scenes that I could not have anticipated during the rosy days when the wonders of Ballarat first flushed our imaginations with the prospect of vast fields of illimitable wealth. At Ballarat, there was peace, unity and security, but at Fryar's Creek these desirable qualities are reversed, and quarrels, dissensions, bloodshed, and danger of the direst description reign supreme. The Government is palsied, while the ill-door runs on a career of unchecked crime and rapine, or at the most is checked by an occasional pistol shot, or similar act of summary justice, responded to by a groan, and the effect manifested next morning by blood stains, when a few observations are bandied about from tent to tent, that a man was shot, and no more is heard of the matter. A surgeon is called in to attend a wounded man, no questions are asked, the fee is paid, and if the man die, he is disposed of. I speak from experience, and fearlessly say, that in retiring to rest the same precautions are necessary and are had recourse to, as though one were in the heart of an enemy's country, and feared a midnight onslaught—guns and pistols are loaded, sentinels appointed for the nightly watch, and intruders at their peril are warned to stand off; and if wild justice be occasionally executed, the evil cannot be imputed to those who stand in defense of themselves and their hard-earned treasures, but to the necessity of the time, and the laxity of the ruling powers."

Life and Death of an Oyster.

The life of shell-fish is not one of unvarying rest. Observe the phases of an individual oyster from the moment of its earliest embryo life, independent of material ties, to the consummation of its destiny, when the knife of fate shall sever its muscular cords, and doom it to entombment in a living sepulchre. How starts it forth into the world of waters? Not, as unenlightened people believe, in the shape of a minute, bivalved, protected, grave, fixed and steady oysterling. No; it enters upon its career as lightly as a butterfly or a swallow skims through the air.

Its first appearance is a microscope oyster-cherub, with wing-like lobes, flanking a mouth and shoulders unencumbered with inferior crural prolongations. It passes through a joyous and vivacious juvenility, skipping up and down, as if in mockery of its heavy and immoveable parents. It voyages from oyster-bed to oyster-bed, and, if in luck, so as to escape the watchful enemies that lie in wait or prowl about to prey upon youth and inexperience, at length, having sown its wild oats, settles down into a steady, solid, domestic oyster. It becomes the parent of fresh broods of oyster-cherubs. As such it would live and die, leaving its shell, thickening through old age, to serve as its monument throughout all times—a contribution towards the construction of a fresh geological epoch, and a new layer of the earth's crust—were it not for the gluttony of man, who, rending this sober citizen of the sea from his native bed, carries him, unresisting, to the busy cities and hum of crowds. If a handsome, well-shaped and well-flavored oyster, he is introduced to the palaces of the rich and noble, like a wit, or a philosopher, or a poet, to give additional relish to their sumptuous feast. If a sturdy, thick-backed, strong-tasted individual, fate consigns him to the capacious mouth of a street fish-monger, from whence, dosed with coarse black pepper and pungent vinegar, embalmed partly after the fashion of an Egyptian king, he is transferred to the hungry stomach of a costermonger. Bloody Tragedy.

The usually quiet village of Northville, near Milford, Conn., was thrown into a state of excitement on Friday afternoon, July 30, in consequence of a most diabolical attempt having been made upon the life of Miss Marilla Buck, a highly respectable young lady, and teacher of the district school at that place, by Major Howes, a young man 21 years of age, residing in Bethlehem, who heretofore has sustained a good character. From such facts as could be elicited from various citizens of Northville, it appears that Howes became enamored of the charms of Miss Buck some months ago, cultivated her acquaintance, and it is said even went so far as to solicit her hand in marriage. What success he met with we know not, but according to the rumor which was in circulation in the neighborhood, he was somewhat encouraged by Miss B., who gave him to understand that he was looked upon with some favor; but as their acquaintance continued, the high estimate she had formed of Howes' character, in various important particulars, changed, and fell to such a degree, that it was deemed prudent and necessary on her part that the intimacy between them should forever cease. Howes being informed by Miss Buck that his company was no longer desirable, became very angry, and instead of abandoning his suit, made himself very obnoxious by calling on and annoying her at the school-house, during business hours, &c., &c. She, finding it extremely difficult, and next to impossible, to rid herself of his company, as is reported, offered him $100 to leave, and never trouble her again. He left as desired, but at 2 o'clock, on Friday afternoon, returned to the school-house, and demanded of her the money, which she had previously offered, in case her wishes in regard to him should be complied with. Miss B. requested him to withdraw from the school, until its close for the day, (as that was neither an appropriate time nor place for the settlement of their business,) when she would talk with him, but he refused to do so, and without further provocation drew a large jack-knife from his pocket, the blade of which was very long and sharp, seized her by the neck, and inflicted five distinct and terrible stabs across her throat, some of which, it is feared, will prove fatal. From the wounds the blood flew in different directions about the school-house, creating the greatest horror and consternation among the scholars, who fled from the premises, and screamed murder, &c., at the top of their voices. The unfortunate female, in endeavoring with her hands to keep the weapon from her throat, had several of her fingers nearly severed. After a most herculean effort, she managed to disengage herself from the grasp of the murderous villain, and ran into the street literally covered with blood, and presenting the most horrible spectacle. She was there met by some citizens and conveyed to the nearest dwelling. A physician was soon in attendance and dressed her wounds, which are of a very serious character, and may prove fatal. There are hopes, however, of her recovery. The assassin, after inflicting the violence, precipitated himself, face downward, into a shallow stream of water near by, from which he was not rescued till nearly drowned. He was resuscitated and taken into custody by Constable Knapp, of Northville, who took him to Litchfield County Prison. [Tribune.

A Remarkable Case of Longevity.

Mr. Edwin Gray, the missionary of the Evangelical Home Missionary Society of Kensington, says the Philadelphia Ledger, reports that he visited a Mrs. McElroy, residing at No. 622 North Third street, who will be one hundred and eight years old the 26th inst. Her maiden name was Catharine Snip. She was born in Allentown, Northampton county, Pennsylvania, on the 25th of July, 1744. She inherits the constitution of her father, who was from Germany, and lived to be one hundred and seven years of age. She remembers the occurrence of the principal events of the revolution, and frequently provided food for the American soldiers. She has a distinct recollection of General Washington. In 1790, when forty-six years of age, she was married to John McElroy, a revolutionary soldier, by whom she had seven children, four of whom are now living, two of them being twins. She had a remarkably vigorous constitution, and often assisted her husband in the mill before they came to Philadelphia. She would take up a bag containing 112 pounds of flour, with all ease, and place it on the back of a horse. She still retains much strength and activity, and would be taken for a woman of sixty or seventy, instead of 108 years of age. Twenty-one years ago, she received what is termed second sight. She can now see as clearly and distinctly as ever, and does all her housework, waits upon her youngest daughter, fifty-one years of age, who has been blind for three years past, and attends a store or shop, which they keep in the front room. Her strength, however, is beginning to fail, and the labor and attention required of her is more than she can long endure.

Singular Animals in South America.

In many of the habitations in the Indian villages, as we pass up the great rivers of South America, is found a very singular animal. It is of a soft spongy nature, and smooth skin, not unlike the large slug of England. It is brought into the hut with fire-wood; or it may creep up the side, and get on the edge of the rafters of the ceiling, to which it adheres, looking like a small ball, or, more properly, like the slug coiled up. It is frequently known to drop from its hold without being molested, and wherever it falls, it throws out from its body five or six fangs, which are barbed like a fish-hook, and into whatever softer material than brick or stone it chances to fall, these fangs enter; nor can it be removed except by cutting the animal off, and picking the prongs out of the substance into which they are so firmly fastened. When they fall on the persons who sit or stand underneath, the consequence is dreadful.

I saw one man, who an hour or two before had one of these creatures alight on his hand, and he was obliged to have it cut off, and the claws and fangs removed by picking them out with the point of a large needle. His hand was immoderately swelled, and very painful; but an immersion in warm oil or fat removed the pain, and restored the hand to its usual appearance.

One of the drollest occurrences in the annals of gallantry is related of Gibbon the historian, who was short in stature and very fat. One day, being alone with the beautiful Madame de Crouzas, he dropped on his knees before her, and made a declaration of his love in the most passionate terms. The astonished lady rejected his suit and requested him to rise. "Rise, Mr. Gibbon, I beseech you rise." Mr. Gibbon still kept his posture "Mr. Gibbon, will you have the goodness to get up?" "Alas! Madame," faltered the unlucky lover, "I cannot." He was too fat to regain his feet without assistance. Madame de Crouzas rang the bell, and said to her servant, "Lift up Mr. Gibbon."

The jug is a most singular utensil. A pail, tumbler or decanter can be rinsed, and you may satisfy yourself by optical proof that it is clean; but the jug has a little hole in the top, and the interior is all darkness. No eye penetrates it, no hand moves over the surface. You can clean it only by putting in water, shaking it up and pouring it out. If the water comes out clean, you judge you have succeeded in cleaning the jug, and vice versa. Hence the jug is like the human heart. No mortal eye can look into its recesses, and you can judge only of its purity by what comes out of it.

A gentleman called some time since to consult a physician with regard to a rheumatic attack, which caused him much pain. The doctor immediately sat down, and wrote a prescription. As the patient was going away, the doctor called him back: "By the way, sir, should my prescription happen to afford you any relief, please let me know, as I am myself suffering from an affection similar to yours, and for the last twenty years have tried in vain to cure it."

We met a gentleman in a bookstore the other evening, searching for the origin of the multiplication table. It was invented by Pythagoras, the Grecian philospher, 528 years before Christ, and is thus 2391 years old. It has done great service in the world in the study of mathematics.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels. Surveyors' Compasses, Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June, of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, Teacher of Mathematics.

The Terms of 1852 and 1853 are as follows—

The first Term commences Wednesday, August 25; closes Tuesday, Nov. 30.

The second commences Thursday, Dec. 2; closes Tuesday, March 15.

The third commences Thursday, March 17; closes Tuesday, June 28.

There will be a recess of one day between the Terms, and of one week at the middle of the Winter Term.

Tuition must be arranged before entering classes, and, if less than a Term, paid strictly in advance.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Analysis, Composition, and Beginners in Algebra,	4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.,	5 00
Heating and Sweeping Halls, Ringing Bell, &c.	50

Extras.—Chemical Experiments, $1; Drawing, $1; Monochromatic Painting, $3; Oil Painting, $5; Writing and Stationery, 50 cents.

Board.—In private families, from $1 25 to $1 50 per week. In Clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

N. B.—Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the Common School Branches, with daily Lectures on "the Art of Teaching," the Laws of Health, School Laws, Chemistry, Physiology, &c. Tuition, $2 50. The Sabbath Recorder.

SUNDAY IN PARIS IN 1852.

BY PERCY B. ST. JOHN.

Paris is a remarkable town, as all the world knows—remarkable as a city, and remarkable as the capital of the most restless nation in the world. For fighting and frolicking, no population is more renowned; and strangers can take the latter characteristic at a glance, by an examination of one day—and that day Sunday. Your true Parisian is always amusing himself; business with him is quite a secondary consideration, and one half of it is transacted over breakfasts and dinners, or while indulging in coffee and cigars, in the evening. The multitude of wine-shops, dining-rooms, coffee-houses, and estaminets, or smoking-coffee-houses, is of itself an illustration of the character of a people who know not the pleasures of home. They take their meals in public establishments, they spend their evenings in the same, and are, in fact, an out-door population. Theaters, concert-rooms, balls, billiard-rooms, are found in every hole and corner, and are always full; but it is on Sunday that the Parisian comes forth in all his glory.

A foreigner, who shall have been a few days in Paris, will, at the first glance, scarcely notice the difference between Saturday and Sunday. The number of shops which are shut in the morning is so small that they escape observation. The banking houses, and a few establishments kept by Protestants, are all that are closed. Butchers, bakers, shoemakers, mercers, money-changers, &c., are all actively at work. You may look around, and you see everything going on as usual; workmen are at work, people are buying and selling, and at first you imagine that you must have made some mistake.

But a more minute examination will soon convince you of the difference. In the first place, all the railways conducting to short distances from Paris, all the coaches which take you outside the walls, have increased their fares, for they are determined to make a rich harvest. Then all the great establishments—Louvre, Versailles, Luxemburg, &c.—are open to the public. Glance your eye over the parti-colored walls, and you will perceive, if it be summer, announcements of fetes and fairs, of horse-races and balls, of balloon ascents and tight-rope dancing, of fire-works and regattas, and many other regalements designed to extract money from the pockets of the pleasure-seeking public.

As the day advances, too, you will notice that the streets begin to fill with well-dressed people, hurrying to the railway stations that are to conduct them to Versailles, St. Cloud, St. Germains, or Amiens, or to the barriers which lead to the Bois de Boulogne, Vincennes, and the other attractive promenades round Paris. Workmen, too, are going towards the same barriers, to drink wine which has not paid the city dues, to eat matoletes and fried fish, and dance at two-penny hops, called guinguettes, in the evening. Groups of students, with broad-brimmed hats and long pipes, each with a grisette under his arm, are also on the move, throwing law, physic, and painting to the winds, to think only of pleasure. Staring about them, and sailing along with a puzzled air, almost ashamed of themselves, perhaps you remark a lot of English, who are also bent on seeing life in Paris.

The magnificent avenue of the Champs Elysees, the gardens of the Tuilleries, the galleries of the Louvre, begin to fill; and yet the shops are open still, and one wonders where all the people come from. But, if the day be fine—and it is far oftener than not—about two o'clock the shops begin to close, and their proprietors also issue forth to join the busy throng. Every place which caters for the public now fills. The Palaces of Versailles, the Park, the Palace of St. Cloud, &c., are crammed, while perhaps a dozen or twenty fairs are so thronged as to make walking unpleasant. Shows, conjours, booths for eating and drinking, lotteries where nobody gains anything, rouge-et-noir tables, are all at work. The noise is terrible; trumpets, drums, and fiddles, make an unceasing din, and the chattering of the people crowns all. If the grand play is at Versailles, there is the great crowd; if the waters of St. Cloud, that is the attraction. But there is something every Sunday. If not either of these celebrated shows, there are fetes, where there are booths and dancing, with lots of cheap wine and brandy. A regatta always draws well, and these are always fixed on Sunday; while a balloon generally takes advantage of the crowd to ascend into the air. The late unfortunate Lieutenant Gale described to a friend the sight of Paris one Sunday evening, from a balloon, as really wonderful. He could clearly distinguish at least fifty illuminated gardens, in and around the metropolis, where the people were enjoying the luxury of dancing.

A great many return to Paris to dine, but the majority generally remain to indulge in the evening amusements; so that the last two or three trains are monster trains. But everything is admirably managed; and return tickets are sold about all day in booths, good for any train, so that much pushing and driving is avoided. The French, too, are accustomed to be orderly on these occasions. The Chateau d'Asnieres, recently opened for dancing, fire-works, tight-rope, ascents, &c., usually, through the summer of 1850, had from ten to fifteen thousand visitors; but I never heard of the slightest disturbance. The people are merry and noisy; but the great feature of all Parisian amusements is the absence of drunkenness. A genuine pleasure-seeking Briton will drink more brandy than a dozen Frenchmen on such occasions. A vast majority of the frequenters of these and other gardens are the respectable shop-keepers, middle-class people, students, clerks, and young men in all stations of life. Men take their families, and their wives and daughters dance without scruple with their own friends, and even when invited with respectable strangers. They refresh themselves with coffee, small beer, syrup, and water, and other harmless drinks; the men with grog, about a third of the strength of an Englishman's allowance.

The park and lake of Enghein, the woods of Romainville, Mont-Morency, and St. Germain, and the Park of St. Cloud, are filled on the same occasion with pic-nic parties, or persons who have come out to walk, to dine in the evening, and return to Paris without joining in more noisy amusements. A party of students and shop-girls do this. But these gentlemen have a way of their own. They will go down to St. Germain for the day, very moderately provided with cash, but with an inexhaustible supply of fun and frolic. After roaming about the wood all day, smoking, laughing, running races, &c., the juvenile hopes of France find out that both they and their friends—girls who work hard at trades all the week—are hungry. There are plenty of dining-rooms in St. Germain, but the gentlemen want a good dinner at a moderate rate. So down they go to Bongival, or some other village near the river, and enter a marchand de vin traiteur, or wine shop, where dinners are also provided. They secure a room, or a part of one, and then down goes the keenest wit of the lot to order the meal and dispute the prices. The gentleman enters the kitchen, examines the larder, smells at the pots and pans, and then tells them what he wants. He readily finds all that he requires, but not at his own price. But your wide-awake student never pays much above half what he is asked.

"How much for this fowl?" seizing the two-legged creature by one leg, and holding it up.

"Four francs and a half—see how fine and fat it is."

"Two francs—not a centime more; why, it's only a mouthful, and has been cooked for a week!"

A tremendous tussle ensues; the cook lauds her merchandize, the student runs it down. They yield mutually, five sous at a time, and at the end of a quarter of an hour, perhaps, it is knocked down at three francs. The same with every dish, until at last a dinner for a dozen is obtained for fifteen or sixteen francs, which quiet people not used to these ways would pay thirty for. But then the students pay freely for wine, and brandy, and coffee—things which admit of no abatement.

As evening draws in, they hunt round the village for a fiddler, and generally succeed in finding one. Tables and chairs are cleared away, and our merry fellows start off into quadrilles, waltzes, and polkas, which consume the rest of the evening. Towards midnight, a very common discovery is, that all the cash of the company is spent, to say nothing of the last train being gone, which necessitates a ten-mile walk home to Paris. But all are ready. Each man lights his pipe, takes the arm of his partner, and away they start, occasionally enlivening the road by a song.

Close to Paris itself things are not very different. The Belois de Boulogne, within an easy walking distance, is densely crowded, especially by people with large families, who cannot afford railway fare for so many. Hosts of children are scattered over the wood, which is also the favorite resort of lovers—a race always partial to the country, green fields, and trees. Of an evening, the stream of people coming home from the wood is really wonderful.

During the afternoon, the Boulevards, Champs Elysees, &c., are the chief haunts of those who remain in Paris. The Hippodrame is always crowded. This place, which is at the top of the Champs Elysees, is an open circus, where ten thousand people can at a time witness feats of horsemanship. But during the past summer there have generally been forty or fifty thousand people stationed around about on Sunday to witness the strange balloon ascents of M. Poitevin. This person has certainly contrived to astonish the Parisians. In the first place, he went up on a horse, then upon an ass, and then upon an ostrich. The spectacle attracted, but was so undoubtedly dangerous, as to be painful and humiliating to every well-regulated mind. But it answered the purpose of the projectors, for it paid—and paid handsomely.

From about 5 o'clock to 8 on Sunday is the harvest for restaurants, traiteurs, cafes, &c. Paris is marvelous in this way. You can dine at any price you think proper. At the more celebrated houses, such as the Cafe de Paris, Maison Doree, Trois Fieres, Provenceaex, Vefours', a dinner comes very expensive, though a habitue will even here not much injure his pocket. But there is a mass of others where a book is placed before you, with prices marked to every dish, and where you dine for exactly what you please. The fixed-price dinners are, however, the favorite ones of a very large body. You enter a splendid suite of rooms, lit up by chandeliers, adorned by rows of mirrors; you sit down to a table; silver forks and spoons and a snow-white napkin are brought you; and you dine for one-and-eight or sixteen pence, according as you take half or a bottle of wine. You have soup, three dishes selected from a great variety, dessert, bread at discretion, and the wine, as before mentioned. On Sunday, these establishments are thronged, as are the nine-penny dinner-houses, where you get a quarter of a bottle of wine, soup, two dishes, and dessert.

A little later in the evening, other places begin to fill. Most Frenchmen indulge after dinner in a cup of black coffee, a cigar, and a small glass of brandy; while many spend every evening in a cafe, or a club, reading the papers, playing billiards, cards, or dominoes; or, if he frequents the Cafe de la Regence, chess. Few women are seen in these places. They frequent those which have chairs placed outside, in the Boulevards, and where smoking is not allowed. A warm summer evening, on the Boulevards, is an extraordinary sight to a stranger. Imagine a broad street, with wide pavement, and trees planted along at short intervals, with, at every step, brilliantly illumined cafes, with chairs and tables out upon the pavement, all crowded with well-dressed men and women, taking ices, sherbets, coffee, and other varied refreshments. Streams of people, too, move along in all directions; while even at this hour on Sunday, many shops are still open, in the vain hope of gain.

From six to eight, crowds throng at the doors of the numerous theaters, which are always well attended on Sunday, but which are crammed if it turns out a wet night. So used are the managers to a good receipt on the evening of the first day, that they do not take the trouble to provide any attractive piece, reserving that for other occasions. Regular theater-goers avoid this evening. It is shop-keepers, servants, grisettes, and those who are employed all the week, who form the larger portion of the audience. The opera, moreover, does not open, the class who frequent that house going nowhere on Sunday, except to quiet evening parties.

But during the summer Sunday evenings, it is the public gardens which form the great attraction. Paris is full of such places. The most ancient and the most celebrated is Ranelagh, in the Bois de Boulogne, which is chiefly visited by those who can afford the luxury of a carriage. But its fashionable day is not Sunday, but Thursday. Still, on Sunday, it is filled by a different class, who are attracted by a splendid ball-room, a fine band, and a pretty garden. But the genuine Paris character is better developed at Mabille and Chateau Rouge. These public gardens are unrivaled in beauty. Mabille is situated in the Champs Elysees, and is really a charming sight. Its principal dancing place is in the open air. A large circular space is surrounded by a blaze of lights, issuing from gas jets, and from lamps suspended from imitation palm-trees. The orchestra is in the center. The avenues and walks of the garden are illumined by thousands of lamps. The company is varied, but always well dressed. All ranks mingle. You see the merchant prince, the banker of European celebrity, the fashionable gentleman, the English nobleman, the cheap excursionist, the journalist, and the shop-boy and clerk, all together; some strolling about, amazed by the gay scene; some of the female dancers are celebrities of the hour; but many respectable persons indulge in the pleasing intoxication. The style of dancing is often peculiar, to say nothing more; and the police are often needed to check the exuberance of animal spirits manifested by some of the performers. But there is no drunkenne s, no bad language, nothing to blazen forth to the eye anything which may be vicious, in all this. A polite master of the ceremonies generally checks, by a hint, any departure from the rules of propriety. These places of amusement open at 7, and close at 11, except on rare occasions, when they last all night.

Paris is, on the whole, a very early town. About eleven all public establishments begin to close. From that hour the streets, after a brief interval of liveliness, begin to thin—people hurry home. Gardens, theaters, ball-rooms, coffee-houses, discharge their thousands, and about a quarter of an hour after midnight, Paris is like the city of the dead. But for the lamps, a stray sentry, a silent patrol walking along at a slow pace, and an early cart or two making towards the market-place, a stranger would fancy himself in a deserted town. Round about the halle, or market, there is a bustle, and a few night-houses, but everywhere else all is still. Not even a policemen can be met, to remind you of the bustle and activity, life and animation, which an hour before has characterized the vast capital, which never, however, so thoroughly exhibits itself in its true light as it does on Sunday.

"DON'T PUT IT OFF."

In a recent revival in Canada West, the minister gave to a young man, who said that he had determined not to think any more of the subject of religion, at least for the present, the tract "Don't put it off." It arrested his attention, and, by God's grace, he was led to determine from that hour to attend to the great subject of his soul's salvation. A neighbor coming in the next morning, was asked to attend the meeting. He replied, "As for me, I can get religion any time I please, and I do not intend to trouble myself about it for two years yet." The young man then gave him the same tract, and urged him to read it, telling him that it had done him good. He took it, went home, and read it. Conviction was riveted on his mind; he saw his lost condition, and felt his guilt for having sinned so long against God. "Oh," said he, "what a sinner, what a fool I am, to think of putting off this subject for two years, when I have not the guaranty that I shall live two hours. I fear I am such a wretch that God will not save me." After a few weeks of pungent conviction and deep spiritual exercises, both these young men were led to experience hope of pardon and acceptance with God, and the minister had the pleasure of receiving them both into the fellowship of the church.

TRADITION AND SCRIPTURE.

The talented author of "Cautions for the Times" illustrates the uncertainty of tradition, compared with Scripture, by putting this familiar case: "A footman brings you a letter from a friend upon whose word you can perfectly rely, giving an account of something that has happened to himself, and the exact account of which you are greatly concerned to know. While you are reading and answering the letter, the footman goes into the kitchen, and there gives your cook an account of the same thing, which, he says, he heard the upper servants at home talking over, as related to them by the valet, who said he had it from your friend's son's own lips. The cook retails the story to your groom, and he, in turn, tells you. Would you judge of that story by the letter?" The Bible shows how rapidly tradition becomes untruthful from that passage in St. John, where Jesus Christ says to Peter, in answer to his question, what John should do, (xxi. 22,) "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Then went this saying abroad among the brethren," (oral tradition,) "that that disciple should not die." Christ also says, "Thus have ye made the commandment of God of none effect by your traditions." [Prot. Epis.

"THE ROCK THAT IS HIGHER THAN I."

In seasons of grief, to my God I'll repair;
When my heart is o'erwhelmed with sorrow and care,
From the ends of the earth, unto Thee will I cry,
"Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I."

When Satan, the tempter, comes in like a flood,
And would draw my poor soul from the fountain of good,
I will gird on my armor, in faith loud I'll cry,
"Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I."

When sickness o'erwhelms me, and pain is severe,
And none be about me to comfort and cheer,
I will pray to my Saviour, who for me did die,
"Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I."

And when I have ended my pilgrimage here,
In Jesus' pure righteousness may I appear!
In the swellings of Jordan, assured, I'll rely Upon Jesus, the Rock that is higher than I.

And when the last trumpet shall sound through the skies,
And the dead from the dust of the earth shall arise,
With the millions I'll join, far above yonder sky,
To praise the dear Rock that is higher than I.

THE CAPTAIN TURNED PREACHER.

A lady, who was actively engaged in the distribution of the Holy Scriptures and religious tracts, went on one occasion to the quay at Plymouth, and requested permission of a captain to go on board a man-of-war, in which there were about eight hundred men, and many dissipated females. The captain said—

"Madam, it will be of no avail; you will only meet with abuse."

She answered, "With your leave I'll go."

"Certainly, madam," he replied; and she went. Something occurred during the time which irritated the captain, who swore a most dreadful oath. The lady said—

"Sir, as you have granted me one favor, I hope you will confer another."

"Certainly, madam," was the reply.

"It is then, sir, that you will please to keep from swearing while I am on your ship?" This he complied with. After the lady had gone round the ship, and given away some tracts, (and, to the honor of British sailors, be it spoken, they treated her with the greatest respect,) she returned to the captain, who was standing at the entrance of the vessel. She thanked him kindly, and said—

"I have yet one more favor to ask of you, sir; I hope you will comply with it."

"Yes, certainly, madam," was the reply.

"It is this," she said, presenting him with the New Testament; "I desire you will read it through twice." He replied, "I will, madam, for my word's sake."

Some years afterward, when on a vist to a place about five miles from Plymouth, on a Sunday, she went to church, where she heard an excellent sermon. As she was returning through the church-yard, a gentleman accosted her and said,

"Do you remember, madam, giving to a captain a New Testament, after distributing some tracts on board a man-of-war, and desiring him to read it through twice?"

"Yes, sir," she replied. He added,

"I am the man to whom you gave it, and I have been preaching to you to-day. Through your instrumentality God has brought me to love that book which I once despised."

THE RESURRECTION—A PARABLE.

A gentleman of the country, upon the occasion of some signal service his man had done him, gave him a curious silver cup. David (for that was the man's name) was exceedingly fond of the present, and preserved it with the greatest care. But one day, by accident, his cup fell into a vessel of aqua fortis; he, taking it to be no other than common water, thought it safe enough; and, therefore, neglected it until he had dispatched an affair of importance, about which his master had employed him, imagining it would be then time enough to take out his cup. At length a fellow-servant came into the same room, when the cup was near dissolved, and looking into the aqua fortis, asked David who had thrown anything into that vessel. David said that his cup accidentally fell into the water. Upon this, his fellow-servant informed him that it was not common water, but aqua fortis, and that his cup was almost dissolved in it. When David heard this, and was satisfied of the truth of it with his own eyes, he heartily grieved for the loss of his cup; and, at the same time, he was astonished to see the liquor as clear as if nothing at all had been dissolved in it or mixed with it. As, after a little while, he saw the small remains of it vanish, and could not now perceive the least particle of the silver, he utterly despaired of ever seeing his cup more. Upon this, he bitterly bewailed his loss with many tears, and refused to be comforted. His fellow-servant, pitying him in this condition of sorrow, told him that their master could restore him the very same cup again. David disregarded this as utterly impossible. "What do you talk of?" said he to his fellow-servant. "Do you not know that the cup is entirely dissolved, and that not the least bit of the silver is to be seen? Are not all the little invisible parts of the cup mingled with aqua fortis, and become parts of the same mass? How, then, can my master, or any man alive, produce the silver anew, and restore my cup? It can never be; I give it over for lost; I am sure I shall never see it again." His fellow-servant still insisted that their master could restore the same cup; and David as earnestly insisted that it was absolutely impossible. While they were debating this point, their master came in, and asked them what they were disputing about. When they had informed him, he says to David, "What you so positively pronounced to be impossible, you shall see me do with very little trouble. Fetch me," said he to the other servant, "some salt water, and pour into the vessel of aqua fortis. Now look," says he, "the silver will presently fall to the bottom of the vessel in a white powder." When David saw this, he began to have good hopes of seeing his cup restored. Next, his master ordered a servant to drain off the liquor, and to take up the powdered silver and melt it. Thus it was reduced into one solid piece; and then, by the silversmith's hammer, formed into a cup of the same shape as before. Thus David's cup was restored, with a very small loss of its weight and value.

It is no uncommon thing for men, like David in this parable, to imagine that to be impossible which yet persons of greater skill and wisdom than themselves easily perform. David was as positive that his master could not restore his cup, as unbelievers are, that it is incredible God should raise the dead; and he had as much appearance of reason on his side as they. If a human body, dead, crumbles into dust, and mingles with the earth, or with the water of the sea, so as to be discernable no more, so the silver cup was dissolved into parts invisible, and mingled with the mass of aqua fortis.

Is it not, then, easy to be conceived, that a man has wisdom and power enough to bring these parts of the silver to be visible again, and to reduce them to a cup as before? So God, the maker of heaven and earth, must have wisdom and power enough to bring the parts of a dissolved human body together, and to form them into a human body again. What though David could not restore his own cup? Was that a reason that no man could do it? And when his master had promised to restore it, what though David could not possibly conjecture by what method his master would do it? This was no proof that his master was at a loss for a method. So, though men cannot raise the dead, yet God, who is infinitely wiser and stronger, can. And though we cannot find out the method by which he will do this, yet we are sure that he who at first took the dust of the ground, and formed it into the body of man, can, with the same ease, take the dust into which my body shall be resolved, and form it into a human body again. Nay, if even a body be burnt, and consumed by fire, the parts of that body are no more really lost than the invisible particles of the dissolved cup. As David, then, was wrong in thinking that it was impossible for his master to restore his cup, it must be at least equally wrong for us to think it impossible that God should raise the dead. I AM NOT A MEMBER.

Why do pastors allow members of their churches to move away, in the vicinity of other churches, and not urge them to take letters of dismission with them? I have been greatly astonished in witnessing the indifference of pastors in this respect. Some pastors seem scarcely to look beyond their own church. The anxiety to swell their own numbers, or increase their pecuniary resources, and fame, have led them, in some cases, even to advise their members not to take letters. They give them letters of commendation, and tell them this is just as well.

How injudicious to the cause of Christ is such a course. One half of the members who leave thus cease to be useful. Their own piety dwindles, and they often become a curse to the church where they locate.

When a man comes among us, and settles down, still holding his membership in some other church, we often find that he feels little or no responsibility. "I am not a member," he says. He feels as though there was no responsibility, unless there is membership. Because his name is not written down upon the same page with his brethren, he can look on with all the indifference of a stranger.

He feels quite at liberty to attend, or not to attend, the appointments of the church. When in the house of God, he puts on his indifferent air. If he takes any part, the pastor must give him a polite invitation. Sometimes he posts himself up in one corner of the room, and looks on as one who has only to criticise his brethren. It is impossible for a man to stand off at arm's length thus, and not find fault with his brethren and the pastor.

He will see things in the pastor that he will not like. He cannot help doing so, for he has nothing to do but watch the pastor and his brethren, and having no responsibility, he has no sympathy, and is wholly unable to enter into and appreciate their circumstances. He is full of good counsel himself, but when he gives it, he must add, "It is nothing to me, I am not a member."

The only way to keep such men from finding fault, and close their mouths, is to roll the responsibility upon them, which they connect with membership. Now I appeal to you, pastors, do not those persons who settle down in your community, and hold their standing in other sister churches, do they not often hinder the growth of your people, and occasion great disturbance, especially if your church is a weak one? Let pastors think of these things when their members are about changing their location. [Journal and Messenger.

INFLUENCE OF A BOOK.

One hundred years ago, amidst opposition and persecution, the distinguished Samuel Davies preached the gospel at a country church in Virginia, and the fruits of his ministry were long found even in distant parts of the State, in multitudes of pious whites and blacks. The house which he occupied is still in use as a dwelling, and the church in which he preached is the same in which the congregation yet worship, though it has been fitted up in more modern and convenient style.

But Davies has been preaching ever since his death. His eloquence is heard at many a fireside, and his printed sermons will ever form a part of the religious literature of the English language.

A generation ago, a young lady in the South was waiting for some young friends, who were going with her on an excursion. The party lingering, the young lady took down a book from her father's library, to spend the time. It was Davies' Sermons. Turning to one of the discourses, she read till her companions arrived. She went with them, but the words of that book had fastened upon her mind. Upon her return from the excursion, she sought the book again, and finished the discourse. It was the means of her conversion. She became the wife of a minister, and the mother of a son. That son became a minister, and he is now the pastor of the very congregation over which Davies once presided, and preaches in the church where that sermon was probably first delivered, which brought about the conversion of his mother.

These facts show, along with many of like character, of which we hear, the value of the printed page as a means of perpetuating religious truth, and making a man a preacher not to his own generation only, but to the generations that are to live after him.

They show also the importance of a good religious library, as a part of the furniture of every house. Suppose there had been no books like Davies' Sermons, in the house of that young lady's father? Suppose she had found a yellow-backed, twenty-five cent "novel," to pass that half hour upon?

ANECDOTE OF DR. HARRIS.

The late Dr. Harris, of Dunbarton, walking out one day in one of the large villages of a neighboring State, met one of the champions of Universalism. It was General P., the leader and supporter of the large Universalist society which had for many years existed in that place. He was a high-minded man, quite wealthy, and very influential; having a good deal of general information, and considerable skill in argument, which last he did not hesitate to use whenever opportunities presented.

He and Dr. Harris were personally strangers; but knowing something of each other by reputation, they readily introduced themselves. The General very soon lifted up his standard, and commenced the war of words, not doubting that though he might fail to convince his opponent, he should at least show him that he was no ordinary combatant, but knew well on what ground he stood, and how to wield the sword of sectarian warfare to good advantage.

The Doctor heard him quietly through, then calmly turned to him and said, "Gen. P., it is of no use for us to contend. We shall not probably convince each other by arguments ever so protracted. But there is one thing in relation to this matter which deserves consideration. It is this: I can treat your religion as I please; I can turn from it as an utter abomination; I can despise it, I can spit on it and trample it under my feet—and yet, after all, I shall be saved, shan't I, General P."

The General, of course, was obliged to assent, or give up the doctrine. There was no room for evasion. "But," added the Doctor, while the General was writhing under the contempt thus thrown upon his gods, "it will not do for you to treat my religion so. If you do, you are a lost man." This was enough—nothing more was said.

DISCIPLINE IN CHILDHOOD.

"Young people who have been habitually gratified in all their desires, will not only more indulge in capricious desires, but will infallibly take it more amiss when the feelings or happiness of others require that they should be thwarted, than those who have been practically trained to the habit of subduing and restraining them, and, consequently, will in general sacrifice the happiness of others to their own selfish indulgence. To what else is the selfishness of Princes and other great people to be attributed? It is in vain to think of cultivating principles of generosity and beneficence by mere exhortation and reasoning. Nothing but the practical habit of overcoming our own selfishness, and of familiarly encountering privations and discomfort on account of others, will ever enable us to do it when required. And therefore I am firmly persuaded, that indulgence infallibly produces selfishness and hardness of heart, and that nothing but a pretty severe discipline and control can lay the foundation of a magnanimous character." [Lord Jeffrey.

WORK HARD.

The Rev. Dr. Stowell, now President of Cheshunt College, in England, was in early life a Sunday School teacher, in Great George Street Chapel, Liverpool, the scene for the last forty years of the labors of the late Dr. Raffles. One Sunday morning, while Mr. Stowell was engaged with his class, the venerable Rowland Hill, who was going to preach, walked into the room, and going up to Mr. Stowell, then a very young man, with his usual benignant smile, asked, "Pray, youngster, would you like to live long?" "Yes, sir." The old gentleman seemed to like the promptitude of the answer. "Do you know how?" "No, sir." "Would you wish me to tell you?" "Please, sir." His answer was given in two words, "Work hard." This was what he himself did, and he lived and preached till his eighty-ninth year.

We know that it is possible to work too hard, and in a few—a very few instances—we have known this done; but far more have died from rust, than from undue wear.

WHEN IT RAINS, LET IT RAIN.

When did we ever better our condition or improve ourselves by fretting and fuming over what is inevitable? It is related of Oliver Cromwell, that on the eve of an important undertaking he evinced rather more anxiety than was becoming in one who professes to believe in Divine Providence. A friend of the Protector wishing to relieve his mind, inquired, "Do you not believe that God managed the world very well before you came into it?" "Certainly I do," said the hero of the commonwealth. "And do you not believe that he will manage it equally well after you have gone out of it?" "Yes!" "Well, then, can't you trust him to govern the world while you are in it?" This lesson had its desired effect with the stout Puritan. May it be equally salutary to us; for if sound philosophy, confirmed by extensive experience, was ever couched in a few words, these words of the apostle contain it: "Godliness with contentment is great gain."

Poverty is not always an evil. It is often the stayer of enmity between man and man. It deprives malice of its venom.

THE CONVOCATIONS AT PLAINFIELD.

The approach of our Anniversaries is suggestive of a word to our readers.

We do not see why there should not be a large gathering on the occasion. At all events, we trust that the interest felt in our Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies, will awaken an effort with many to overcome small obstacles, for the sake of being present, and witnessing the deliberations. It is true, that the operations of these Societies are conducted upon a small scale, and it would be folly to pretend that they embrace as much excitement as the similar institutions of larger denominations. Nevertheless, they are our own; and the very fact that we are so feeble a people in point of numbers, should create the deepest interest in their behalf with every one of us. The failure of any one of them to accomplish the purpose for which it was instituted, would be a reproach which could not be shared by a great many thousands, and so made to sit the more lightly upon each individual, but would stir the blush to the very face of every man and woman amongst us.

Plainfield is a place easy of access. The cars of the Central Railroad arrive there, from New York, four times a day, Sundays excepted; and we believe that we risk nothing in saying, that there are not more comfortable cars, or more obliging conductors, upon any railroad in the country. And what the facilities for getting to New York are from almost all points of our denomination, we need not inform our readers; only we will say, that as there will be an opportunity for those who choose to avail themselves of the New York and Erie Railroad, to come and return for one fare, we trust that our people of the West will not leave us with a meager assembly for want of their presence. Of the courtesy and hospitality of the Plainfield people to strangers, we need not speak; they are proverbial.

We trust that our approaching convocations will be made the subject of prayer by our people generally. Heretofore, they have been very pleasant seasons. The acerbities of controversy have never yet embittered our deliberations, and we trust in God that they will not be suffered to do so now. We are not aware of any thing which will be at all likely to disturb the usual harmony; but who does not know, that when the Christian is off his guard, Satan is ready to throw in the elements of strife? "A little matter kindleth a great fire;" and as we are but imperfect creatures, with all our attainments, we hope that every one who has the interests of these several Societies at heart, will pray that God will keep us from every impropriety, and bless us largely with "that wisdom which is from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy." Thus blessed, we may expect to return to our homes edified and comforted.

Our friends on the ground—we mean those connected with the Plainfield and New Market churches—we trust, will have made their arrangements to attend throughout. The ambition of our good sisters to do up their hospitalities with eclat, is sometimes a detriment to our meetings, since it keeps them at home, and deprives us of their pleasant countenance where and when we most need it. A mere hint on this point is sufficient. Were we writing to the duller sex, we might have to speak more pointedly.

Let it be borne in mind, that collections will be called for, in aid of the funds of the several Societies. To get God's truth into circulation, we need money. To place our missionary operations upon a footing of respectability, and to insure their effectiveness, we need money. And when our brethren are about starting from their homes, or rather before they start, we hope they will calculate the amount of interest due to their Lord upon property lent to them. How much owest thou?

One other suggestion we will offer—the expediency of fixing the time of holding our Anniversaries from a month to six weeks later in the season. If it were modest to put in a few personal considerations in favor of such a change, we would hint the drudgery of preparing an Annual Report during the prostrating heat of midsummer, and the consequent difficulty of finding time to escape from the pestilential fumes, and other nuisances, of a great city, for the purpose of recruiting an enfeebled constitution. But as we shall not ask the gift of office another year, we will not enlarge on this head; only, we would remind our brethren, that whoever may have the labor to perform, he is likely to need a season of recreation as well as ourselves. T. B. B.

BLESSEDNESS OF THE PERSECUTED.

"Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake," is the language of our Saviour; and seldom has a more forcible illustration of it been given, than in the case of Mr. and Mrs. Madiai, of Florence, who were on the 8th of June last sentenced to some four years imprisonment, for reading the Bible in their own house, and admitting others to study it with them. The following letter, written by the wife to her husband, on the day before the sentence was passed, is in point.

"My dear, dear Madiai,—Thou knowest that I have always loved thee, and how much more now, when we have been together in the battle of the Great King!

"We have been cast down, but not conquered! I hope that through the august merits of Christ, the Father will accept our testimony, and that he will grant us to drink, with thanksgiving, the last drop of the portion of this bitter cup, which he has prepared for us.

"My loving Madiai, life is but a day, and a day of sufferings; yesterday, young; to-day, old! But we know that we can say with old Simeon, 'Now, Lord, let thy servants depart in peace, for our eyes have seen thy salvation!' Courage, my dearest; the Holy Spirit has, through grace, shown us that Christ, loaded with reproaches, down-trodden and insulted, is our King, our Saviour! And we, through his hallowed light and power, have defended the holy cross bearing the expiring Christ, and we bear his reproach, that afterward we may partake in his glory.

"Fear not, even although the sentence should be heavy. God, who caused Peter's fetters to fall off, and opened the doors for him, will not, in any wise forget us.

"I have good courage. Let us commit ourselves entirely to God. O that I may find thee as joyful as I hope I shall; and through the same grace, thou wilt see me so. I embrace thee with my heart.

"Thy affectionate wife,

"Rosa Madiai."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Possible War—Popery—Registry of Dissenters—Puseyism—Submarine Telegraph.

Glasgow, July 30, 1852.

A report has been in circulation, that the foreign troops were about to be withdrawn from Rome—the French limiting themselves to the occupation of Civita Vechia. Meanwhile, Popery is gaining ascendancy in France, and so much is their power over the Universities being increased, that a number of the professors are said to have resigned. The present ruler of the land seems to think that he will strengthen himself through the strength of the Jesuits. On the other hand, an alliance has been formed against him, by the Emperors of Russia and Austria and the king of Prussia. They entered into a treaty in May last, which has just been published, in which they declare that they will not suffer him, on any account, to become a hereditary Emperor; and that if he allow himself to be named so, he must comply with certain conditions which they prescribe. With the Pope on his side, and four hundred thousand armed men at his back, will Louis Napoleon submit to be branded as a usurper, and to retain by sufferance, even for his own life-time, a throne thus declared rightfully to belong to the Comte de Chambord? Or, will he resist, and involve Europe in warfare once more? By this or by other agency, consideration of Scripture prophecy leads us to expect that ere long this dire catastrophe is to overtake us for the sins that we have done.

Wherever it can find opportunity, Popery continues to show its old enmity to truth, and its old intolerance. The proprietors of two or three Protestant schools in Naples have this month been ordered to appear before the authorities, and compelled to place their schools under Roman Catholic governors or governesses. A Mr. Hamilton, an Englishman, opened, in 1848, a school for English and Swiss boys. He having refused to comply with the new order, the children and their parents were induced, by threats and promises, to withdraw their countenance and attendance, until only about a dozen English boys were left, who met in his own house. As he still continued teaching, he was next ordered to shut up his school, and on his refusing, the police entered, and turned out the boys into the streets, although the parents of some of them were not in Naples. Sir W. Temple was immediately informed of what had occurred, and it is expected that he will take the necessary steps for Mr. Hamilton's protection. As might have been supposed, both the Queen's proclamation against public processions, and the result of the trial Achilli versus Newman, have added to the wrath which our Ecclesiastical Titles Bill had stirred up in the minds of the priesthood abroad. In England and Scotland, through immigrations from Ireland, Popery is undoubtedly much on the increase. In Ireland itself, however, large numbers continue to embrace Protestantism. In London, the Church of St. Paul's Bermondsey, seems to be specially used for exposing the errors of Popery; and from time to time we are informed of considerable numbers renouncing that communion. On Sunday week, eleven did so. In Edinburgh, also, the Free Church Irish City Mission has had not a little success; but we are sorry to find that, from difficulties in dealing with the class they have had to employ, the Committee purpose to abandon the Mission. This church takes a prominent place in regard to education in Scotland, and strains every nerve to get a power, which it cares little should be shared by the Dissenters, who reject the Westminster Confession as the confession of their faith. As might be expected, they regard the ordinary parish schools with unfavorable eye; and a case is this week mentioned as having been before the Free Church Presbytery of Caithness, in whose bounds one of their sessions refused baptism (so misnamed) to the child of D. Murray, because he declined to withdraw his other children from the established school, (to which he had sent them when the Free Church Schools were shut,) where he said they were making satisfactory progress. Considering what the difference is between the two parties, this is surely intolerance.

The English Dissenters are gratulating themselves on the passing of an Act, in the late session of Parliament, for the registration of their places of worship. It frees them from the necessity of having them certified or registered in a Bishop's Registry, as has hitherto been required. This is now to be done at the General Registration Office for births, marriages, and deaths. Two shillings and sixpence is fixed as the amount of the fee for the certificate of registration; and the list is to be kept open for inspection without fee.

It is high time some more effective method were adopted for reforming the Church of England than any that has yet been proposed by any of its own communion. The Romish leaven was never half purged out; and the Romanizer of our own day can appeal to their acknowledged standards as authority for his "mummeries." Nay, against his will, a clergyman may be compelled to adopt usages he regards as superstitious—at least, if he is not prepared to make sacrifice to conscience and truth. This week the Bishop of Ely is stated to have ordered the Rev. J. T. Bennett, Rector of Chevely, near Newmarket, "to hold morning service in his church on every saint's day throughout the year, in compliance with the request of some of his Puseyite parishioners."

Dr. Pusey, whose name has been associated, in modern times, with the views he promulgates, has generally kept silent under the severest exposures of their unscriptural character. On two recent occasions of condemnation he has, however, departed from this course. Lord Shaftesbury in a speech had spoken of Tractarianism looking with tenderness on Infidelity. In a letter addressed to his Lordship, Dr. Pusey denied this, saying he could not understand "how any writers teaching (as the writers of the Tracts do) that Holy Scripture is implicitly to be believed; that it is the source of all faith and truth; and that it is to be understood in the sense in which it was always understood by the Church from the time of the apostles; that the human mind is implicitly to submit to authority—can be supposed to have any leaning towards infidelity." But whatever is to be said as to the infidel tendency of such views, there surely can be no doubt that they directly lead to superstition. "Holy Scripture is implicitly to be believed"—by whom? Not by Dr. Pusey, nor by any of his followers. With them, whatever the Scriptures may obviously teach, "the human mind is implicitly to submit to authority," and the only interpretation they can put on any text, must be that in which it is and was "understood by the church," which we are divinely instructed would "fall away." The other occasion on which Dr. Pusey has departed from his wonted silence, is by a letter in the Times about a week ago. Sir John Romilly, Master of the Rolls, had said, in a paper which was made public, that he considered those "commonly called Puseyites" as more dangerous than open and avowed Roman Catholics." The Doctor called upon Sir John to disavow the words, or to sue him in an ecclesiastical court, or not to impute to him or his friends that their doctrines are not open or avowed. Sir John replied, declining to take either of the first two methods; intimated exactly what he believed, but that he had not imputed to the Doctor or his friends that their doctrines were not open or avowed. With this Dr. Pusey professes to be satisfied.

The submarine telegraph wires have been successfully laid between Portpatrick and Donaghadee, establishing thus the connection of Ireland and Scotland, and, consequently, England also. The line formerly laid between Holyhead and Howth, has, however, proved an entire failure—the insulation of the wire having been imperfectly performed.

TIDINGS FROM PALESTINE.

[Published by request.]

Artoss, (Bethlehem,) June 13, 1852.

Christian Friends,—I scarcely know what to select from the daily events to record. First, with a grateful heart, I would state, that we are all in good health at present, and, with the exception of a few days' illness of two of our number, we have been unusually well. To the Lord be all the praise! We are all very busy, and hard at work with our hands, for the out-door and in-door needs of our large family of twenty-two in number, laborers and all.

Bro. Meshullam has made an agreement with us, in a mutual interest in the agricultural and benevolent work in Artoss—he to superintend and exert himself to furnish all the land, animals, and improvements already made for the general use, and to furnish £100, and we our united efforts, and to all eat from the common income of the valley, and be mutual sharers of the proceeds, with the design of giving all the surplus to the poor, especially the poor of Israel, and to extend to them all further aid.

Many parties here envy us, who have long tried in vain to unite with Mr. Meshullam; but he kept aloof, on account of expecting Sabbath-keepers to come. The Greek Convent, before we came, had offered to pay M. any sum he might charge for his interest, and select and deed him two large gardens, with other privileges, if he would only give up Artoss to them; they are greatly vexed at our coming. Also, the English Episcopal Mission had recently made a great effort to secure it for an English Colony; they are displeased on this account, and with our Sabbath-keeping and worship.

The chief Rabbi of Jerusalem, with his wife and sons, came out to see us recently, and, seeing the great change effected, says it is the hand of God. Also, this week we learn, that some twenty Jews of the better class, (who only one year since despised farming, on account of the Talmudical tradition, that the sons of the alien are to be their plowmen and vine-dressers,) are now desiring to come and learn with us, as it is currently reported here, that Rothschild intends a large purchase for agricultural purposes, if not the whole of Palestine, and they declare their wish to be prepared to teach others.

Mordecai, a Jew, who, with his wife and children, has been residing here, met recently in Jerusalem some native Jews—from a remnant (they say) of the tribe of Zebulon—who reside near Gerish, in the land of Ammon, east of the Jordan, and he told them of Meshullam. They have since sent M. word, "that they will come and locate near him, with his permission, and serve him, because he is a Jew, and has commenced to cultivate THIS land;" but he cannot encourage them, from his want of means!

Several powerful Arab Shieks, with many thousands of armed men, are rebelling now against the Turkish rule and despotism; and the Pasha of Jerusalem dare not venture out of the city for fear, while we are at peace, sleeping with doors and windows open, as these Shieks are great friends to Meshullam, and invited him and us to a great feast just before they marched against Hebron, and took it, killing some of the Turkish inhabitants—and they often come to see him, and call him their Howajah (Master.) The Turkish rulers look upon his agricultural efforts as a public benefaction in the land.

Many of the fellahs (peasantry) come to Meshullam for help, redress, and counsel. One poor man begs him to take his house, and another his vineyard, that the Turkish oppressor may not; one was going to sell a very fine vineyard, (forced to get ready money,) at a sacrifice, and came to him, with tears, begging him to take it. M. contrived to spare the money on it, and let the man keep and dress it, and give M. half the grapes, which the poor man joyfully agreed to, and thanked him for.

Just before making the arrangement with M. about the £100—which he greatly needed to build for the winter, and meet our increased current expenses; though we had some means left, it was not sufficient, and it seemed as if we could hardly exist here without more help—we set apart one seventh-day (our little family only) to entreat the Lord, and to fast and weep before him—also, we continued all the next week, till next Sabbath night, crying to God to send us aid; for such was M.'s poverty, our great expenses, &c., that it seemed as if we could not hold on, but must perish, except we had immediate supernatural aid. I was so ill on Sabbath morning, that I could not rise to breakfast, till sister Lydia S. came to me, and said a stranger had just arrived on foot, saying he had heard of us in Beyroot, and had come to worship and keep the Sabbath with us. I felt immediate strength, and arose to meet him. He is a Prussian, and an educated and wealthy physician and professor of physiology, a believer in the near coming of Jesus and his kingdom. After he had told his experience, my burden was so great that I told him our case; he afterwards wept, and was much exercised for us, believing that God HAD called us here, and finally decided to give us 50 Prussian imperials, (nearly a sovereign each, and) over $200, to help us make the arrangement to unite permanently with M., and left us, expecting some time to return and abide with us. This sum he has given us on condition, that if we are abundantly prospered, and he returns, he has its interest with us, or we may return it, to be given to the poor of Israel; but not to be returned otherwise. So "God the Lord" helped us!

We live very simple, as the plainest food is expensive. Though some articles are cheap, others are very high. Bread and coffee, or bread and tea, make our general breakfast and supper, with sometimes eggs for breakfast, and sometimes a kind of molasses, made of grapes, for supper. We have our garden of sweet potatoes growing, which looks very promising; another with white potatoes, which began to yield on the 30th of May; they were planted about the 1st of April. We have also three small fields of Indian corn; it is nearly ripe; we have had one mess. We have string beans, peas, cucumbers, salad and lettuce the past three weeks, which, with meat twice a week, and rice, we have for dinner. Our flour is very coarse, as our mill will not grind fine, and it is hard labor for two or three men to work; [a new and improved mill has recently been shipped;] the Arab stones make it finer. The flour will not make good biscuit, or pie-crust, or dumplings, which we never taste; it is a little finer than the bran-bread in the United States. All the wheat, we pick over with our fingers, (as the fanning-mill is defective that was sent out in 1850,) to get out the stones and bad seeds, and then sift and sift the flour by hand, and then make and bake for twenty-two in the family, so that bread is a very great and essential and hard-earned item. A few barrels of American flour would be a great treasure to us!

Dr. Barclay, (an American Baptist missionary,) is a very good man, and is very kind to us, and wishes our success. His principles are very near like ours, with the exception of the Sabbath. Bro. Kraus, (who was formerly a Lutheran minister, but became convinced of seventh-day as the true Sabbath, and afterwards of baptism by immersion, and who came to Palestine in the spring of 1851,) resides with a converted Jew, who has recently purchased a garden near Jaffa, and intends agriculture, to do good for Israel.

A party of four Germans, also, have bought a farm near Jaffa, where they reside; but they have great expense to water the soil from wells by horse-power. They cultivate for trade.

June 18—Yesterday morning I set out with sisters Emma N. and Lydia S., (with James Meshullam as guide,) to show them the city of Jerusalem. When we arrived at Mr. Max's, (the first house I rested at in 1849,) who should I find but our dear and esteemed sister W., (an English lady, formerly a resident of Philadelphia, a Baptist Christian, and a believer in Christ's kingdom "near at hand,") just arrived from England the day before, and waiting to send us word that she had come to join us in our work of love, and was able to find no messenger. How providential! So we hired two camels and a horse, and sent forward her baggage, and she accompanied us HOME in the evening. She is in good health, and is much pleased with M. and his family, the valley, and all around. She has brought out a quantity of flannel, some shoes, and other needful dry-goods.

June 19—To-day (the Sabbath) Dr. Zemple worshiped with us. He arrived last evening from the Jordan, (went down to be baptized by immersion;) he bid us good-bye next day, and is to take the steamer next week for Europe; he hopes to return here, and meanwhile to remember our cause to others.

Brother Meshullam occupies a wonderful position in this land of Judah, of which we see daily proofs—a breakwater, as it were, between the Turk and Arab and the Jew. He is very kind to all, and says that while he lives we shall, though his expenses and benevolence keep him personally very poor, and at times our faith is tried, whether we can get our bread; but we pray much, that the will of God only be done, whether in our life or death.

Yesterday, our large circular tent was put up, (is 22 feet in diameter, and the center pole 11 feet in hight, and 12 other poles, half the height,) intended as a tabernacle for Sabbath and worship. It is pitched on the mountain-side, on a terrace prepared by Meshullam, with much care, and commanding the finest view of the valley.

By last mail we received the $50 sent by a lady friend in New York, remitted by Bro. T. B. S.

With love in Jesus to all who love Israel, I remain their fellow-servant for his sake, in truth. C. S. Minor.

N. B.—We hear to-day, from two Christian-Jewish brethren, from Jerusalem, that Rothschild is at Constantinople, and has bought all Palestine from the Sultan.

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE—CIRCULAR.

Repeated inquiries in relation to our Circular, show that it has been little studied, or we have very imperfect powers of conveying thought. I make a second effort at being understood. I premise, that I only speak for myself, and not as "The Trustees." Communications were to be directed, post paid, to the Trustees, with "the evidence of their payment." No certificate or receipt has been forwarded. Where such receipt is possessed, it should be forwarded. If not, the time of payment and the agent to whom paid, or the persons knowing of the payment, should be designated. It should be remembered, that the Trustees have charge of public interests, and may be called on for vouchers for all the scholarships granted. Where the amount is $100 or more, contributors should elect whether to have one or two scholarships. We are asked, "Can we send two scholars at a time, and shorten the time?" It is expected, that these scholarships will not interfere with the regular income of the school, by handing over the scholarships to those who would otherwise pay tuition; but where the scholarship is a donation to an indigent student, or one who would not otherwise attend, I will venture to say, that if the Trustees complain, I will assume the responsibility. The certificates will entitle the holder to the instruction in the "Teachers' Classes." The note of the Trustees did not intend to extend the time beyond five years, to allow parents to "give a little education to each of their children as they grow up." We say, Send on the oldest; and if he is educated as he ought to be, he will be able and willing to help educate the younger children "as they grow up." I regard it fallacious reasoning to suppose that parents wrong their other children by giving one child more education than their present means would enable them to give the others, if they were now ready to attend. We should fit each of our children for the fullest amount of responsibility possible, and trust in God for the future.

Contributors who have their certificates need not hesitate to send on their scholars previous to the action of the Trustees. When scholars other than their own children are sent, the length of time such scholar is to be instructed should be specified. J. R. Irish.

Brookfield, Aug. 12, 1852.

Our Anniversaries—Reduced Fare.—To persons desirous of attending the Seventh-day Baptist Anniversaries at Plainfield, N. J., the New York and Erie Railroad Company will furnish excursion tickets, entitling the holder to come to New York and return for one fare any time between the 5th and 25th of September. Tickets for persons in Allegany County will be sent to the Alfred and Friendship Stations about the first of September. For those who wish to start from other stations on the line, tickets will be provided in case they notify Geo. B. Utter of their wish, previous to the 30th of August.

Arrangements have also been made for excursion tickets between New York and Plainfield, enabling the holder to go and return for one fare. They can be obtained after the 1st of September at the office of the Sabbath Recorder.

Teachers' Convention.—The New York State Teachers' Association recently held a meeting at Elmira, at which various topics of special interest to teachers were discussed. A Teachers' Paper was resolved upon, and a large Board of Editors appointed, among whom we notice the name of Prof. Wm. C. Kenyon, of Alfred. Albany, we believe, is to be the place of publication.

Arrival of Missionaries.—The following Missionaries were among the passengers by the packet ship American Congress, which arrived at New York on Thursday, Aug. 12, from London:—Rev. J. Newton, Missionary from India, and lady; Miss Margaret Newton, Masters Charles, Francis and Edward Newton, and Miss Louisa Jauvier, from India; and Miss Harriet Livermore from Jerusalem.

Meeting of the American Board.—The annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions is to be held this year at Troy, N. Y., commencing on the 7th of September.

Debt of the American Board.—Liberal subscriptions, recently taken up in the different churches, have liquidated the debt of the American Board of Foreign Missions, and $5 35 surplus is left in the Treasury.

FREE-SOIL NATIONAL CONVENTION.

The Free-Soil National Convention, to nominate candidates for President and Vice President of the United States, was held at Pittsburg, Pa., last week. The delegation was large, and included leading abolitionists from nearly all of the Free States. There was some difficulty in agreeing upon a "Platform'—members of the Committee on that subject having presented a majority report through Joshua R. Giddings, and a minority report through Gerrit Smith. The majority report was finally adopted; after which which Hon. J. P. Hale received the nomination for the Presidency, and Hon. George W. Julien, of Indiana, that for the Vice-Presidency. Presuming that all of our readers, whatever party they may belong to, will be anxious to see the "Platform," we copy it entire:—

Having assembled in National Convention as the Delegates of the Free-Democracy of the United States, united by a common resolve to maintain rights against wrongs, and Freedom against Slavery; confiding in the intelligence, the patriotism and the discriminating justice of the American people; putting our trust in God for the triumph of our cause, and invoking his guidance in our endeavors to advance it, we now submit for the candid judgment of all men the following declaration of principles and measures:

First. That Governments, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, are instituted among men to secure to all, those inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, with which they are endowed by their Creator, and of which none can be deprived by valid legislation, except for crime.

Second. That the true mission of Democracy is to maintain the liberties of the people, the sovereignty of the States, and the perpetuity of the Union, by the impartial application to public affairs, without sectional discrimination, of the fundamental principles of equal rights, strict justice, and economical administration.

Third. That the Federal Government is one of limited powers, derived solely from the Constitution, and the grants of power therein ought to be strictly construed by all the Departments and Agents of the Government—and it is inexpedient and dangerous to exercise doubtful Constitutional powers.

Fourth. That the early history of the Government clearly shows the settled policy to have been, not to extend, nationalize, and encourage, but to limit, localize and discourage Slavery; and to this policy, which should never have been departed from, the Government ought forthwith to return.

Fifth. That the Constitution of the United States—ordained to form a more perfect Union, to establish justice, and secure the blessing of Liberty—expressly denies to the General Government any power to deprive any persons of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; and, therefore, the Government having no more power to make a slave than to make a king, and no more power to establish Slavery than to establish Monarchy, should at once proceed to relieve itself from all responsibilities for the extension of Slavery, wherever it possesses Constitutional power to legislate for its extension.

Sixth. That to the persevering and importunate demands of the Slave power for more Slave States, new Slave territories, and the nationalization of Slavery, our distinct and final answer is: No more Slave States—no Slave territories—no nationalized Slavery, and no national legislation for the extradition of Slaves.

Seventh. That the acts of Congress, known as the Compromise Measures of 1850, by making the admission of a sovereign State contingent upon the adoption of other measures demanded by the special interest of Slavery—by their omission to guaranty freedom in Free Territories—by their attempt to impose unconstitutional limitations of the power of Congress and the people to admit new States—by their provisions for the assumption of $5,000,000 of the State debt of Texas, and for the payment of $5,000,000 more, and the cession of a large territory to the same State, under menace, as an inducement to the relinquishment of a groundless claim, and by their invasion of the sovereignty of the States and the liberties of the people, through the enactments of an unjust, oppressive, and unconstitutional Fugitive Slave Law, are proved to be incompatible with all the principles and maxims of democracy, and wholly inadequate to the settlement of the questions of which these are claimed to be an adjustment.

Eighth. That no permanent settlement of the Slavery question can be looked for, except in the practical recognition of the truth, that Slavery is sectional and Freedom national, by the total separation of the General Government from Slavery, and the exercise of its legitimate and constitutional influence on the side of Freedom, and by leaving to the States the whole subject of Slavery, and the extradition of fugitives from service.

Ninth. That a due regard for the Federal Constitution and sound administrative policy, demands that the funds of the General Government be kept separate from banking institutions—that ocean and inland postage should be reduced to the lowest possible point—that no more revenue should be raised than is required to defray the strictly necessary expenses of the public service, and to pay off the public debt, and that the power and patronage of the Government should be diminished by the abolition of all unnecessary offices, salaries and privileges—and by the election by the people of all civil officers in the service of the United States, so far as may be consistent with the prompt and efficient transaction of the public business.

Tenth. That River and Harbor improvements, when necessary to the safety and convenience of commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, are objects of national concern, and it is the duty of Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, to provide for the same.

Eleventh. That emigrants and exiles from the Old World should find a cordial welcome to homes of comfort and fields of enterprise in the New, and every attempt to abridge their privilege of becoming citizens and owners of the soil among us, ought to be resisted with inflexible determination.

Twelfth. That the public lands of the United States belong to the people, and should not be sold to individuals nor granted to corporations, but should be held as a sacred trust for the benefit of the people, and should be granted in limited quantities free of cost to landless settlers.

Thirteenth. That every nation has a clear right to alter or change its own government, and to administer its own concerns in such manner as may best secure the rights and promote the happiness of the people, and foreign interference with that right is a dangerous violation of the law of nations, against which they should protest, and endeavor by all proper means to prevent; and especially is it the duty of the American Government, representing the chief republic of the world, to protest against, and by all proper means to prevent the intervention of Kings and Emperors against nations seeking to establish for themselves republican or constitutional Governments.

Fourteenth. That Slavery is a sin against God, and a crime against Man, the enormity of which no law nor usage can sanction or mitigate, and that Christianity and Humanity alike demand its abolition.

Fifteenth. That the Fugitive Act of 1850 is repugnant to the Constitution, to the principles of the Common Law, to the spirit of Christianity, and to the sentiments of the civilized world: we therefore deny its binding force upon the American people, and demand its immediate and total repeal.

Sixteenth. That the doctrine that any human law is a finality, and not subject to modification or repeal, is not in accordance with the creed of the founders of our Government, and is dangerous to the liberties of our people.

Seventeenth. That the independence of Hayti ought to be recognized by our Government, and our commercial relations with it placed on the footing of the most favored nations.

Eighteenth. That it is the imperative duty of the General Government to protect all persons, of whatever color, visiting any of the United States, from unjust and illegal imprisonment, or any other infringement of their rights.

Nineteenth. That we recommend the introduction into all treaties hereafter to be negotiated between the United States and foreign nations, of some provision for the amicable settlement of difficulties by a resort to decisive arbitration.

Twentieth. That the free Democratic party is not organized to aid either the Whig or the Democratic wing of the great Slave Compromise party of the Union, but to defeat them both; and that, repudiating and renouncing both, as hopelessly corrupt and utterly unworthy of confidence, the purpose of the Free Democracy is to take possession of the Federal Government, and administer it for the better protection of the rights and interests of the whole people.

Twenty-first. That we inscribe on our banner free soil, free speech, free labor, and free men—and under it will fight on, and fight ever, until a triumphant victory shall reward our exertions.

THE LIQUOR LAW IN RHODE ISLAND.—The Providence Journal of August 4th gives the following tangible argument in favor of the liquor law:—

"The new Liquor Law is being carried into effect in Providence with zeal and energy, and its good effects are seen in the diminution of the number of arrests for drunkenness. During last week, which was the second under the new law, the arrests for drunkenness, and offenses growing out of it, were four. The preceding week there were six. The average number previously has been from thirty to forty."

The Temperance Advocate is of the opinion that private drinking has not increased in the ratio that was feared, and it gives some facts to substantiate that opinion.

A dispatch from Providence, dated Aug. 10, says:—

"The first attempts to enforce the Liquor Law have been made in Newport. Complaints were made on Monday, and came before the Court to-day, but were postponed. There is much excitement at Newport, and the men who have been conspicuous in the prosecution are threatened with violence.

A PUBLISHER'S DUTIES.—The publisher of the Independent recently received the following from an official gentleman in the West, a stranger. The business was promptly attended to, and five receipts forwarded:—

———, Wis., June 1, 1852.

S. W. BENEDICT:—Enclosed please find $5, which please appropriate as under:—

$2 for Independent, to my address.
$2 for N. Y. Weekly Tribune, for L. W.
25 cents, American Messenger, for T. B.
25 cents, Bible Society Record, for A. R.
35 cents, Sunday-School Journal.
12½ cents, Child's Paper.

Please send me a receipt for your paper, and one for Mr. ——, from the Tribune office, and direct to P. M.

DECLINING THE HONOR.—Shurtleff College recently conferred the honorary title of D. D on R. Ryland, President of Richmond College, and pastor of the colored church in Richmond —an honor which Mr. R. has declined for the followiug reasons:—

"The first is, that such titles do not seem to accord with the simplicity of the gospel; and the second is, that if they do, I am not sufficiently learned to deserve them. For the last twenty years, I have been so absorbed in the management of the interests of this Institution, at first as the Virginia Baptist Seminary, and afterwards as the Richmond College, that I have not prosecuted extensively those studies which it is the design of that degree to reward. This remark is made, not with any affectation of humility, but from a sincere consciousness of its truth."

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN.—Mr. Maclear, of Toronto, has announced an edition of Uncle Tom's Cabin in one volume, to be published at 2s. 6d. Four or five editions of the same work have been published in England, one of them illustrated. A letter from San Francisco states that as there are only a few copies of the book in California, the miners in one place were reading it in turns, for which privilege they paid twenty-five cents. 83,000 copies of this popular work have been published in the United States. Probably no book ever had so large sale in so short period.

The wife of John Davis, of Holden, who was suffering from a severe tooth-ache, induced her physician to let her inhale chloroform, for the purpose of having it extracted, when, upon inhalation, she expired immediately.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, AUG. 9.

In the SENATE, Mr. Hamlin called for copies of all correspondence with Peru relating to the Labos Islands, and the instructions to the commander of the United States squadron in that quarter. A Message from the House, announcing the decease of Mr. Rantoul, called up Mr. Sumner of Massachusetts, who delivered a short eulogy on the deceased. Mr. Sumner closed by offering the usual resolutions, after which the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Mann announced the death of Mr. Rantoul in an eloquent speech, which was followed by remarks from several other members, and after the passage of the usual resolutions, that body adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, AUG. 10.

In the SENATE, after various proceedings of minor interest, the Appropriation Bill was taken up, and amendments, amounting in the aggregate to over $800,000, were proposed, for the benefit of Indian tribes, the purchase of their lands, the fulfillment of treaties with them, &c. Various other amendments were made, carrying the aggregate added of appropriations to $850,000.

In the HOUSE, the morning hour was occupied on a question of privilege by Mr. Aikin, and the new Judiciary Fee bill, and then the Appropriation bill came up in Committee of the Whole. An amendment was adopted, appropriating $300,000 for a Branch Mint at San Francisco, and another proposed raising the salaries of Clerks in the Departments at Washington.

FOURTH-DAY, AUG. 11.

The SENATE spent all day upon the Appropriation Bills, but we find nothing new to report.

The HOUSE was occupied with the Clerks' Salary and the General Appropriation bills. The retaliatory light-house dues amendment was not concurred in, but most of the amendments were, including one prohibiting constructive mileage for any session called within ten days of the adjournment of Congress.

FIFTH-DAY, AUG. 12.

In the SENATE, the Homestead bill came to a vote, and was lost, 14 to 31. The Message of the President in relation to the Fisheries then came up, and a discussion upon it occupied the remainder of the session.

In the HOUSE, the bill relating to costs and fees in the U. S. Courts passed, the Wheeling Bridge question was debated, and also the bill for the relief of Thomas Ritchie; after which the Army Appropriation bill came up, and numerous speeches, of no general interest, were made.

SIXTH-DAY, AUG. 13.

The SENATE was occupied chiefly in the consideration of a case of contempt of that body, which lies over, and in the discussion of private bills, of which thirty were passed.

In the HOUSE, the morning hour was occupied with the Wheeling and Bridgeport Bridge questions; after which the Army bill came up in Committee of the Whole. The most important amendments reported are, one of $300,000 for extra pay during this year of officers and soldiers serving in California, New Mexico, and Oregon, and another of $20,000, to test the practicability of employing camels for the use of the Army on the great American desert.

SABBATH-DAY, AUG. 14.

The SENATE, after long talk, adopted a resolution calling for information as to moneys paid out of the Treasury to Generals Scott and Pierce. The Fshery Question came up, and Mr. Seward made a speech vindicating the Administrative from the charge of want of patriotism in not resisting the demands of Great Britain.

In the HOUSE the principal topics were the Wheeling Bridge question, and the Army Appropriation bill. The amendment appropriating $20,000 for the employment of camels on the deserts was nonconcurred in by a vote of 38 against 106. The bill then passed, and the House went into Committee on the private calendar.

European News.

The steamer Africa, with Liverpool dates to July 31st, arrived at New York August 12th.

In England, the elections are over, but there are many conflicting statements as to the result.

Further riots have taken place in the country Clare, Ireland.

The Northern Powers are said to have made a new Holy Alliance, with a view to the prevention of the re-establishment in France of a hereditary Bonaparte dynasty; they go for the legitimate branch of the Bourbons, and nothing else.

In the Circuit Court of Warwick, Eng., was recently tried a suit for libel, brought by Henry Box Brown against Mr. Smith, proprietor and editor of the Wolverhampton Herald. Mr. Smith had visited Brown's "Panorama of Slavery," and in a critique thereupon, stated that the Panorama, and the lecture that accompanied it, were gross exaggerations, presenting a picture of Slavery and the Southern States totally at variance with the representations of intelligent travelers. On a second occasion, Mr. S. commented still more strongly on the exhibition and exhibitor, and his remarks had the effect of materially thinning houses. In course of the hearing, it came out that Brown was making from £50 to £70 per week! The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff—damages £100.

Doings among the Fishermen.

The Gloucester Telegraph, of August 11, contains the following information from the fishing grounds:—

"There have been two or three arrivals from the Bay of St. Lawrence, and we gather the following information respecting affairs in that quarter: Captain Rogers, of the schooner C. & N. Rogers, informs us that he was in the Bay of Chaleur, when he was boarded by an officer from the steamship Devastation, and ordered out of the Bay. It was Sunday, and there were about 20 vessels in company. Some of them had made a harbor for the purpose of passing the Sunday at anchor, as many of the fishermen are in the habit of doing, but they were all ordered to get under weigh and proceed out of the Bay immediately. The officer who boarded the C. & N. Rogers, was rather insulting to the crew. The first he said upon boarding their vessel was, 'that they had no business in that place.' They were at the time about four or five miles distant from the shore. The papers were called for, and the reason asked why there was no clearance among them. After the officer had looked at them a minute, he crumpled them in his hand and threw them upon the deck, saying to Captain Rogers, 'There's your papers.'"

California News.

The Steamship Illinois, from Chagres, arrived at New York on the 14th inst., with California dates to July 16th, 340 passengers, and two millions dollars in gold dust.

By this arrival we have accounts of great mortality on board vessels bound for San Francisco. Passengers who went out in the S. S. Lewis, via San Juan, suffered much from privation, sickness, and death.

A Dutch bark called the Ophilia arrived at San Francisco, July 14, from Panama, after an extremely long passage of one hundred and fourteen days. There was dreadful mortality on board, and it was reported that thirty of the passengers had died. A subsequent account says 12 deaths occurred on the passage, all from Panama, of fever.

About the usual number of murders and Indian fights are reported by this arrival. A contest between a part of one hundred Indians, supposed to be of the Suisin tribe, and Bidwell, with thirty of his Indians, took place on Tuesday morning. During the previous week, a lot of cattle were taken from Bidwell's Ranch, about thirty miles from Tehama, on the east side of the river. On Monday, Bidwell, accompanied by several of his friends and thirty of his Indians, started in pursuit of the thieves. They were discovered near the head of Chico Creek, and the pursuing party concealed themselves, intending to make their attack in the morning. The accidental discharge of a gun, however, aroused the Indian camp before dawn, and the fight at once commenced. The Indians were well armed, and fought bravely. Eleven of the Indians were killed. Mr. Amos E. Fry, of Missouri, who was in Bidwell's party, was killed.

IMPORTANT TO THE WRITERS OF LOVE-LETTERS.—In the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, the law on Love-Letters was recently interperted and explained after the following fashion:—

"When a written correspondence is kept up between an unmarried gentleman and an unmarried young lady, of suitable age, who is not his relative, the most common and natural inference is, that it is upon matrimonial subjects; since where an engagement actually exists, a correspondence almost invariably follows. But young marriageable ladies, at least prudent ones, do not allow themselves to be engaged in a correspondence with unmarried men, unless they suppose a marriage contract exists between them. And unmarried men do not desire that such a correspondence should be carried on where an engagement does not exist, unless it be from some improper motives, or with the hope and expectation of an ultimate engagement. * * *

"That an engagement exists, or an offer has been made and accepted, where a correspondence takes place between such parties as are described in this case, is, we think, in accordance with general experience, which is one of the usual and most satisfactory tests of human evidence that might be suggested, yet we hold it competent to be submitted to a jury, and from which they may find a promise to marry, if the evidence satisfies them of the fact."

MURDER IN TRUXTON.—One of the most horrid murders on record was committed in the town of Truxton, Cortland Co., N. Y., on Tuesday, the 3d inst., by an Irishman named Patrick Donoghue. It seems, that on that morning the Irishman got mad at his girl, and threatened to whip her; whereupon she was socreted by some small girls, her companions. Her father could not find her, and on seeing Mrs. Kinney, a neighbor, passing his house with her daughter, went out with his gun, and demanded of them where his girl was. Mrs. K. told him she did not know. Donoghue swore at her, leveled his gun, and fired. The charge only raked her face. He then struck her with the but of the gun over the head three times, and she fell dead. Afterward he pounced upon her daughter, struck her with his gun and stabbed her with the bayonet. She survived till the following Sunday, when she expired. Donoghue is in Cortland jail.

FROM THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—Letters from the Cape of Good Hope of June 22d, have been received, which give discouraging accounts of the financial condition of the Colony, and state that the war rages as bad as ever. The Mount Bok Wesleyan Missionary Station had been attacked by about 300 Hottentots, on horseback and on foot. The place was bravely defended by the friendly natives stationed there, but the rebels were successful, killing seven Fingoes, wounding a number of others, and carrying off considerable plunder. A detachment of thirty-five English soldiers, who were guarding an ammunition wagon from Graham's Town to Fort Baufort, were attacked by the Kaffirs, and nine of the soldiers were killed and ten wounded. The ammunition was also captured. The wounded were found by the Kaffirs, who cut their throats with the most revolting barbarity.

DID RIGHT BY MISTAKE.—It is said that the "Black Laws" of Indiana were repealed at the last session of the Legislature of that State. Il was done unintentionally, by the passage of a general repealing law, repealing all laws of the State not enacted at the same session, with certain exceptions. The blacks are now on the same footing with the whites, as to giving testimony, and in certain other respects. Some of the Indiana papers think the old laws will be re-enacted at the next session.

PLAIN TALK.—The Louisville Journal says: "A negro cut his throat on Sunday. It is said that he had paid his master several hundred dollars toward procuring his freedom, who, within a few days ago, sold him to a negro-trader." And an exchange adds: "If the master who robbed the negro and then sold him to a negro-trader had his deserts, there would be another throat cut and one less cut-throat."

The Normal School pupils at West Newton, Mass., have presented Miss Georgiana Whittemore, a late teacher, about to enter upon "a higher, though more limited sphere of action," a silver salver, urn and goblet, as a mark of esteem.

SUMMARY.

A gang of Counterfeiters, carrying on their operations about 15 miles from Danville, Pa., was broken up on Monday, by the Police of Philadelphia, and High Constable Hague, of Pittsburgh. Dr. Geltner, the principal of the gang, was shot through the shoulder while attempting to escape. He was captured and lodged in the Jail at Danville; the others all escaped, a signal having been given by a female in the lower part of the house. The whole of the counterfeiting apparatus, press and tools, were secured, with three hundred counterfeit Two's on the Harrisburg Bank, and bills of various other banks; also several plates which were being altered—one on the Rhode Island Bank.

On the 11th of August, J. S. Philips, Joel Gooch, and Mr. Henderson of Alexandria, Me., were killed in a foul well. Mr Philips descended to cleanse it, but not returning, Mr. Gooch descended to assist him, and also fell a victim. Mr. Henderson then went down to make fast a rope to Mr. Gooch, and when about half the way up, became exhausted, and fell into the well dead. Mr. John Gooch then went to their assistance, and barely escaped with his life. The bodies were extricated by means of a pole hooked to their clothes.

On Tuesday night, Aug. 10, Officer Babcock, of the Second Police, New York, brought a woman named Jane Freel, and her two children, to the Station-House, having found them in the back basement of a building, corner of Jay and Front-sts., in a condition deplorable enough. The drenching rain had flooded the place ankle deep, and an apology for a bed on the floor, soaking wet, contained two small children, the eldest not much over a year old, while the mother was wallowing in one corner, insensibly drunk.

Mrs. Martha Rogers, aged 60, wife of Capt. John Rogers, died in Ellot, Me., on Thursday, 29th ult., and on the same day, Miss Abigail Fry, aged 62. On the Monday previous to their death, Miss Fry, who lived in the neighborhood, called to see Mrs. Rogers, who had been confined with paralysis for something like two years, and while standing at her bedside was attacked with the same disease, and would have fallen, had not Capt. Rogers, who was near, caught her. Both were interred on Friday, 30th.

Eugene Dessaux, a dandy, who has been playing his part at Schooley's Mountain, obtained fifty dollars from a lady there upon a representation that her brother had robbed him, and that he would expose him if the amount was not handed over. After being thus successful he went to Philadelphia and made a similar attempt upon another member of the family, doing business in High-st. The sister had in the meantime written home, and Mr. Eugene D. was held in $600 to stand an investigation.

The Boston Commonwealth says: "Life in the South, a Companion to Uncle Tom's Cabin," is a trashy novel which was published long ago in Godey's Lady's Book, under some such title as "Utopia." The scenes and characters are of 70 years ago, and the whole thing is utterly worthless. It is a fraud to call it Life in the South or a "Companion," or anything else, to Uncle Tom's Cabin.

A dispatch dated from Gorham, near the White Mountains, Friday, Aug. 13, says, The Thermometer this morning was at 60. Two gentlemen were caught in a storm in going up the mountains, and came near perishing. A lady fainted in going up, and was obliged to remain on the mountain all night. Large crowds make the ascent daily.

It is estimated that no less than 3,500 persons suffered from this malignant disease, (the small pox) in New York, during the last year. Dr. Kelley, under whose charge is the Small Pox Hospital on Blackwell's Island, states in his last annual report that 344 cases came under his treatment, and it also appears from the report of the City Inspector that 586 deaths occurred from the same cause.

Mr. John R. Harris, of Troy, was on board of the Henry Clay at the time of the accident, and escaped. He was also on board the Empire when she sunk near Newburgh, and also on the Swallow when she run on the rock near Athens. It would certainly appear that he was not born to die either by drowning or burning.

A call is issued for a Mass Convention of the colored people of Ohio, to meet at Cleveland on the 8th and 9th of September. The object of the Convention is to consider measures for the education and elevation of the free colored people, and to choose delegates to a National Convention expected to be held this fall.

Gen. Hinton, the Ohio mail robber, who escaped from jail, went to California, and thence to some other place, where it was reported he was drowned, is, according to a correspondent of the Cleveland Plaindealer, keeping a very good hotel in Portland, Oregon, under the name of Gordon.

The route of the telegraph from New York to Sandy Hook, (30 miles) extends from the City up the Hudson, across it at Fort Washington on the masts of the New York and Washington Printing Telegraph Company; thence via Jersey City, Newark, Rahway and Amboy to the Highlands of Nevesink. The distance is 70 miles.

Drayton and Sayres, who were convicted and sentenced two years ago for the attempted abduction of 70 slaves in the schooner Pearl, and whose term of imprisonment in the County Jail would extend to 50 years, have been pardoned by the President.

A dispatch from the foot of the Hoosac Mountain states that the great boring machine was at work on the 9th, and had cut into the rock three feet, at the rate of twenty inches the hour! All are sanguine of its complete success. It has thus far exceeded the expectations of the builders.

The National Convention of the Liberty party has been called at Buffalo, Sept. 1. It will be a Mass Meeting, and assembles to nominate candidates for President and Vice-President, Gerrit Smith and Charles Durkee having both declined.

Hon. Jabez P. Thompson, coalition Senator from Plymouth in the last Legislature of Massachusetts, hung himself in a barn at his residence in Halifax, August 10. He was in good health, and to all appearance perfectly sane.

Land Warrants are in good demand, and have still an upward tendency; 160 acres are $147 a $150, and smaller amounts in proportion.

The Savannah Republican chronicles the capture of a monster shark off Tybee Island, on the 6th, by some pilots. It measured fifteen feet from the end of its tail to the tip of the nose, and when opened it was found to contain ten king crabs, a sea gull, and a man's boot, with any quantity of bones, resembling those of the human body. It took seven men to haul and lash it to the gunnel of the pilot boat! Rather fishy.

The Clarksburg (Va.) Register states that there is a man living in that town, named Stephen Dicks, who heard the original Declaration of Independence read from the State-House steps, in Philadephia, in 1776. He was then 14 years old, and is now 90. He was in Clarksburg when there were but two shingled houses in it. He enjoys good health, and is frequently seen walking the streets.

The Rev. Edward F. Berkley, of Lexington, Kentucky, who received Mr. Clay into the church by baptism, and whose ministrations he constantly attended, has been presented by Mrs Clay with a massive gold seal ring, set with a large and very precious stone. It was a favorite ring of Mr. Clay, and worn by him during the last five or six years of his life.

A dispatch dated Washington, Aug. 4, says: Mr. Webster and Mr. Crampton will be here in a week. The fishery question has been temporarily settled. Mr. Crampton has sent a dispatch to the British Government, urging them to suspend their orders, and to withdraw their naval force. This is authentic.

The action of Congress has had a tendency to strengthen Land Warrants. The following are the ruling prices:

	Buying.	Selling.
160 acres Warrants	$146	$150
80 acres Warrants	73	75
40 acres Warrants	36½	37½

As a boy in Wheeling, Va., was on his way to water his horse, a keg of loose powder, which lay on the wharf, became suddenly ignited by a spark from the horse's shoe, and both horse and rider were blown into the air. The boy was considerably hurt, as was also the horse.

The second annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science was held at Newark, N. J., last week. Its next meeting is to be held at Pittsburg, Pa., commencing on the second Tuesday of August.

The ship-builders of New York and vicinity have launched 23 steam-vessels and 20 sail-vessels since the 1st of January last. Their tunnage amounts to 30,000. The tunnage now on the stocks is estimated at 36,000.

Five negroes, who murdered James Houston, in McIntosh Co., Ga., were on Saturday, 24th ult., tried by a meeting of citizens of that county, found guilty, and executed on the following Monday.

A Chinese New Testament, printed with metal types, and of a superior character, has been forwarded to the Directors of the London Missionary Society, and is sold for four pence.

The Southern Press, at Washington, died Aug. 9, complaining bitterly of the dishonesty and base ingratitude of its pretended supporters.

A domestic in the employ of James Jewitt, Havre-street, East Boston, cut her throat on Friday, from disappointment in love. Her recovery is doubtful.

The town of Helena, Arkansas, was almost consumed by fire, on Monday night. Only two business houses are left. The loss is estimated at $100,000.

DIED,

In Quiet Dell, Harrison Co., Va., January 23d, 1852, Dea. ABEL BOND, in his 89th year. He was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Lost Creek for forty-eight years, in which he gave general satisfaction. His health for many years was such as to prevent him from mingling with the brethren, yet his heart was with them, and his ardent desire was for their spiritual welfare. It should be added, that his example through life, and particularly the fortitude and resignation with which he bore his multiplied afflictions, together with other circumstances, place beyond a doubt his acceptance with God.

At the residence of her son, in Trivolia, Peoria Co., Ill., July 20, 1852, of billious cholera morbus, Mrs. MARY SIMPKINS, widow of Joseph Simpkins, formerly of Cumberland Co., N J. Mrs. Simpkins joined the church at Roadstown, N.J., under the pastoral care of Rev. Mr. Smalley, over forty years ago, of which she remained a worthy member until removed by death to join the church triumphant. Funeral discourse by Eld. Lewis A. Davis, from Rev. 14: 13.

In West Edmeston, at the residence of her uncle, F. F. Dennison, on the 24th of June, of typhus fever, Miss HARRIET CLARKE, in the 18th year of her age.

Seventh-day Baptist Anniversaries.

THE Forty-fourth Session of the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference will be held at Plainfield, N. J., commencing on Fifth-day, September 9, 1852, at 11 o'clock A. M. James H. Cochran is appointed to preach the Introductory Discourse.

All the Churches are at liberty to communicate with the Conference, either directly or through the Associations to which they belong. Churches not connected with Associations, and societies of Sabbath-keepers not organized into churches, are especially requested to communicate their condition, with the changes that have taken place during the three years since the last session of the Conference, together with any other matters that they may deem of general interest. Letters may be addressed to the Corresponding Secretary, Geo. B. Utter, New York.

The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society is to hold its Tenth Annual Meeting at Plainfield, N. J., on First-day, Sept. 12.

The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society's Third Annual Meeting will be held at Plainfield, N. J., on Second-day, Sept. 13.

The Ninth Annual Meeting of the American Sabbath Tract Society will be held at Plainfield N. J., on Second-day, Sept. 13.

Of the exercises and speakers at the meetings of the Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies, a more complete account will be given in due time.

Yearly Meeting of Rhode Island Churches.

THE Yearly Meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Churches in Rhode Island and Connecticut will be held with the Church at Pawcatuck, commencing on Sixth-day, August 27, at 2 o'clock P. M. Opening sermon by Eld. C. M. Lewis.

In view of the great need of a revival of God's work in this portion of our Zion, it is earnestly hoped, that fervent supplication will be offered by the churches, that the divine favor may be manifested in an abundant outpouring of the Spirit of God on that occasion.

Union Academy.

THE Academic Year of this Institution, located at Shiloh, N. J., for 1852 and '53, is divided into three Terms of fourteen weeks each, with two vacations of one week each between terms.

The First commences the last Monday in August.
The Second commences the second Monday in Dec.
The Third commences the fourth Monday in March.
The year closes the first Monday in July.

Board of Instruction.

WILLIAM C. WHITFORD, Principal,
And Professor of the Classics, Natural Sciences, and Higher Mathematics.

GURDON EVANS, A. M.,
Professor of Agricultural Chemistry.

Mrs. RUTH H. WHITFORD, Preceptress,
And Teacher of the English Department, Painting, and Penciling.

Mrs. ELIZABETH P. JONES,
Teacher of the French Language and Literature.

At the opening of the Fall Term and middle of the Winter Term, TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, and continue seven weeks, for the purpose of reviewing those branches taught in District Schools, and giving each teacher an opportunity to test his own abilities in teaching and governing, by taking charge of a Model Class.

The AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT, during the Winter Term, is under the instruction of Prof. GURDON EVANS, A. M., and embraces the study of and daily recitation in Agricultural Science. Three hours each day are spent in the Laboratory, well furnished with good apparatus and chemicals, where students are instructed in the Elementary Analysis of Soils, Marls, Ashes of Plants, &c. Also, a course of Public Lectures is delivered on the application of scientific principles to practical farming.

Expenses:

Tuition, per term,	from $3 50 to $5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

Extras, per term—Penciling, $1 00; Embroidery and Monochromatic Painting, each, $3 00; Oil Painting, $6 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, $8 00; Piano Music, $10 00.

Tuition settled in advance or by satisfactory arrangement.

Board in the Boarding Hall or Private Families, from $1 25 to $1 75 per week. The entire expense of the year, including board, room, fire, lights, and tuition, need not exceed $82 00.

The aim of the Institution is to impart a thorough, practical, and complete academic education. In the Natural Sciences all the facilities usually enjoyed in Academies, are presented to the student. In the Classical Department, those Latin and Greek authors read in a College Course are studied. A strict and wholesome discipline is enforced. Courses of Lectures, either moral, miscellaneous, or scientific, are given each term in the year.

For further information, address the Principal, the President, Rev. Wm. M. Jones of Shiloh, or Rev. Sheppard R. Kollock, D. D., of Greenwich, N. J.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay: or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Miscellaneous.

"Write Soon."

Long parting from the friends we love,
Will shadow o'er the brightest face:
And happy they who part, and prove
Affection changes not with place.

A sad farewell is warmly dear,
But something dearer may be found
To dwell on lips that are sincere,
And lurk in bosoms closely bound.

The pressing hand, the tearful eye,
Are both less earnest than the boon,
Which, fervently, the last fond sigh
Begs in the hopeful words—"Write soon!"

"Write soon!" Oh! sweet request of truth!
How earnestly its accents come!
We hear it first in early youth,
When mothers watch us leaving home.

And still amid the trumpet joys
That weary us with pomp and show,
We turn from all the brassy noise,
To hear this minor cadence flow.

We part, bnt carry on our way
Some loved one's plaintive spirit-tune,
That, as we wander, seems to say,
"Affection lives on faith—write soon!"

Green and Black Teas.

About four years ago, Mr. Fortune, author of "Three Years Wanderings in the Northern Provinces of China," was deputed by the East India Company to proceed to China for the purpose of obtaining the finest varieties of the tea-plant, as well as native manufacturers and implements, for the government tea-plantations in the Himalaya. Being acquainted with the Chinese language, and adopting the Chinese costume, he penetrated into districts unvisited before by Europeans. His principal journeys were to Sung-lo, the great green-tea district, and to Bohea Mountains, the great black-tea district. The narrative which he has since published, manifests a good faculty for observation, but we do not know that there is any thing in it which will be so acceptable to the reader as fresh and reliable information about his favorite beverage. To this, therefore, our attention will be confined.

The plant in cultivation about Canton, from which the Canton teas are made, is known to botanists as Thea bohea; while the more northern variety, found in the green-tea country, has been called Thea viridis. The first appears to have been named upon the supposition, that all the black teas of the Bohea Mountains were obtained from this species; and the second was called viridis, because it furnished the green teas of commerce. These names seem to have misled the public; and hence many persons, until a few years ago, firmly believed that black tea could be made only from Thea bohea, and green tea only from Thea viridis. The two kinds of tea are rarely made in the same district; but this is a matter of convenience. Districts which formerly were famous for black teas, now produce nothing but green. At Canton, green and black teas are made from the Thea bohea at the pleasure of the manufacturer, and according to demand. When the plants arrive from the farms fresh and cool, they dry of a bright green color; but if they are delayed in their transit, or remain in a confined state for too long a period, they become heated, from a species of spontaneous fermentation; and when loosened and spread open, emit vapors, and are sensibly warm to the hand. When such plants are dried, the whole of the green color is found to have been destroyed, and a red-brown, and sometimes a blackish-brown result is obtained. "I had also noticed," says Mr. Warrington, in a paper read by him before the Chemical Society, "that a clear infusion of such leaves, evaporated carefully to dryness, was not all dissolved by water, but left a quantity of brown oxidized extractive matter, to which the denomination apothem has been applied by some chemists; a similar result is obtained by the evaporation of an infusion of black tea. Again, I had found that the green teas, when wetted and redried, with exposure to the air, were nearly as dark in color as the ordinary black teas. From these observations, therefore, I was induced to believe that the peculiar characters and chemical differences which distinguish black tea from green were to be attributed to a species of heating or fermentation, accompanied with oxidation by exposure to the air, and not to its being submitted to a higher temperature in the process of drying, as had been generally concluded. My opinion was partly confirmed by ascertaining, from parties conversant with the Chinese manufacture, that the leaves for the black teas were always allowed to remain exposed to the air in mass for some time before they were roasted."

This explanation by Mr. Warrington, from scientific data, is confirmed by Mr. Fortune from personal observation, and fully accounts, not only for the difference in color between the two teas, but also for the effect produced on some constitutions by green tea, such as nervous irritability, sleeplessness, &c.; and Mr. Fortune truly remarks, that what Mr. Warrington observed in the laboratory of Apothecaries' Hall, may be seen by every one who has a tree or bush in his garden. Mark the leaves which are blown from trees in early autumn; they are brown, or perhaps of a dullish green when they fall, but when they have been exposed for some time in their detached state to air and moisture, they become as black as our blackest teas. Without detailing the whole process in the manufacture of either kind of tea, it may be stated in reference to green tea, 1st, That the leaves are roasted almost immediately after they are gathered; and, 2d, That they are dried off quickly after the rolling process. In reference to black tea, on the other hand, it may be observed, 1st, That after being gathered, the leaves are exposed for a considerable time; 2d, That they are tossed about until they become soft and flaccid, and are then left in heaps; 3d, That after being roasted for a few minutes and rolled, they are exposed for some hours to the air in a soft and moist state; and, 4th, That they are at last dried slowly over charcoal fires. After all, then, genuine green tea is, as might reasonably be conjectured, an article less artificial than black. There is, at the same time, too much foundation for the suspicion, that the green teas, so much patronized in Europe and America, are not so innocently manufactured. Mr. Fortune witnessed the process of coloring them in the Hung-chow green tea country, and describes the process. The substance used is a powder consisting of four parts of gypsum and three parts of Prussian blue, which was applied to the teas during the last process of roasting.

"During this part of the operation," he says, "the hands of the workmen were quite blue. I could not help thinking, that if any green tea drinkers had been present during the operation, their taste would have been corrected, and, I may be allowed to add, improved. One day, an English gentleman in Shanghae, being in conversation with some Chinese from the green tea country, asked them what reason they had for dyeing the tea, and whether it would not be better without undergoing this process. They acknowledged that tea was much better when prepared without having any such ingredients mixed with it, and that they never drank dyed teas themselves; but justly remarked, that as foreigners seemed to prefer having a mixture of Prussian blue and gypsum with their tea, to make it look uniform and pretty, and as these ingredients were cheap enough, the Chinese had no objection to supply them, especially as such teas always fetched a higher price!" The quantity of coloring matter used is rather more than an ounce to 14 1-2 lbs. of tea; so that, in every 100 lbs. of colored green tea consumed in England or America, the consumer actually drinks nearly half a pound of Prussian blue and gypsum! Samples of these ingredients, procured from the Chinamen in the factory, were sent last year to the Great Exhibition. [Chambers' Journal.

Bark-Bound Trees.

Some over-wise people have an idea that when a tree gets mossy and bark-bound—the latter but another term for the want of growth and weakness, consequent upon neglected cultivation—it is only necessary to slit the bark up and down the stem with a jack-knife, and it will at once spread out and grow. This is sheer nonsense. Dig about and cultivate the roots, and the bark will take care of itself, with a scraping off of the moss, and a washing of the stem with lye or soap-suds, or chamber slops, which last is quite as good. The increased flow of sap, induced by a liberal feeding of the roots, will do its own bursting of the "hide-bound" bark, which is simply its enfeebled condition, as a consequence of its poverty of root. No one thinks of turning out a bony, half-starved calf, in the spring, into a clover field with the skin on its sides all split through with a knife in order to add to its growth. And this last proposition is quite as sensible and philosophical as the other. Nature takes care of itself in these particulars. Sap in plenty, is what blood is to animals. Its vigorous flow reaches every part of its composition, and gives to each its proper play and function. We can show frequent instances of a decrepit, shrivelled branch, by the throwing open and manuring of the roots, and a thorough pruning of the whole top, increasing from an inch to two inches in diameter in a single season; and without assistance as it grew, bursting and throwing off its old contracted bark as freely as the growth of a vigorous asparagus shoot would develop itself during a warm shower in May. Such nostrums are only the invention of the head to excuse the laziness of the hands. [Am. Ag.

Trout in Lake Erie.

We find in the Fredonia Censor a letter describing the success which has attended the experiments made to catch trout and white-fish in Lake Erie. The writer says:—

"So little known have been the contents of these waters, that until very recently it has been an object of profit to make frequent drafts on Old Connecticut for her salmon trout. But now it is ascertained that we have the very fish in great abundance at our feet Recent experiments in taking these fish have proved very successful. Mr. Andrews, on his return to Dunkirk from California, a few months since, aided by an old Mackinaw fisherman, set to work in earnest, preparing himself with all the necessary apparatus for fishing on a large scale. Several unsuccessful attempts were made at different depths of water, and in different ways, but at length the true way was found, and that by turning out some thirteen miles from shore and dropping nets to the depth of nearly or quite 100 feet, and thus letting them remain for some hours, when they are hauled up and the fish secured. The trout, unlike many other kinds of fish, have no gills, but swim with their mouths open, bridling themselves with the twine of the net, the meshes being too small to allow them to pass through, and they cannot back out because of the structure of their teeth curving inwardly, and thus they become their own executioners. Last evening Mr. Andrews took at one haul over fifteen hundred pounds of trout and whitefish. In this lot were thirty-three trout, weighing about thirty pounds each."

Growing Trees from Cuttings.

Professor Delacroix, of Besancon, in France, has discovered a mode of propagating from cuttings, which is not only successful in case of roses, and other plants easy to live, but apples, pears, plums, apricots, &c. Out of a hundred cuttings put out in June, not one but was thriving in August, in the open air, without shade or extra care, except watering a few times soon after they were planted. His method is to put the whole cutting in the ground, bent in the form of a bow, with the center part up, and just on a level with the surface, at which point there must be a good bud or shoot, which is the only part exposed to the air; the other, being protected by the earth from drying up, supports and gives vigor to the bud, which starts directly into leaf, and, in its turn, helps the cutting to form roots, and the whole even forms a thriving tree. The method of setting them is to form two drills about three inches apart, with a sharp ridge between, over which bend the cutting, stick an end in each drill, cover up, press the earth firmly, and water freely. Cuttings should be of the last year's growth, fresh and vigorous.

Cloves.

Cloves are the unopened flowers of a small evergreen tree that resembles in appearance the laurel or the bay. It is a native of the Molucca, or Spice Islands, but has been carried to all the warmer parts of the world, and is largely cultivated in all tropical regions of America. The flowers are small in size, and grow in large numbers in clusters at the very ends of the branches. The cloves we use are the flowers gathered before they are opened, and while they are still green. After being gathered, they are smoked by a wood fire, and then dried in the sun. Each clove consists of two parts, a round head, which is the four petals or leaves of the flowers rolled up, inclosing a number of small stocks or filaments. The other part of the clove is terminated with four points, and is, in fact, the flower cup, and unripe seed vessel. All these parts may be distinctly shown, if a few leaves are soaked for a short time in hot water, when the leaves of the flowers soften and readily unroll. The smell of cloves is very strong, and aromatic, but not unpleasant. Their taste is pungent, acrid, and lasting. Both the taste and smell depend on the quantity of oil they contain. Sometimes the oil is separated from the cloves before they are sold, and the odor and taste, in consequence, is much weakened by this proceeding.

Anecdote of Abd-el-Kader.

An amusing anecdote is told of this illustrious Arabian chief, who, to the eternal disgrace of France, is still a prisoner of State at Amboise. He lately employed a competent person to give his four children lessons in writing. The teacher fulfilled his task in the most exemplary manner, treating his little pupils with the utmost kindness. The brave father, being very grateful, bethought him of making the teacher a present as a mark of his esteem, and, after much cogitation, concluded to give him one of his five Arabian wives. The Frenchman in vain endeavored to explain that he already had a wife, and that the European law only allowed him one. Abd-el-Kader thought the writing master wished to be ceremonious, and persisted most perseveringly in his offer, stating in a courteous manner, that he would still have four wives left—enough, in the name of Allah, for a poor prisoner. The matter ended, and the writing master was rescued from this ludicrous dilemma by his wife—the original European one—carrying him off from the chief's presence, and prohibiting him from ever entering there again.

THE N. Y. AND ERIE RAILROAD.—Gen. S. F. Cary, of Ohio, in his Organ of the Temperance Reform, says:—

"The two great thoroughfares to the city of Gotham, viz: the one by Buffalo and Albany, and the other by Dunkirk, are thronged with travelers. Having passed over both these routes frequently, we have no hesitation in pronouncing the one by Dunkirk, over the Erie road, the most desirable. The cars are wider and more pleasant every way—not so many changes, and, what is still of greater importance, far more attention is paid to the comfort of passengers. In passing over the road from Buffalo you change cars twice, and if you have company, you may consider yourself fortunate if you can get seats in the same car; if you want a drink of water you must pay a boy a sixpence for a glass, or if you stop at a station for a drink, there will be but one pitcher of warm water, and one tumbler, unless you go to the bar and buy a glass of liquor, in which case you can procure some ice-water. On the Erie road each car is supplied with an ample cask of good ice-water, &c., which you can get free of charge, and without getting out of the car at the risk of being left."

WESTERN STEAMBOATS.—The first steamboat ever built in Pittsburgh was called "New Orleans." She was built under the superintendence of Mr. Rosevelt, for Messrs. Fulton & Livingston, New York; was of 138 feet keel, and calculated for about 400 tuns burden. She was launched in March, 1811, and arrived at Natchez in December, of the same year, where she took in passengers and freight, and from whence she proceeded to New Orleans. This was forty-eight years ago. During the last year, 1851, no less than three hundred and twenty steamboats were constructed; at Pittsburgh, 112; Wheeling, 46; Cincinnati, 111; Louisville, 61. The aggregate tunnage amounted to 63,297 tuns. The total number of passengers carried on these steamers during the year, was 3,050,626. The marine insurances effected on the hulls and cargoes amounted to $32,811,440. For the six months of the present year, there are fifty-nine steamboats built, or in progress of construction. Number of steamboats destroyed in the course of the year 1851, belonging to the four districts above named, was 44; of this number, 18 were snagged, and 13 burned. The number of lives lost, by these disasters, was 482.

A STATELY BRIDGE.—The New York and Buffalo Railroad, connecting Buffalo with the Erie Railroad at Hornellsville, via Warsaw and Portage Falls, is now completed and running, except the bridge over the Genesee at Portage Falls, which is to be completed on or about the 20th inst. Of this bridge the Wyoming County Mirror says:—

"This immense structure is nearly completed. Those who have not seen it should go now, as it is worth fifty miles travel to see them raising it. It will be, if not the wonder of the world, the wonder of the thousands who will visit it annually. We are not aware that there is another bridge in the world as high and as large as this, and are confident there is not, of similar structure. It is 235 feet from the river to the track, and 240 to the top of the railing; and the length is 1,000 feet. The suspension bridge at Niagara Falls is 230 feet high and 795 long—so that Niagara is beat in this respect. And yet, though this work is reared to such an astonishing hight, it has the appearance of perfect safety. We are told that by calculation they know that it would bear twenty times the weight of any train that can be put upon it."

ORIGIN OF THE CHOLERA.—At a recent religious meeting held at Exeter Hall, in London, the great Senate House of the English religious world, a gentleman of authority stated the undeniable fact, that the tax levied upon salt by Warren Hastings, during his tyrannical rule in India, was the cause of Asiatic cholera—a disease that has spread its poisonous, putrid breath over the world, and sent millions to the grave. The cholera was unknown before the period alluded to, and made its appearance immediately following the edict which deprived the lower castes of Hindoos of a healthful ingredient in their food, and it has ever since been extending itself throughout the globe, literally almost following the music of the British drum.

WHAT A WIFE SHOULD BE.—Burns, the poet, in one of his letters, sets forth the following as the true qualifications of a good wife:—"The scale of a good wifeship I divide into ten parts—good nature, four; good sense, two; wit, one; personal charms, viz., a sweet face, eloquent eyes, graceful carriage, all these, one; as for the other qualities belonging to, or attending on a wife, such as fortune, connexions, education, (I mean education extraordinary,) family blood, &c., divide the two remaining degrees among them as you please; minor proportions must be expressed by fractions, for there is not any one of them in the aforesaid scale entitled to the dignity of an integer."

NEW STYLE OF LIFE-PRESERVER.—A Life-Preserver of a novel construction has been invented by James McGerrah, of Philadelphia. It is a new application of an old principle to an article of common use, which will furnish a very important desideratum to the owners of steamboats and to travelers. This important affair consists of a metalic air vessel, which is attached to a settee, stool or chair, or in fact almost any portable article on a steamboat. To a settee Mr. McG. affixes an air-chamber, six feet long by ten inches wide, and six inches deep. This contrivance is placed permanently under the seat of the settee, and is not in the slightest degree liable to damage. One of these articles thrown into the water will sustain eight or ten persons. In case of an accident to a boat, where all the seats are furnished with these chambers, it would be almost impossible for a person to be lost by drowning, as the means of preserving life are always at hand.

NATURAL GAS.—As is very generally known, Fredonia, N. Y., has for a long time been lighted by natural gas, which issues at certain places spontaneously from fissures in the under-laying strata of rock. The supply, however, has hitherto proved insufficient for the demand. Recently, while a workman was engaged in drilling for a further supply of water in the well at the Johnson House, a fissure was reached, from which, on the withdrawal of the drill, a large and constant current of gas issued, with much force, through the water. Upon placing a tunnel over the jet and applying a candle, the gas ignited, throwing a column of flame to the top of the well, near twenty feet, and burning the man severely. The gas continues to issue unfailingly, and it is the intention of the proprietors of the hotel to apply it to immediate use in lighting their building.

CLEANLINESS FOR PLANTS.—"If as much washing were bestowed in London," says Dr. Lindley, "upon a pot-plant as upon a lap-dog, the one would remain in as good condition as the other. The reasons are obvious. Plants breathe by their leaves; and if their surface is clogged by dirt, of whatever kind, their breathing is impeded or prevented. Plants perspire by their leaves, and dirt prevents their perspiration. Plants feed by their leaves, and dirt prevents their feeding. So that breathing, perspiration, and food, are fatally interrupted by the accumulation of foreign matters upon leaves. Let any one, after reading this, cast his eye upon the state of plants in sitting rooms or well-kept greenhouses; let them draw a white handkerchief over the surface of such plants, or a piece of smooth white leather, if he desires to know how far they are from being as clean as their nature requires." [Hovey's Magazine.

RAPID EVAPORATION OF ICE.—Every washerwoman knows by experience, that when wet clothes are hung out in a freezing day, they will soon become hard; then they will dry, and become quite limber after being exposed for some time. This is owing to the rapid evaporation of ice. In the Arctic regions, the dryness of the atmosphere is remarkable. Wood, horn, and ivory are shriveled up. The handles of razors, knives, combs, &c., are damaged in the same way as when kept in warm rooms. The human body, in the Arctic regions, becomes highly electric from the dryness of the skin. Friction of the skin produces the electric ozone odor. "A piece of linen," says Sir John Richardson, "after being washed and exposed in the air at forty degrees below zero, if agitated by the wind, dries nearly as fast as if it were exposed to the sun in England."

POULTRY AND EGGS.—I do a small business in raising and putting up garden-seeds, and last fall, a year ago, as I was clearing out some red-pepper seeds in my back-yard, I threw the shuck and chaff promiscuously about. I soon observed the hens picking them up and swallowing them with great avidity. They soon commenced laying eggs, though they had laid none for a month before. I have fed them regularly, two or three times a week, since then, with red-pepper, and they have never yet stopped laying, summer or winter, spring or fall, except while they were hatching their chickens; and I am confident, from more than a year's experience, that by this method hens may be made to lay the year round.

FATTENING CALVES.—"E. T.," of Dauphin county, having tried various modes of fattening calves, has adopted the following as the best: About one gallon and a half of the milk of the dam is daily mixed with the meal of beans, which the calf greedily consumes, and which he finds is as effectual in forming bone and muscle as the whole of the milk, amounting to four or five gallons per day. This system is pursued for two weeks; at the end of that time, he substitutes linseed for been-meal, on which the calf rapidly fattens, and in four weeks is fit for the butcher, and in the finest condition.

HOW TO MAKE LARGE CURRANTS.—The currant likes a moist soil and a somewhat shady situation. Downing says, "No shrub shows the good effects of its manuring so completely as the currant. If you wish to get a very large fruit, train the bush on the north side of a trellis, and feed the roots with half-rotten stable-manure."

A few days since, says the Boston Traveler, a gentleman drew out from one of our banks thirteen hundred dollars in large bills, and on returning home laid a portion away for safe-keeping. A one hundred dollar bill and two fifties, however, he put in an envelop, and laid it in a drawer in his desk at home. He then was called away, and during his absence his servant girl, seeing a quantity of loose papers about his desk and in the drawers, took it into her head to clean up. At it she went, gathering all the loose and apparently useless papers which came in her way, and among others the envelop with the money within. When she had completed her cleaning, she threw the whole into the fire, destroying the money and all.

Mr. Henry O'Reilly, the telegraphist, has devised a very ingenious system of telegraphing adapted to railroad lines, by which a complete and instantaneous intercommunication may be kept up with every station and every passing train—thus making the managers at the center to control and regulate all the business and every movement along the whole line. Such a system would prevent many detentions and losses, obviate many imminent dangers, and save many precious lives.

VARIETY.

The Boston Journal describes, as one of the curiosities of the age, an electric clock which has recently been completed, on an entirely new principle, and pronounced by scientific men to be the most perfect and simple of any. All wheel-work in the time-keeping part is dispensed with, therefore all friction is overcome. The time-keeping part of the clock is simply a pendulum, an electro-magnet, and two armatures. The vibrations of the pendulum break and close the circuit of electricity, while the combined action of the electro-magnet and armatures keep it in motion.

The late Dr. Olbers, the distinguished astronomer of Germany, who discovered the planets Pallas and Vesta, says, as the result of careful meteorological observations for fifty years in different countries, "I believe I have demonstrated that the influence of the moon upon the weather is so small, that it is totally lost amid the great variety of other forces and causes which change the state of our atmosphere;" and that "its pretended influence on men, animals, or plants, is all due to illusion and prejudice."

The Patrie (Paris) says that experiments have for some years past been made with ether combined with steam, on board French government vessels. The result has been, that a great saving may be effected, but that the inflammable nature of ether renders it dangerous. It has just been resolved to replace ether by chloroform, and two engines of 60-horse power are to be placed in the Gallilee, to enable experiments to be made.

One liquor seller in Massachusetts has come the following dodge over the new law: He has purchased a piece of land about four miles from Lowell, through which the State line passes, being partly in New Hampshire and partly in Massachusetts, on which he has erected a temporary building for the sale of liquors, so contrived that his bar front stands on the State line, in New Hampshire, and he sells liquor in that State, while his customers drink it in Massachusetts.

A married gentleman, every time he met the father of his wife, complained to him of the ugly temper and disposition of his daughter. At last, upon one occasion, the old gentleman became weary of the grumblings of his son-in-law, and exclaimed, "You are right, she is an impertinent jade, and if I hear any more complaints of her, I will disinherit her." The husband made no more complaints.

A passenger in one of the New York omnibuses, in order to have no delay in settling his fare, put the sixpence intended for that purpose into his mouth. The coin unfortunately slipped into his wind-pipe, where it lodged, causing immediate loss of voice and danger of suffocation. After much suffering on the part of the patient, it was extracted by cutting into the wind-pipe.

There is a way of doing good in the world on a small scale, that is scarcely appreciated. A man who educates one child faithfully, may effect a work of greater benevolence than one who has won the name of philanthropist. The love concentrated in a family may produce richer fruits than that which embraces the world. Its action is more intense and invisible, but its results may go abroad and leaven the whole mass of a community.

There is a silk manufactory at Newport, Ky., which turns out some very fine specimens of goods, giving another proof of the facility with which American ingenuity can adapt itself to any industsy. The factory has been in operation about four years, and it manufactures cravats, handkerchiefs, and vesting of excellent body, soft in texture, which will no doubt wear well.

A dispatch from Washington, dated Sunday, Aug. 8, says:—Hon. Robert Rantoul, Jr., of Massachusetts, died of malignant erysipelas, this morning at 11 o'clock. He was at his seat in the House of Representatives on Tuesday last, and was not considered dangerously ill till within a few hours of his death."

On Sixth-day, Aug. 6, a bridge on the Hamilton and Eaton Railroad, (Ohio,) gave way while the down train was passing over it. Two freight and baggage cars were smashed, and four persons badly injured. The passenger cars fortunately became detached when the forward cars fell, or the result would have been more serious.

The Dutch have a singular contrivance to cure laziness. If a pauper, who is able, refuses to work, they put him in a cistern and let in a sluice of water. It comes just so fast that by briskly plying a pump, with which the cistern is furnished, he keeps himself from drowning.

The editor of the London Punch, who has some thoughts about money, says:—"I am assured by the poetess, that there is a 'silver lining to every cloud.' As I do not live in the clouds, I cannot say; but I only wish there was a silver lining to every purse."

Gen. Cass says there are two things which you cannot teach an Indian—to fear death or earn a living. While Cato could not improve their stoicism, all the tax gatherers in the world, he says, could not add a particle to their industry.

Sixteen cars, loaded with eight sticks of timber, for ships' masts, 84 feet in length and 3 feet in diameter, loaded in Buffalo, were recently brought to East Boston, and thence over the Eastern Railroad to Portsmouth, N. H., 628 miles, without change of cars.

The last bird I ever fired at (says Byron) was an eagle; it was only wounded, and I tried to save it, the eye was so bright; but it pined and died in a few days, and I never did since and never will attempt the life of another bird.

In the parish of Feeding Hills, West Springfield, (Mass.) containing about 600 inhabitants, there are nine persons whose aggregate ages are 770 years, and whose ages average 85½ years.

The American fishing schooner Union has been seized for a violation of the fishing Treaty, and taken into Charlottetown, Prince Edward's Island.

There are eighty-three resident clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the City of New York.

The short and true way to reputation, is to take care to be in truth what we would have others think us to be.

Boston is ornamented with ten fountains, which, when playing, consume 582,780 gallons of water in an hour.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels. Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June, of each year.

Board of Instruction.
Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, Teacher of Mathematics.

The Terms of 1852 and 1853 are as follows—

The first Term commences Wednesday, August 25; closes Tuesday, Nov. 30.

The second commences Thursday, Dec. 2; closes Tuesday, March 15.

The third commences Thursday, March 17; closes Tuesday, June 28.

There will be a recess of one day between the Terms, and of one week at the middle of the Winter Term.

Tuition must be arranged before entering classes, and, if less than a Term, paid strictly in advance.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per term, $3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Analysis, Composition, and Beginners in Algebra, 4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c., 5 00
Heating and Sweeping Halls, Ringing Bell, &c. 50

Extras.—Chemical Experiments, $1; Drawing, $1; Monochromatic Painting, $3; Oil Painting, $5; Writing and Stationery, 50 cents.

Board.—In private families, from $1 25 to $1 50 per week. In Clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

N. B.—Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the Common School Branches, with daily Lectures on "the Art of Teaching," the Laws of Health, School Laws, Chemistry, Physiology, &c. Tuition, $2 50. ROMANISM AT ROME.

Rev. Dr. Murray, of Elizabethtown, N. J., author of a series of letters to Bishop Hughes over the signature of Kirwan, visited Rome a year or two ago; and since his return he has written several letters to Chief Justice Taney, giving his impressions of Rome and Romanism. The following is from one of those letters:—

I have been to the "Holy City"—I have seen its Pope, cardinals, and priests—I sought there information as to its civil, social, and religious state—and from personal examination, and from testimony received from the most creditable witnesses, both natives and foreign residents, I am prepared to say that, from the extent of its population, there is not a worse governed, less religious, or more immoral people in Christendom. And, tried by its fruits, where there are no obstacles to prevent its natural results, Romanism should be the abhorrence of all flesh.

There is no personal liberty in Rome. Since the return of the Pope from Naples to the Vatican, the reins of despotism have been tightened by a powerful hand. The patriots that could escape have fled; and you find them in Genoa, Turin, Geneva, France, and Britain—homeless, yet hopeful exiles—strong in faith that the sun of liberty will yet rise, even over Rome. The suspected are in prison; and the prisons are crowded. Spies, by day and by night, surround those who show any lack of confidence in the priest. While I was there, the plan was completed of dividing the city into small sections of about twenty families each, and of placing a priest over each of these sections; nominally to look after their religious wants; but really to act as the spies of the government! And through the vigilance of these spies, and the information which they wring from wives and daughters and servant women at the confessional, the sigh breathed after liberty by the most obscure man, in his most obscure and humble dwelling, is reported in a few hours to the head of the police! And if a Roman desires to visit other countries, before he can get permission, he must first get a certificate from the magistrate of his district, that he is a good citizen—then from the priest of his section that he is a good Papist; with these he goes to the head of the police, and if there is no information lodged there against him, he receives a passport. Take one occurrence as an illustration. A young Roman, a few years since, went to Sardinia, where he married. Business failed him, and he returned to Rome to seek employment, leaving his wife and children behind him. He entered the employment of a person who, in the Revolution, took part against the government. Within the present year, that man wished to return to his family, and with the certificate of the magistrate of his district, and of the priest of his section, he presented himself to the head of the police, who, I learned, is a priest. And simply because he was recorded as having been in the employment of an enemy of the old government, instead of getting his passport he was ordered to prison; and where imprisoned, none knew but God and the priests!

A Roman of wealth married a lady of foreign birth, and by whom he had a large family of children. After a life of love and harmony, he died, leaving his property to his widow and children, by a will duly authenticated. Although regardless of the priests in health, he sent for one when dying, who confessed him, and anointed him, and "fixed him off" for Purgatory or Paradise. A few days after his death, that priest swore before the tribunal having jurisdiction in such cases, that the dying man confessed to him a great sin, and to atone for which he wished his entire property, contrary to his will, to go to the Church. And, on the oath of that priest, the will of the deceased was set aside—his property was turned into the Treasury of the Church, and his widow and children were turned out penniless on the world! Thus nothing is necessary to deprive any family in Rome that has lost its head, of its property, but the oath of a priest! And if you had seen them in crowds, as I have, you would conclude, as I have, that it would be an easy matter to get a priest in Rome that would swear any thing. Absolution from perjury that enriches the Church is easily secured.

Nor is there any religion in Rome. I do not mean to say that, among its thousands of ecclesiastics, there are none that love God, nor do I mean to say that the Lord has no chosen ones hidden amid the chaff and the trash that are everywhere visible there; but I do mean to say, and to affirm as strongly as language can do it, that among the masses of the priests and people there is no fear of God, and no knowledge of the doctrines of our religion. And how could there be, in the absence of the means instituted by Heaven to sustain and to extend religion among a people?

There is no Sabbath in Rome. The only apparent difference there between the Sabbath and other days of the week is, that the shops are more gaily dressed—the markets are more full—and more people are engaged in buying and selling. On my way to St. Peters from the Hotel d'Angloterre, I saw monks and priests in all the shops and markets, buying as on other days, and chattering like magpies. In Naples the shops are closed and all business suspended on feast-days, but on the Sabbath all business is brisker than usual. Romanism knows no Sabbath.

There is no Bible in Rome. I made many inquirers there for a Bible, but without success. The people have no Bible. They know nothing about it. An intelligent man of fifty told me that he never saw one. Multitudes of the priests know nothing about it. And when asked why they have none for sale, the bookseller will tell you that it is prohibited. Captain Packenham, once a banker in the city, and a most respectable gentleman and devout Christian, is now in banishment for circulating the Scriptures there during the short existence of the Republic. Much of true religion consists in knowing God and Jesus Christ; and how can they be known by a people from whom the Bible is excluded?

There is no preaching in Rome Now and then a foreign priest or ecclesiastic visiting there, in search of a pallium, or of a cardinal's hat, may get up a brief course of lectures, for the edification of the strangers wintering there; but these are usually vain and ambitious men, who seek in this way to gain favor at court, and to promote their self-interests. There is no preaching to the Italians; and when there is an occasional exception to the rule, it is not the gospel that is preached; it is either a eulogy upon some Popish saint, or a vehement harangue against the Reformation and Protestants. Popery treats as a nullity the ascending command of the Saviour, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." This one crime is enough to subject it to the curse of "Anathema Maranatha."

TRIBUTE TO A WIFE.

Sir James Mackintosh, the historian, was married early in life, before he had attained fortune or fame, to Miss Catherine Stuart, a young Scotch lady, distinguished more for the excellence of her character, than for her personal charms. After eight years of happy life, during which she became the mother of three children, she died. A few days after her death, the bereaved husband wrote to a friend, depicting the character of his wife in the following terms:—

"I was guided," he observes, "in my choice only by the blind affection of my youth. I found an intelligent companion, and a tender friend, a prudent monitress, the most faithful of wives, and a mother as tender as children ever had the misfortune to lose. I met a woman, who, by the tender management of my weaknesses, gradually corrected the most pernicious of them. She became prudent from affection; and though of the most generous nature, she was taught frugality and economy by her love for me. During the most critical period of my life, she preserved order in my affairs, from the care of which she relieved me. She gently reclaimed me from dissipation; she propped my weak and irresolute nature; she urged my indolence to all the exertions that have been useful and creditable to me; and she was perpetually at hand to admonish my heedlessness or improvidence. To her I owe whatever I am; to her whatever I shall be. In her solicitude for my interest, she never for a moment forgot my feelings or my character. Even in her occasional resentment, for wich I but too often gave her cause, (would to God I could recall those moments!) she had no sullenness or acrimony. Her feelings were warm and impetuous, but she was placable, tender, and constant. Such was she whom I have lost; and I have lost her when her excellent natural sense was rapidly improving, after eight years of struggle and distress had bound us fast together, and moulded our tempers to each other; when a knowledge of her worth had refined my youthful love into friendship, and before age had deprived it of much of its original ardor. I lost her, alas! the choice of my youth, the partner of my misfortunes, at a moment when I had the prospect of her sharing my better days."

THE FOUNDATION OF SUCCESS.

Stephen Allen, who was lost by the recent calamity on the Hudson River, had long been a man of influence and usefulness in the city of New York. In his pocket-book was found a well-worn slip from a newspaper, the general principles inculcated in which he is regarded as having embodied in his life to a remarkable degree. It is as follows:—

"Keep good company or none. Never be idle. If your hands cannot be usefully employed, attend to the cultivation of your mind. Always speak the truth. Make few promises. Live up to your engagements. Keep your own secrets, if you have any. When you speak to a person, look him in the face. Good company and good conversation are the very sinews of virtue. Good character is above all things else. Your character cannot be essentially injured, except by your own acts. If any one speaks evil of you, let your life be so that none will believe him. Drink no kind of intoxicating liquors. Ever live (misfortunes excepted) within your income. When you retire to bed, think over what you have been doing during the day. Make no haste to be rich, if you would prosper. Small and steady gains give competency with tranquillity of mind. Never play at any kind of game of chance. Avoid temptation, through fear you may not withstand it. Earn money before you spend it. Never run into debt, unless you see a way to get out again. Never borrow, if you can possibly avoid it. Do not marry until you are able to support a wife. Never speak evil of any one. Be just before you are generous. Keep yourself innocent, if you would be happy. Save when you are young, to spend when you are old. Read over the above maxims at least once a week."

An exchange copies the foregoing, and adds:—

"Could there be counsels which would more certainly secure the entire worldly success of him who would follow them? Is there one man in a thousand who, never swerving from obedience to them from youth upward, need fail to attain at least a competence, accompanied with a well-settled respect from those around him, which brings more enduring and pervading happiness to its possessor than the most dazzling honors which an excited people bestow with one breath to take away with another? The duties here enjoined are but those of man to man, or of man to himself. These counsels refer only to the daily life of one who seeks not distinction, but quiet happiness; who strives not even for wealth for wealth's sake, but so to conduct his business that with modest independence he may command that unimpeached credit which is so much more honorable to its possessor than heaps of gold acquired by devious or even hazardous means. Homely, however, as they seem in tone, applicable only to the even course of such as seek no farther than to discharge with a clear conscience the simple duties of a life without ambition and without change, it is precisely such rules of conduct as these which, if strictly followed, surely raise men to an eminence which has the rare addition of stability.

"We are somewhat in danger, in our dashing enterprise, of disregarding those qualities which go to make men of sterling worth; and such men save us. They are the stamina of the community. He who has millions must of necessity hold a prominent place among his fellows; but a prominent position is not always one of honor; and for the well-being of a community, better the man who has accumulated thousands by unflinching industry, directed by a purpose of unswerving integrity, than he who, through a series of fortunate guesses, has, by the losses of others, become the possessor of hundreds of thousands. The mind of the one exists in well-compacted integrity; that of the other is debauched, unbalanced, loose. The one is more useful without his money than the other with his. The one has made that which he has a part of himself; he controls it knowingly, as if it were but a further development of his own powers for good; the other feels hardly sure even of that which is his only claim to his adventitious consideration, and which places him upon an eminence whose height but dwarfs his real self in the eyes of others, and unsettles his own ill-balanced brain. Integrity of mind and purpose is the only surety which any man—above all, any merchant—can have for a successful, happy, useful, and honorable life. Without it, the most brilliant talents lead but to gilded discontent, and the boldest enterprise but to the direst ruin."

REVISING THE SCRIPTURES.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Baptist Register gives the facts connected with the revision of the Scriptures recently made by a Committee of the American Bible Society. It seems that the Committee was appointed in 1847, for the purpose of collating the editions of the English Bible published by the American Society, with those issued in Great Britain. After several meetings, on the 25th of March, 1848, they adopted the following resolutions, as expressing the general views to which they had been led by their examination and experience hitherto, and to serve as rules for their further guidance:—

"1. That the royal octavo edition of the English Bible, issued by this Society, be adopted as the basis for corrections.

"2. That the said American copy be compared with recent copies of the four leading British editions, viz., those of London, Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh; and also with the original edition of 1611.

"3. That the comparison include the orthography, capital letters, words in Italic, and punctuation. (To these were added in practice the contents of the chapters, and the running heads of the columns.)

"4. That so far as the four English copies are uniform, the American copy be conformed to them, unless otherwise specially ordered by the Committee.

"5. That the collator be instructed, in his further labors, to apply the principles and cases previously adopted and decided by this Committee; and that hereafter he lay before the Committee only such cases as have not before been acted upon, or such as may seem to need further consideration."

"6. That in respect to the indefinite article, the form an be used before all vowels and dipthongs not pronounced as consonants, and also before h silent or unaccented; and that the form a be employed in all other cases."

After further examination and experience, at a meeting of the Committee, Sept. 22, 1848, the following additional rules were adopted:—

"7. That, in cases where the four recent British copies, and also the original edition and our own copy, vary in punctuation, the uniform usage of any three of the copies shall be followed.

"8. That when the London, Oxford, and Cambridge editions agree in the use or omission of the hyphen in compound words, the same usage be adopted.

"9. That when the term scripture or scriptures refers to the whole volume of inspired truth, it begin with a capital letter; but when the reference is to some particular portion, it begin with a small letter."

In the report of the Board for 1851, in reference to the variations existing in different copies of the English Bible, we find the following statement:—

"Although these different readings did not affect the sense, as they pertained mostly to orthography, Italic words, capital letters, and punctuation, yet it seemed highly important that there should be, if possible, uniformity in these particulars."

This presents a fair representation of what was designed to be accomplished by the Committee, as will be seen in the following, among the concluding remarks of their able report:—

"As illustrating the necessity of the present collation, and the remarks already made upon the exposure to variation and error in the printing of so many millions of copies, it may suffice here to mention, that the number of variations recorded by the collator, solely in the text and punctuation of the six copies compared, falls but little short of twenty-four thousand. Yet of all this great number there is not one which mars the integrity of the text, or affects any doctrine or precept of the Bible."

The love of the beautiful and the true, like the dew-drop in the heart of the crystal, remains forever clear and liquid in the shrine of men's being.

VISIT TO A ZOOLOGICAL GARDEN.

BY FREDRIKA BREMER.

It is to me difficult to imagine a greater pleasure than that of a visit to the Zoological Garden which lies on one side of the Regent's Park, London. I would willingly reside near this park for a time, that I might again and again wander about in this world of animals from all zones, and listen to all that they have to relate—ice-bears and lions, turtles and eagles, the orang-outang and the rhinoceros! The English Zoological Garden, although less fortunate in its locality than the Jardin des Plantes in Paris, is much richer as regards animals. That which at this time attracted hither most visitors was the new guest of the garden, a so-called river-horse or hippopotamus, lately brought hither from Upper Egypt, where it was taken when young. It was yet not full-grown, and had here its own keeper—an Arab—its own house, its own court, its own reservoir to bathe and swim in! Thus it lived in a really hippopotamus fashion. I saw his highness ascend out of his bath in a particularly good humor, and he looked to me like an enormous—pig, with an enormously broad snout. He was very fat, smooth, and gray, and awkward in his movements, like an elephant. Long-necked giraffes walked about, feeding from wooden racks in the court adjoining that of the hippopotamus, and glancing at us across it. One can scarcely imagine a greater contrast than in these animals.

The eagles sat upon crags placed in a row beneath a lofty transparent arch of iron work, an arrangement which seemed to me excellent, and which I hope seemed so to them, in case they could forget that they were captives. Here they might breathe, here spread out their huge wings, see the free expanse of heaven, and the sun, and build habitations for themselves upon the rock. On the contrary, the lions, leopards, and such like noble beasts of the desert, seemed to me particularly unhappy in their iron-grated stone vaults; and their perpetual uneasy walking backward and forward in their cages—I could not see that without a feeling of distress. How beautiful they must be in the desert, or in the tropical woods, or in the wild caverns of the mountains, those grand, terrific beasts—how fearfully beautiful! One day I saw these during their feeding time. Two men went round with wooden vessels filled with pieces of raw meat; these were taken up with a large iron-pronged fork, and put, or rather flung, through the iron grating into the dens. It was terrible to see the savage joy, the fury, with which the food was received and swallowed down by the beasts. Three pieces of meat were thrown into one great vault, which was at that time empty; a door was then drawn up at the back of the vault, and three huge yellow lions, with shaggy manes, rushed roaring in, and at one spring each possessed himself of his piece of flesh. One of the lions held his piece between his teeth for certainly a quarter of an hour, merely growling and gloating over it with savage joy, while his flashing eyes glared upon the spectators, and his tail was swung from side to side with an expression of defiance. It was a splendid but fearful sight. One of my friends was accustomed sometimes to visit these animals in company with his little girl, a beautiful child, with a complexion like milk and cherries. The sight of her invariably produced great excitement in the lions. They seemed evidently to show their love to her in a ravenous manner.

The serpents were motionless in their glass house, and lay half asleep, curled around the trunks of trees. In the evening, by lamplight, they become lively, and then, twisting about and flashing forth their snaky splendors, they present a fine spectacle. The snake-room, with its glass, behind which the snakes live, reminded me of the old northern myth of Nastrond, the roof of which was woven of snakes' backs, the final home of the ungodly—an unpleasant but vigorous picture. The most disagreeable and the ugliest of all the snakes, was the little snake which the beautiful Queen Cleopatra, herself false as a serpent, placed at her breast; a little gray, flat-headed snake, which liked to bury itself in the sand.

The monkey family led a sad life; stretching out their hands for nuts or bread, with mournful human gestures; contentious, beaten, oppressed, thrust aside, frightening one another, the stronger the weaker—mournfully human also.

Sad, also, was the sight of an orang-outang, spite of all its queer grimaces, solitary in its house, for it evidently suffered ennui, was restless, and would go out. It embraced its keeper and kissed him with real human tenderness. The countenance, so human, yet without any human intelligence, made a painful impression upon me; so did the friendly tame creature here, longing for its fellows, and seeing around it only human beings. Thou poor animal! Fain would I have seen thee in the primeval woods of Africa, caressing thy wife in the clear moonlight of the tropical night, sporting with her among the branches of the trees, and sleeping upon them, rocked by the warm night wind. There thy ugliness would have had a sort of picturesque beauty. After the strange beast-man had climbed hither and thither along the iron railing, seizing the bars with his hands, and feet which resembled hands, and also with his teeth, he took a white woolen blanket, wrapped it around him in a very complicated manner, and ended by laying himself down, as a human being might do, in his chilly, desolate room.

After this, all the more charming was the spectacle presented by the water-fowl from every zone—Ducks, Swans, and Co., all quite at home here, swimming in the clear waters, among little green islands on which they had their huts. It was most cheeringly pretty and complete. And the mother-duck, with her little lively golden flock swimming neck and heels after her, or seeking shelter under her wings, is at all times one of the most lovely scenes of natural life—resembling humanity in a beautiful manner.

Even among the wild beasts I saw a beautiful human trait of affection. A female leopard had in her cage two young cubs, lively and playful as puppies. When the man threw flesh into her cage, she drew herself back and let the young ones first seize upon the piece.

Crows from all parts of the world here live together in one neighborhood; and that the chattering and laughter was loud here did not surprise me, neither that the European crow so well maintained his place among his fellows. That which, however, astonished and delighted me was, the sweet, flute-like, melodious tones of the Australian crow. In the presence of this crow from Paradise—for originally it must have come therefrom—it seemed to me that all the other crows ought to have kept silence with their senseless chattering. But they were nothing but crows, and they liked better to hear themselves.

Parrots from all lands lived and quarreled together in a large room, and they there made such a loud screaming, that in order to stand it one must have been one of their own relations. Better be among the silent, dejected, stealthy, hissing, shining snakes, than in company with parrots! The former might kill the body, but the latter the soul.

Twilight came on, and drove me out of the Zoological Garden each time I was there, and before I had seen all its treasures. Would that I might return there yet a third time, and remain still longer.

THE LIBERAL PROFESSIONS.

The New Hampshire Congregational Journal has an article on the "Compensation of the Liberal Professions," which furnishes, in one direction at least, an explanation of the want of candidates for the ministry. We quote from the Journal:—

At the "donation visit" lately made by his parishioners to the Rev. Dr. French, of North Hampton, upon the completion of half a century of pastoral life, it was stated by this humble and honored Christian minister, that the hundred and sixty-five dollars presented in gold pieces by his affectionate parishioners would be a valuable help in erecting a shelter for his old age, when in the course of a few days he should preach his last sermon, and soon after leave the parsonage to his successor.

Here is a Christian minister, who spent years in obtaining a public education, and incurred heavy expenses in passing through it, whose abilities, native and acquired, were of a highly respectable order, whose life was most exemplary, being alike above both reproach and suspicion, whose labors were incessant, seldom interrupted by ill health, and never a day by indolence; who has toiled on patiently and uncomplainingly for half a century; and when he reaches the period of seventy-five years, in spite of his utmost industry and economy, finds himself shut out of house and home! We see it stated, that all his worldly substance is insufficient to erect an ordinary dwelling, when he shall be required to leave the parsonage in which he spent his active life, sacred by a thousand recollections and associations, in which his children were born and sported, where he pursued his studies and prepared instructions for his people, where he prayed, hoped, and rejoiced, and, it may be, sometimes sorrowed and wept, and where in some consecrated room the Christian so often came for comfort, and the awakened sinner for counsel. Fifty years of labor, and yet without a house—without a home! His parish is not to be reproached; it was not large in numbers or abounding in wealth; it honored its minister, and clung to him to the last. But such is the state of the ministry, on such conditions does the young candidate enter it, whatever his talents, and however competent for any other profession or honorable and lucrative pursuit, that he may as well voluntarily take the vow of poverty, and make a virtue of it, as come to the same end, despite of fretting and resistance.

How different with the other professions! Physicians are seldom poor, if they are not rich. Those of merely respectable abilities for the most part succeed in a life time of practice in securing not only a shelter but a competence for the wants of old age, while a large number, without prolonged and exhausting efforts, attain to independence and wealth. In the legal profession, to which all offices of emolument and honor are secured by prescriptive right, an eminent advocate obtains, even in a country practice, by half a dozen pleas occupying twice as many hours more than the annual salary of an able and learned minister. Respectable mechanics often receive double the compensation of pastors, and even wood-sawyers would frequently exchange their calling for the pulpit at a pecuniary loss, while the superintendents of railroads, artisans, conductors, engineers, firemen, and all sorts of employees connected with them, would scorn the remuneration thought ample for their ministers.

Then comes an evil to embitter poverty, of which the older ministers were happily ignorant. A tract of land was granted them as "a settlement," which they subdued, cultivated, and in some cases adorned, on which they lived and expected to die, and where they found a shelter and support, however humble, when the dark shadows of old age began to fall around them. The little salary, eked out by industry, furnished present comfort, while the secured retreat for the decline of life saved the heart from the withering fears and anticipations of absolute want and suffering. Who now has a home? Who can tell what will be on the morrow? Without home, house, or shed, the victims of every and any folly, of ignorance, caprice, selfishness, sordidness, and malice, if the sword of Damocles is not seen every moment suspended by a hair over their breast, yet "a terrible sound is heard in their ears" of intrigue, faction, and dissatisfaction, more cruel than the drawn sword, since it permits them neither to die nor live.

Is it strange that so few enter the ministry? How can feeble spirits make so large a sacrifice, when it is foreseen and inevitable? Is it strange that the sons of Christian ministers turn away to other professions and pursuits, in the knowledge of what their fathers and their families suffered? Must not the ministry hold out more cheerful prospects, or else be abandoned by those competent to fill it? Heaven sustain those who are in it, and encourage others to enter; for, poor as they are here, riches await them hereafter, and even now God will take care of those who care for his cause. Their bread shall be sure, and their water shall not fail, while the consideration comes to console and sustain them, that the history of the church goes to prove that the ministry is kept pure only by being kept poor.

THE INFLUENCE OF A REMARK.

A few years ago, a man in humble circumstances in life, emigrated from Scotland to this country, and settled in one of our Western States. He was a coarse and ignorant man, but very energetic, and entirely devoted to the acquisition of property. He had been very poor, and felt that wealth constituted the greatest of all earthly blessings. He had never enjoyed any of the advantages of education, and was perfectly unconscious of the value of a cultivated mind. His wild and rustic home was carved out of the wilderness, where he was surrounded by those hardy pioneers who knew of no employment but toil. Rich harvests began to wave upon his well-tilled and fertile acres. His barns were filled with plenty, and cattle accumulated in his pastures; his plain but substantial dwelling was provided with all home comforts; he became a man of wealth. He had an only child, a daughter, whom he loved with the instinctive love of one who knew nothing of the refinements of affection, but who feels proud of possessing a child to whom he could leave the fruits of his toilsome and successful life.

One winter's evening, as the sleet was drifting over the bleak plains, and the wind whistling around his windows, two strangers, from different directions, sought a night's hospitality beneath the roof of the rich old farmer. One was a young adventurer, penniless and almost friendless, seeking his fortune in the boundless West. The other was an intelligent, middle-aged gentleman of wealth from the East, traveling on business connected with an important speculation in which he was about to embark. The fire, or large logs of wood, blazed brightly on the hearth. The hardy old farmer, blessed with the vigor which the health of sixty years confers, sat by his kitchen fire-side smoking his pipe, now and then exchanging a word with the strangers, neither of whom seemed disposed to sociability. The farmer's wife and rustic daughter sat in silence, the latter paring apples and stringing the slices to hang in festoons to dry from the poles suspended from the walls. The wife was engaged in knitting—that employment which seems to be the heaven-conferred solace and blessing for the aged and for the infirm.

An half hour of perfect silence had elapsed, during which the two strangers seemed entirely absorbed in their own thoughts, when the middle-aged gentleman suddenly roused himself from his revery, and turning his eyes to the maiden, inquired—

"Is this your only daughter, my friend?"

"Yes," replied the farmer, "she is my only child."

"Indeed," was the reply. "As you seem to be blessed with all the comforts of life, I suppose you mean to give her a very perfect education?"

"Not I," the farmer rejoined, "I never had any education myself, and I do not believe it will do her any good. I mean to leave her money, so that she will not have to work as hard as her poor father mother have been compelled to do. Money is the best friend one can have in such a world as this."

"I think you are wrong there, friend," the gentleman replied. "I also have an only daughter and an only child. She is about the same age with yours, but I mean to give her as perfect an education as money can give and as she has the capacity to receive. A good education is something which no one but God can take from her."

All relapsed again into their former silence. But there was something in the terseness of the expression, "A good education is something which no one but God can take from her," which struck, with peculiar force, the mind of the young man. He repeated the words again and again. He pondered their weighty import. They became engraved upon his memory in characters never to be effaced.

The night passed away. The morning dawned. The cold rays of a winter's sun glistened upon the wide and cheerless expanse of snow. After breakfast in the warm kitchen of the farmer, the two strangers separated, each to go his own way. They never met again. But the remark which had fallen upon the ear of the young man, had awakened thoughts which were never to be forgotten: "A good education is something which no one but God can take from her."

Years with their changes rolled on. The young man, enterprising and energetic, had found himself a home, and a group of bright and happy children were clustered about his comfortable fire-side. When he received his first-born son to his arms, he said: "This child is given to me to educate. A good education is something which no one but God can take from him." His wife imbibed his spirit. And as one after another was added to the number of their happy family, they both felt that their great duty in life was to educate their children. It became the all-absorbing object of their labor and their ambition. Thirteen children were given to them. They were all educated—highly educated. The sons became prominent members of the learned professions, swaying a wide influence over thousands of minds. The daughters became highly accomplished, intellectual ladies, to fill the posts of wives and mothers, to inspire their children with a love for knowledge. And what finite mind can tell where this mighty influence shall terminate? Who can tell to what uncounted thousands of roused and invigorated intellects this one sentiment will not prove to have been the guiding angel? It is thus that in this world apparent accidents achieve the mightiest miracles. A casual word, forgotten almost before it has left the lips, may form the destiny for time and eternity of multitudes which no tongue can number. [Mothers' Magazine.

FORGIVENESS.

In refusing to an enemy any thing more than a dry or cold salutation, there is an obvious disregard of the duty our Saviour intended to set forth in the question, "If ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others?" In our remarks, week before last, we attempted to show that it was a species of revenge; that whoever practiced it, though he might profess to have forgiven his enemy, was in reality deceiving himself. He had not forgiven him, but was still holding the rod of punishment over him.

Possibly, however, an evasion of this kind may be attempted. It may be said, that the forgiving mercy of God himself is not extended to the transgressor without some tokens of displeasure against the offense. God hides his face even from those who are the subjects of his pardoning love, and chastises them severely. And as we are required to forgive only as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us, it cannot be expected that we should lay aside every expression of displeasure, carrying ourselves with as much complacency towards the offender as if he had never done any wrong.

To this objection we reply as follows:—

1. We admit that God chastises his people, when they disobey him; even the very people whose sins he pardons, fully and freely. Thus he expresses his displeasure at their conduct. It must be remembered, however, that God always chastises in the same tenderness of spirit that a father chastises his erring children. "Since I spake against him, I do earnestly remember him still." Jer. 31: 20. He corrects, but it is solely for the purpose of benefiting his people. Heb. 12: 10. He is even more tender than any earthly parent can be. The mother is not so full of compassion for her offspring as God is for his people, even at the very time that he afflicts them. Isa. 49: 15. But is it in the yearnings of paternal love, that an injured person withholds the usual tokens of kindness from his enemy, and gives him nothing but cold civility instead? It cannot be pretended.

2. God is possessed of infinite wisdom, and knows whether or not his tokens of displeasure will be followed by the desired effect. It is not in any doubt of the result that he employs them, nor does he first balance probabilities, and then inflict the chastisement in a mere conjecture that the offender will be benefited. He foresees the result, with the most absolute certainty. He has also such perfect control of the heart, that at the very time he is manifesting his displeasure at the offense, he can make the offender feel that no unkindness is cherished towards him personally. But when a mortal, by withholding the usual greetings of kindness from his offending neighbor, would manifest merely his displeasure at the offense, he knows not whether the manifestation will be followed by any good result. Nor has he any command over the heart of his enemy, to make him feel that the manifestation is not prompted by a sentiment of unkindness towards him personally. The chances are ten to one that his enemy will look upon it as the token of alienated feeling; and the breach, instead of being healed by such a course, will only be made the wider.

3. God's tokens of displeasure against the offense itself are always accompanied with abundant manifestations of regard for the offender. They are intermingled with the most unmistakable pledges of love. And however severe may be the afflictions which he sometimes sends upon his people, they are never such unmitigated afflictions as to leave his people without any thing to be thankful for. But when a mortal withholds salutation from an offending neighbor, what unmistakable pledge of undiminished love is he able to afford? In what way will he make the offender feel that he loves him still?

We believe, then, that this evasion is perfectly futile. He who resorts to it does but awkwardly seek to conceal the feelings of personal dislike which actuate him. He is vindictive. Not violently so, it may be, yet still enough so to show that he does not heartily and fully forgive his enemy.

4. But is it true, that God hides the light of his face from those whom he has once forgiven? Our opinion is, that his smiles beam with an uninterrupted effulgence, in the gospel of his Son; and that, at the very time when he is smiting his people for their disobedience, his assurances of grace and love are as strong as his word can make them. The natural unbelief of the human heart, which always returns upon us when we are conscious of having transgressed, makes us think that God has hid his face, and throws into doubt whether we shall ever enjoy the light of it again. But, in reality, God has not changed; the change is only in ourselves. Hear him addressing his Israel; pouring out upon them the most caustic reproofs for their wickedness, yet in the same breath declaring, "I am he that blotteth out thy transgression for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins." Isa. 43: 25.

The practical lesson deduced from this is, that we should never, by any course of behavior towards those who have offended us, give them ground to suppose that our affections are alienated. T. B. B.

A Chapel for Hayti.—Rev. W. L. Judd, the Missionary of the Baptist Free Mission Society, is now in this country, endeavoring to raise $6000 for the purpose of building a Chapel at Port-au-Prince.

Two Sabbaths.—At Westerly, R. I., is presented the very singular feature of two Sabbaths every week. Almost one half of the inhabitants are Seventh-day Baptists, who keep Saturday with great sacredness, and on no account will do any work. The remainder observe Sunday as a holy day, and as studiously avoid all labor. The result is, that on Saturday a portion may be seen going to church, a part of the stores are closed, and some of the factories are short-handed or closed entirely. On Sunday the same thing is to be observed. A part are engaged in worship and acts of devotion, while their neighbors are busily at work, and public worship is disturbed by the din of business and the noisy bustle of the crowd. Both parties appear strictly conscientious, and live peaceably together, although the partial observance of two days is very annoying and inconvenient.

☞ We clip the above from one of our exchanges. No doubt great "inconvenience" results from the diversity of practice alluded to. Could not seme plan be devised to obviate it? That those who observe the Saturday, or the seventh day of the week, will change their practice, is hardly to be expected, because they profess to be bound in conscience by a thus saith the Lord, "The seventh day is the Sabbath; in it thou shalt not do any work." But, from conversation with many of those who observe the Sunday, our conviction is, that three quarters of them have no such idea of the sacredness of that day as would lead them to prefer it before the Saturday; and of the other quarter, we think it no breach of charity to suppose, that a pretty general return to the Saturday would serve greatly to modify if not wholly to abate their zeal for the Sunday. Now permit us to ask the aforesaid three-quarters, (whose conscienees are as free to observe the Saturday as the Sunday, and who profess to desire uniformity,) whether, in view of the circumstances, it may not be their duty just to set an example of liberality in this matter, by conforming to the Scripture rule of observing the seventh day? And if all such would do it, we question whether the remaining quarter would long continue to disturb the "sacred stillness of the Sabbath."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Crystal Palace on Sunday—Sunday in France—Popery—Norwegian Convention—The Liturgy.

Glasgow, August 6th, 1852.

The Crystal Palace is to be a place of Sunday recreation, as we anticipated. A seeming homage, however, is to be paid to Devotion. It is not to be opened till one o'clock in the afternoon. The Earl of Derby has intimated to the Directors of the Company, that he will recommend that the royal charter be granted to them, on the conditions which they themselves had specified as to be observed with respect to Sunday. They will neither run trains from London for it, nor open the doors, before one o'clock; the manufacturers' department, in which the working machinery is to be placed, will be kept shut, the park and winter garden alone being thrown open; and no spirituous liquors are to be sold on the grounds on that day. The remaining attractions, the Company seem to think, will be adequate to bring numbers sufficient to pay a good dividend. They have commenced vigorously the work of reeerection, 1000 selected artisans beiug now employed at it. The whole is to be finished on the 1st of May.

We are becoming tired of attempting to preserve a record of the more prominent acts of French Sunday observance—its military reviews, its fetes, and its fooleries. But, from time to time, there present themselves things still note-worthy there. So we read, that for the inauguration of another railway, the President arrived at Strasburg on Sunday, the 18th ultimo, "amidst the enthusiastic acclamations of the people and the authorities. A salute of 101 guns was fired as the train entered the terminus, and all the bells in the city immediately poured forth a welcome." "The Bishop, accompanied by a numerous body of the clergy, came forward and celebrated mass; after which he formally blessed the locomotives." And, in an address delivered immediately after, this Bishop spoke of the multitude giving "at this moment so touching a mark of their piety"—in assembling, that is, on Sunday, to inaugurate by mass a railway, and hear a Bishop bless a locomotive!

Besides blessing locomotives, there is other work quite as congenial to the Church of Rome, the influence of which we may quite as much feel. In Italy, a movement is stated to have been begun by the Jesuits to have all Protestant places of worship removed beyond the gates of Italian cities, and to allow no education to Protestant youth throughout the Peninsula. There seems, indeed, some reason to fear, that we may have been suffering from their cunning when it was not suspected. A statement has been made, and allowed for a considerable time to pass at least unchallenged, that Dr. Newman, who has been such a promoter of Popery in the Church of England, "spent the early years of his life in the College de Propaganda Fide, at Rome, where he was well known to the late Rev. W. Tulu, the eminent Moravian clergyman. He was then a Roman Catholic." No statement has been put forth as to when he came to England thence, or when he joined the Church of England.

A large meeting of Norwegian clergymen was held last month at Bergen, continuing in session three days. The principal subject discussed was the holding of a Synod of the whole Norwegian Church, for the purpose of taking steps for the reform of its many abuses. A petition to the King to this effect was decided upon. The proposed Synod is to be composed equally of clergymen and laymen.

The new church at Torquay was opened yesterday week. Prayers were read, with verbal deviations from the Liturgy, by Mr. Gladstone, notwithstanding the Bishop's monition. The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. H. Bathurst, late rector of Barwick-in-Elmet, Leeds. Another Free Church is about to be erected, at the expense of Sir Culling Eardley, in the neighborhood of Abbey Wood. The Christian Times urges a strenuous demand, on the part of the Evangelicals, for reform of the Liturgy. We should think a dispensing with it altogether would be better.

The Irish Submarine Telegraph has already been proved to be not beyond hazard—it might have been even from thieves. A week ago, the captain of a schooner having cast anchor to the south of the Copelands, near Belfast, found, when hauling in next morning, that he had fished up what appeared to be a four-inch hempen hawser. Not being able to find the end, he cut it, and after having taken up 472 yards, he bore it off as a prize, and reported to his owner—who, on examination, to his extreme regret, found that his captain had thus run off with a portion of the electric cable. THE MINISTRY OF ANGELS—NO. 1.

It may be assumed, that what is revealed is sufficient for all the purposes of faith, and that nothing is revealed but what is evident to the mind by clearest conviction. The first proposition may be correct; but every student of Scripture, of experience and observation, knows that much truth is gleaned by a careful perusal of Scripture, illustrated by experience of our own, and observation of others. There are facts set forth in the Bible with respect to spiritual manifestations, which many were unable to understand until observation of passing events had given them an illustration. I have heard it observed, that the expressions and statements of Scripture respecting familiar spirits, spirits of divination, and the communications made by devils, foul spirits, &c., which had before been a dead letter, were fully illustrated by the developments of psychology, mesmerism, and spiritual manifestations of the present day; and minds that had been skeptical on these points were by such means set at rest, and the Scriptures spoke to their full understanding. The agency of diabolical spirits in imposing on mankind, through sorcery, magic, divination, soothsaying, necromancy, &c., is now better understood than formerly, and is very generally admitted.

And why may not our attention be called to the ministration of good angels? The Scriptures are as full of statements respecting them, as respecting the opposite class; and facts may possibly illustrate those statements, so that we may more perfectly apprehend those allusions. The prophet Elijah prayed that the eyes of his young men might be opened, and they were opened, and they saw what was invisible before, the hosts of strength that were round about the prophet. The Lord opened the eyes of Balaam, and he saw the angel. The disciples had their eyes opened, and they knew Jesus, and he vanished out of their sight. "And as they spake, Jesus stood in the midst of them," and they were terrified and affrighted, supposing they had seen a spirit. The accounts of angels appearing to the prophets and patriarchs are too numerous to mention. And the apostle tells us that "ye (Christians) are come," not only "to God the judge of all," and to "Jesus the mediator," but "to an innumerable company of angels, and the spirits of the just made perfect." Heb. xii. We understand them to be in close proximity to the spirit world. The apostle farther says, that we "are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses," speaking of those who died in faith, by which he seems to allude to the same idea.

The practicability of holding communications with the dead, is intimated in the Scriptures, by the prohibition which has been made to the Israelites, and the accompanying declaration, that this was among the abominations for which the Canaanites were cast out of their country. This of itself is evidence sufficient to establish the doctrine, without alluding to the statements and facts that appear, or disposing of all such persons as would practice consulting familiar spirits, as the case of the witch of Endor, and corresponding circumstances with which the Old and New Testament abound.

The illustrations which modern psychology has afforded of producing the same results which were developed by the heathen of antiquity, and the ancient Israelites, among those proscribed classes, have induced some to suppose that our natures are susceptible of seeing, hearing, and conversing with the spirits of the departed;—that though, in health and in the natural state, we are perfectly shut out from the invisible world, yet, by a slight derangement of our constitutional faculties or powers, we may become fitted to communicate with it;—that disease has produced that state, as in the cases of those who have been entranced—as was the Apostle Paul when he was not able to say whether he was in the body or out of it—as was Peter on the house-top—as was Rev. Mr. Tennant, and the daughter of Rev. Mr. Bliss, mentioned in the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial, and others;—that this state is self-induced, by persons who have tampered with their own health, so that, by use, they may fall into it at pleasure, as is the case with magicians and consulters of familiar spirits; that this was the means by which the Lord prepared and enabled the recipients of this communication to see and hear his angelic messengers in ancient times, without materially interrupting the laws of nature he had established; and that the appearance of departed friends, which the sick and dying so often relate, around their beds, seeming to take an interest in themselves, is not merely an optical illusion, or the deception of a disordered brain, but an evidence of the real presence of those who have died in the Lord, who do really interest themselves with the departing and dying saints. I am not about to say that this position is, or is not, correct; but I am willing to look at it. If it is not inconsistent with revealed truth, it is safe and useful to contemplate it, as it is pleasing.

We are taught in the Scriptures, that the occupation of the angels will be that of ministering spirits, and that their attendance upon the saints, to gather the elect together at the day of judgment, will be but the last, and perhaps the most inconsiderable, of all their labors. They are "all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to those who are heirs of salvation." If so, they are, no doubt, fully employed in those messages of love and mercy, and are made, in many cases, the messengers by whom the blessings of God are bestowed. Our Saviour informs us, that "the beggar died, and was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom." David said that the Lord had sent his angels and shut the mouths of the lions. Angels were made the ministers of consolation and providence. When the Saviour had been tempted, and was hungry, angels came and ministered unto him; when in an agony in the garden, angels came and strengthened him. Peter saw the angel which delivered him from prison. Cornelius saw the angel that directed him to Peter. So that, whatever speculation there may be respecting the agency of angels, it appears that they were the constant attendants on the saints in primitive times. J. M.

SUNDAY-SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND.

The British Correspondent of The Independent gives an acconnt of the Jubilee of the Sunday-School Union of England and Wales. Three of the venerable men who laid the foundation of the Union fifty years ago, were present, viz., Wm. Brodie Gurney, James Nesbet, and Thomas Thompson. Mr. Gurney sketched the history of the movement, from the time when a small school was commenced in his father's house, near London, to the present. It seems that the Union worked nine years without seeking publicity. At the end of that period, on the 13th of May, 1812, it invited the teachers and friends of Sunday-Schools to a public breakfast—a circumstance which excited considerable interest. From that time, the work has gone on increasing in publicity and importance. The following facts were stated at the meeting:—

"The number of children taught in connection with the Union had increased, since 1812, from 40,000 to 138,891; the teachers, from 4,000 to 13,220—2,507 libraries have been placed in schools, and, probably, not less than 150,000 volumes have been put in circulation amongst the scholars and their friends—and the committee have made 306 grants in aid of the expenses of erecting school-rooms, amounting to £6,819."

It is estimated (says the correspondent above alluded to) that there are now upwards of 200,000 Sunday-School teachers, and more than 2,000,000 of Sunday-School scholars; and it is encouraging and assuring to know, that the character of the teaching is on the whole greatly raised in comparison with the past. As a jubilee memorial, and to promote the usefulness of the Union, it is proposed to create a fund for the erection of a building, to be applied—

"1st. To provide accommodation for the Libraries of circulation and reference, which are now made use of by upwards of six hundred teachers, at a nominal subscription of one shilling per annum.

"2d. To accommodate the classes which meet weekly to prepare the lessons to be taught on the following Lord's-day.

"3d. To enable the teachers of London to meet for occasional conference, or to receive instruction by means of Lectures.

"4th. To secure enlarged space for the increasing business of the Union."

PREACHERS NOT PASTORS.

Some of the suggestions contained in the following paragraph, which we copy from one of our Congregational exchanges, are as applicable to Seventh-day Baptist churches and preachers as to those for whose special benefit they were written:

From the last report of the Conference of Congregational churches in Maine, we learn that the Conference embraces 14 local conferences, and 227 churches. The whole number of members is 16,709. For the 227 churches there are 202 regular laborers—152 pastors, and 50 stated supplies. In some instances these stated supplies are pastors, except in name. They have all the stability of position which usually pertains to the pastoral office. That they are not pastors is mere matter of supposed convenience, in some instances the convenience of coming and going. If there is no installing, there is no trouble of a dismission on the contingency of a change. The minister, in these circumstances, is brought annually to the responsibility of the subscription list. If that, in its aggregate, falls much below a certain amount, the minister takes the hint to withdraw. There is, it must be admitted, an unfortunate looseness in the relation which many ministers sustain to the churches with which they are connected. The salary, at best, is very inadequate; and then, often, there is nobody legally responsible for the payment of this. In many instances the salary is raised by a subscription which just covers the amount designated, and whatever loss is experienced in collecting the subscription falls upon the minister. In some cases, the subscription, after it is made, is put into the minister's hands for collection. Then, of course, if there is any failure in the payments, it may be justly set down to his want of skill as a publican. This inadequacy of amount stipulated in the first instance, and then this looseness in the mode of paying, operates greatly to the depression of the cause of religion. It is unquestionably true, that ministers are better for being, in the main, poor, but not for being so poor as many of them are compelled to be, or as some parishes have grace to keep them. They are too poor to abide long in a place. The old maxim, indeed, reads, that a rolling stone gathers no moss; but here it is found that the stable stone gathers, if possible, still less. They are too poor to do anything for the replenishment of their libraries and their minds. It takes nearly everything they can get to keep their souls in their bodies; beyond that they can do very little for them. These intellectual pinchings and dwarfings of poverty are the most terrible of all its evils in the experience of good ministers, because they operate to embarrass and weaken them in their appropriate work.

JERUSALEM AS IT IS.

Bayard Taylor, one of the editors of the N. Y. Tribune, visited Jerusalem in May last. The following paragraph from one of his letters, gives a dark picture of the present condition of the holy city:—

"Jerusalem, internally, gives no impression but that of filth, ruin, poverty and degradation. There are two or three streets in the western or higher portion of the city which are tolerably clean, but all the others, to the very gates of the Holy Sepulchre, are channels of pestilence. The Jewish Quarter, which is the largest, so sickened and disgusted me, that I should rather go the whole round of the city walls than pass through it a second time. The bazaars are poor, compared with those of other Oriental cities of the same size, and the principal trade seems to be in rosaries, both Turkish and Christian, crosses, seals, amulets, and pieces of the Holy Sepulchre. The population, which may possibly reach 20,000, is apparently Jewish, for the most part; at least, I have been principally struck with the Hebrew face, in my walks. The number of Jews has increased considerably within a few years, and there is also quite a number who, having been converted to Protestantism, were brought hither at the expense of English Missionary Societies for the purpose of forming a Protestant community. Two of the hotels are kept by families of this class. The English have lately built a very handsome church within the walls, and Rev. Dr. Gobat, well known by his missionary labors in Abyssinia, now has the title of Bishop of Jerusalem. Rev. Dr. Barclay, of Virginia, a most worthy man in every respect, is at the head of the American Mission here. There is, besides, what is called the 'American Colony,' at the village of Artos, near Bethlehem—a little community of converts, whose experiments in cultivation have met with remarkable success, and are much spoken of at present."

Of his impressions while contemplating the scene of Christ's labors and sufferings, Mr. Taylor speaks as follows:—

"I must frankly confess, in wandering through this City—revered alike by Christians, Jews and Turks, as one of the holiest in the world—I have been reminded of Christ the Man, rather than of Christ the God. In the glory which overhangs Palestine afar off, we imagine emotions which never come when we tread the soil, and walk over the hallowed sites. As I toiled up the Mount of Olives, in the very footsteps of Christ, panting with the heat and the difficult ascent, I found it utterly impossible to conceive that the Deity, in human form, had walked there before me. And even at night, as I walk on the terraced roof, while the moon, 'the balmy moon of blessed Israel,' restored the Jerusalem of olden days to my imagination, the Saviour who then haunts my thoughts is the Man Jesus, in those moments of trial when he felt the weaknesses of our common humanity; in that agony of struggle in the garden of Gethsemane; in that still more bitter cry of human doubt and human appeal from the cross: 'My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me!'"

Camp Meetings.—The season has arrived in which occur these annual grove meetings of our Methodist friends. They seem by no means disposed to give up this distinctive means of religious propagation and influence. Their central organ at New York, the Advocate and Journal, has an editorial in a recent issue nearly three columns long, vindicating camp meetings against the cavils of opposers, and commending them anew to the confidence and support of Methodists. The article thus concludes:—

"To your tents, O Israel!" "Let no man beguile you through philosophy and vain conceit." Thousands of you can say in respect to the great good done by camp meetings, "We speak that which we do know, and testify that which we have seen." Hasten to make the sacrifices, whether of time or money, which the camp meeting of your circuit or station requires. Take your own family thither, especially the unconverted part of them, and invite, nay, entice your neighbors, not only by inviting them, but by doing all in your power to open their way to camp meeting. They may bless you in heaven for your kindness. May God pour out his Spirit abundantly upon the camp meeting congregations this season, and may the gracious effects be seen in the conversion of sinners and the building up of believers in their most holy faith; so that our brethren may return full of faith and the Holy Ghost, each as a flame of heavenly fire, diffusing in their circuits, stations, and neighborhoods, the light and the vital heat of the religion they enjoy.

A Revival in Boston.—We learn from an exchange, that on the first Sunday in this month Rev. Dr. Stow, pastor of the Rowe-street church, in Boston, baptized nine persons. Of the fifty-four baptized by him since the first of January, twenty-six are young men. A large class of converts remain to be baptized, and the number is every week increasing. The prayer-meetings are still about as fully attended, and quite as interesting, as they have been at any period during the revival.

Religion among the Indians.—The Chickasaw Presbytery reports that the most of its churches have received accessions during the year, and in seven or eight instances the additions have been considerable and highly encouraging. Congregations are increasingly large; peace and harmony pervade the churches; a steadfast and growing zeal is manifest among ministers and churches in establishing and maintaining Sunday-Schools.

Adequate Support for a Minister.—A writer in one of our exchanges, answers as follows the oft-asked question, "What is an adequate support for a Christian minister?

"All that is necessary to enable the ministry, with economy, to occupy a good house, set a good table, clothe themselves and family in good apparel, give their children a good education, to be provided with such help as will relieve them of their bonds at home, that they may visit their flock, and attend to the wants of the church, and, after this, have something over to give to the poor and the cause of benevolence, and lay up something for the day of adversity, old age, and superannuation."

Another exchange copies this paragraph, and adds:—

"We apprehend, however, that the point to be gained is not so much a large amount of income, as a more secure enjoyment of the little the clergy do possess. We should like to see it an established principle, that a church which enjoys the fruit of a clergyman's best days is bound in simple justice to maintain that clergyman as their pastor, even when his best days are over, even to his latest breath. That is the principle to write up!"

Conjugal Affection.—The Hon. Horace Mann, in his eulogy on the lamented Rantoul, related the following touching instance of conjugal affection, in connection with the last illness of the deceased:—

"Yet Mr. Rantoul, even amid the agonies of his disease, had lucid intervals. There were convictions in his mind so deep seated, and affections in his heart so strong, as to stand unmoved by any tempest of delirium. On being telegraphed respecting the illness of her husband, his devoted and excellent lady, then in Massachusetts, hastened to his succor. She arrived here at six o'clock on the morning of the day he died. Instantly, her voice wooed back consciousness and reason. He seized her hand in his, and held it till he breathed his last. Even when his mind wandered, this grasp of affection was unclenched. Death only relaxed it. The swelling of the disease had closed his eyes, and it was beyond the power of muscular contraction to open them. He desired to have them opened by mechanical means, that he might once more behold the features and the face whence, for more than twenty years, the light of love had shone down into his heart."

Popish Education for the Ministry.—The Rev. Dr. Russel, of Maynooth College, Ireland, having publicly declared that each student of the College had a Bible, and that a whole recess of their library was devoted to Biblical literature, which literature was the subject of their study during their five years course, Patrick O'Brien, a converted priest, has as publicly replied, to the effect that he was an alumnus of the College, and declares with all the solemnity of an oath, that during his six years' residence in that College, in course of education for the priesthood, he had no Bible in his possession, nor was he aware that any student had; nor was it a class book in the divinity course, even in the dead languages; and that as soon as he came to read the Bible he renounced Popery.

Profits of Temperance and Rum Taverns.—Mr. G. W. Samson, of Homer, N. Y., says in the N. Y. Reformer, that he formerly kept a rum tavern for fifteen years, and has now kept a temperance house for eight years, and that the nett profits, in proportion to expenses, are decidedly in favor of the temperance house. Then the assurance that he is right, the quiet his family and visitors enjoy, the pleasure he has in looking upon the untempted youth, and his view of the "greatest evil that ever afflicted a rum-cursed earth," urges him to go ahead in the noble cause of temperance.

Graduates of Brown University.—From a Triennial Catalogue of Brown University, recently published, it appears that the whole number of graduates is 1784, of whom 1173 are supposed to be living. Of the graduates, 477 have been, or are, ministers of the gospel, which is not quite one fourth of the whole. Of these, 325 are supposed to be living. The catalogue embraces many names honored in church and state.

Wesleyanism in England.—The Wesleyan Times predicts that the decrease of members in the English Methodist body this year will be about 60,000. The London Times says, "A state of things exists in that church which exceeds any thing in the history of revolutions and reform in church matters."

Missionary Field.—It is said that within fifteen miles of Houston, Texas, there is a settlement which dates its commencement some twenty years since, and containing fifteen families within a circumference of three miles, where but one gospel sermon has ever been preached.

Mr. Oncken in Berlin.—Some time ago the Prussian Government issued a decree against the sojourn in Berlin of the Baptist Evangelist Oncken. But under date of July 6th, he writes that the decree has been remanded—a result which he attributes to the united exertions of English and American brethren.

An Irish Rebel Converted.—It was recently stated by Rev. Hugh Stowell, of Manchester, England, in a public lecture, that Mitchel, who was transported for treason, has been converted to Protestantism since his exile by the instrumentality of a Bible, and now wishes to return, that he may spend his future life in developing the errors of Romanism.

Decision on the Maine Liquor Law.—The Supreme Court of Maine has decided that the inhabitants of that State may keep liquor in their houses for their own use, and that liquor may be brought into and transported within or through the State, if it be not intended for sale. The amount of the decision seems to be, that the Legislature may prohibit the sale, or keeping or offering for sale, of liquor, but can not prohibit its use.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, AUG. 16.

The Senate spent the whole day in discussing the bill for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of St. Mary. The original bill proposed to grant 500,000 acres of public lands to Michigan to enable her to construct the Canal. Mr. Felch had moved a substitute for this, authorizing the Secretary of War to contract for the construction of a Ship Canal at a cost not exceeding $400,000. The amendment was voted down; and pending another amendment, to increase the grant from 400,000 acres to 750,000 acres, the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the principal topic was the bill appropriating ten million acres of public lands to the States for the support of the indigent insane. Several amendments were adopted; and the bill now provides that ten millions of acres of land shall be appropriated to the several States, in the compound ratio of the geographical area and representation of each in the House of Representatives, according to the Census of 1850, provided the area of no State shall be computed at more than 50,000 square miles. The lands shall not be sold at a higher rate per acre than the present minimum price, and are subject to the right of pre-emption—lands thus granted, remaining unsold for twenty years, to revert to the United States. The expenses and management of the lands to be paid by the States, respectively, so that the entire proceeds of the sale of said lands shall be applied, without any diminution whatever, to the comfortable maintenance and support of the curable and incurable indigent insane. A State establishing a public institution for the education and maintenance of idiots, the deaf and dumb, or blind, shall participate in the benefits of the act. The funds are to be invested in safe stocks, the interest only to be used for the purpose designed by the bill.

THIRD-DAY, AUG. 17.

In the Senate, after some unimportant matters, the St. Mary Canal question came up. The amendment making the number of acres granted for the Canal 750,000 was adopted, and the bill was finally ordered to be engrossed.

In the House, the bill granting ten millions of acres of public lands to the States for the support of insane persons passed by a vote of 98 to 54. Then followed a discussion of slavery, in connection with the Naval Appropriation Bill.

FOURTH-DAY, AUG. 18.

In the Senate, after some unimportant business, the bill in aid of a Ship Canal around the Falls of St. Mary in Michigan, was passed. The River and Harbor Bill was then taken up, and an amendment appropriating $75,000 for a Ship Canal from the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico gave rise to a spirited debate, which was not closed at the hour of adjournment.

FIFTH-DAY, AUG. 19.

In the House, the Navy Appropriation bill was taken up, and Mr. Johnson of Tenn. proposed that the sons of members of Congress should be made ineligible as Midshipmen, which was lost.

SIXTH-DAY, AUG. 20.

In the Senate, a motion to take up the Homestead Bill was voted down by 38 to 16. The Postage Bill was amended, so that newspapers, periodicals, and all printed matter, weighing not over three ounces, may go to any part of the republic for one cent, and when paid quarterly in advance one-half cent; newspapers weighing not over an ounce and half, when circulated in the State where they are published, will be charged half these rates; books not weighing over four pounds may be taken at a cent an ounce for distances under 3,000 miles, and two cents an ounce for greater distances, when paid. When such books are not prepaid, they will be charged fifty per cent. more. The bill was passed with these provisions. The bill granting land to the States for the benefit of the indigent insane was reported. The River and Harbor Bill was again taken up and, several amendments adopted in Committee.

In the House, the Naval Appropriation bill was passed. An amendment, providing for sending a Commissioner to negotiate for the acquision of the Sandwich Islands, was declared out of order.

SABBATH-DAY, AUG. 21.

In the Senate, the Select Committee on the petition of David L. Yulee, who contests the seat of Mr. Mallory, Senator from Florida, reported unanimously that the seat belonged to the latter gentleman. The Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill was taken up, several amendments adopted increasing the appropriations, and the bill was postponed. The River and Harbor bill was considered, and amendments adding largely to the appropriations were adopted.

The House passed the bill to authorize soldiers to exchange bounty lands unfit for cultivation for good lands. The Post-Office appropriation was discussed in Committee, reported to the House, and passed. A few private bills were also passed, and the House adjourned for want of a quorum.

Embezzlement Detected.—Complaints having been made at the New York Post-Office of the non-delivery of letters containing money, addressed to the proprietors of the Home Journal, a plan was hit upon to test the clerk of the Home Journal, a young man named Thomas Jackson, who called for the letters. A list of the letters, their post-mark, and the number of them, was made at the Post-Office before they were delivered. On Wednesday thirty-three letters were delivered at the Post-Office, and only twenty-eight were handed over to the publishers of the Journal by Jackson. This being ascertained by the Post-Master, he sent for Jackson, who, after many denials, finally acknowledged his embezzlement, declaring that he designed to replace the funds. On searching Jackson's trunk, about one hundred letters were found, from which money had been extracted. They were dated as far back as December, 1851. It is believed as much as $1,000 has been thus unlawfully taken by him. Gen. Morris, one of the editors and proprietors, had the utmost confidence in Jackson, and was surprised at the discovery of the crime. He declined making a charge against the clerk. Mr. Brady made the complaint, and the United States Marshal took the prisoner into custody, and had him committed.

European News.

Three steamers with European news—the Franklin, the Canada, and the Atlantic—have arrived since our last. We give a summary of the news brought by them.

The leading English papers notice the Fishery excitement, and mostly blame Lord Derby.

The London Daily News of Aug. 9th says: "As regards the American Fishery Disputes, we are in a position to state, from the best authority, that in the present position of the affair there is not the slightest ground for the fear that any interruption of our friendly relations with the United States will ensue."

Queen Victoria has gone to Belgium visiting.

Count D'Orsay is dead; also Johannot the painter.

It is reported that the French have bombarded and occupied Tripoli.

A complete failure in the vines and vintage of the Island of Madeira is announced.

The last accounts from the Western Counties of Ireland relative to the potato disease are of an unfavorable tendency.

The accounts from France, Belgium, and the Rhine, are exceedingly unfavorable, as to the new crops of Wheat, Rye, and Potatoes. In the south of France, Wheat is estimated at one fourth deficient, and Rye at nearly one-half; the same in Belgium.

The Journal des Debats contains a letter from M. de Coninck, stating that the wheat and rye harvest, and the bean and potato crop in France will produce less than a fair average this year, and recommending the French Government to make a change in the existing corn laws.

The last descendant of Corneille was discovered the other day—an old man of 70, and in great poverty. The President has granted him a pension of 2,000 francs.

The Berlin Times announces, under the head of "Russia and Poland," that the property of all Poles who took part in the late Hungarian Revolution is confiscated by the State, and they themselves proscribed.

A letter from Dantzig, of 29th ult., says cholera had again appeared in that city, and, as usual, came from Poland. To the above date the disease had been very fatal, four out of every five attacked having died. At Sieradz, Poland, its ravages had been great.

A letter from Posen states that 1,800 had died (out of a population of 12,000 from cholera. A fire had also lately consumed 80 houses, and the greatest distress prevailed in the city.

The London Standard says "If we are not misinformed, the maritime powers will be invited by England and France to consider the situation of Mexico, with a view to establishing her independence, both financially and politically, so that a barrier may be established to the aggressive spirit of America in the South."

A letter from Rome gives some details of the recent arrests of members of the Revolutionary Committee residing in Lombardy, Tuscany, and the Roman States. It appears that the Austrian Consul at Genoa, hearing of the death of a person, a Lombard by birth, went to place seals on his property, when it was found that the deceased was one of the paymasters of the Conspiracy. The mode of carrying on the correspondence was also discovered, being by means of silk handkerchiefs, the colors of which disappeared by chemical washing, the writing being brought out by the same operation. In consequence of this discovery, various arrests have taken place at Ferrara, and other places in the Roman States.

Steamboat Disaster—Great Loss of Life.

From the Buffalo Courier of Aug. 21.

About 2½ o'clock Friday morning, Aug. 20, when about 4 miles off Long Point Light, on the Canada shore, the steamer Atlantic, bound from this port to Detroit, with about four hundred and twenty persons on board, came in collision with the propeller Ogdensburgh, and was so badly crippled that she sunk in about ten minutes, so as to cover her main and upper decks.

Capt. Pettey, of the Atlantic, was up when the collision took place, and the second mate was on watch. The propeller was steering in a direction nearly at right angles with that of the steamer, and she was only seen by the officers of the Atlantic about a minute before they struck. As soon as she was discovered, the helm of the Atlantic was put "hard a port," and her engines reversed, so that she swung her bow partly round toward the propeller. The course of the propeller is said not to have been changed, and, if it had been, it is supposed the accident might have been avoided.

The bow of the propeller struck the larboard side of the steamer, about ten feet forward of the wheel-house, and immediately let the water rush into the steerage cabin, where were a large number of passengers, mostly Norwegian emigrants. The steamer kept on her course, and the officers, finding that she was too badly injured to float, immediately set about measures to calm the fears of the passengers, and provide means for their escape from a watery grave.

The number on board, as near as can be ascertained, was 110 cabin passengers, 270 deck and steerage passengers, and 40 officers and crew. Of these, it is supposed 15 cabin passengers, 80 to 100 deck and steerage passengers, and 9 of the crew, were lost.

The coolness of the officers had a striking effect upon the majority of the cabin passengers; and all who could understand their words of soothing encouragement, availed themselves of the stools, which were furnished with life-preservers, and other articles of furniture, and as the water gradually arose, ascended to the hurricane deck, where they were mostly picked off safe.

But the poor emigrants, who could not understand one word of what was said by the officers, being waked from their slumbers by the shock of the collision and the succeeding rush of waters, were panic struck, and threw themselves, without the least preparation, into the Lake, where so many of them perished. Probably many were drowned in the hold of the steamer, unable to reach the companion-way.

In getting out the life-boat, Capt. Pettey accidentally fell from the hurricane deck against the boat, injuring him severely. The life-boat was filled with water, and upon recovering from the stunning effect of the fall, Capt. P. swam off to the propeller, about half a mile, and requested it to come alongside to take the passengers from the steamer, which it did, taking from the boats of the Atlantic all who could be picked up from the lake, and those who had remained on the hurricane deck and about the rigging. Some ladies were thus transferred to the propeller without wetting their feet. After hailing the propeller, it was supposed that Capt. P. had drowned, but he was finally picked up, having a small piece of plank in his hand, which had sustained him, while insensible, from the effect of his fall and subsequent exertions. He was brought down from Erie by the State Line Railroad, and is now in Buffalo, in charge of physicians, in a very low state of body, and almost frantic from mental excitement.

The steamer lay in about 30 fathoms water, and when left by the propeller her starboard wheel-house was just out of the water.

The propeller took the survivors into Erie, and the largest portion were taken on the Sultana for Cleveland.

The Atlantic was built in 1848, and owned by the Messrs. Wards, at a cost of $110,000. She was not insured for a dollar.

Many exciting incidents of the calamity are given by the Buffalo papers, among which are the following:—

Mr. Aaron Sutton, of New York City, was provided with two life preservers. One of these he fastened on his wife, and while so doing some one snatched the other one away. Mr. Sutton seeing the boat sinking got his wife off into the lake, and taking his two little children, followed her. Mrs. Sutton was buoyed up by the life preserver and partly by swimming and clinging to floating articles. Mr. Sutton preserved his children until all were picked up by boats.

One young lady jumped from the steamer and would have been drowned but for the exertions of a man, (supposed to be one of the emigrants,) who, seizing a board, plunged into the water, and catching hold of the lady's hair, managed to get her on to the side of the steamer, when she was taken on deck. The poor fellow, however, sank from exhaustion and was drowned.

Three hands of the steamer who could not swim tore off the binnacle box, took out the compass, and throwing the box overboard, jumped into the water and clung around it. They were several times compelled, for self-preservation, to kick from them drowning men and women, some 30 or 40 of whom at different times had hold of their legs. They were taken up after being 20 minutes in the water by their own boat. At the same time they found the body of a little girl 10 years old floating on a plank. She had her arm around the plank, and her head on it as if asleep, but she was quite dead. The body was taken to Erie.

Mr. L. D. Crippen of Michigan saved two female passengers by breaking through the deck into their state rooms, which were filled with water.

A gentleman, who, with the engineer, and several others, were the last taken from the wreck, took to the rigging, and had among their company, a lad who had become separated from his parents, who acted like a little hero. The little fellow hung on as long as he could, until, from exhaustion, he was obliged to tell his comrades he must let go. After consultation, it was resolved to hold him by turns, which was done until the life-boat came within hailing distance, when he was taken on board, to yet live, as the company remarked, to some day be a member of Congress, or some distinguished man. The little fellow was taken with one of his preservers, who pledged himself to make him a good home in the Far West.

A Merchant Whipped to Death.—The St. Louis Union gives the following account of the whipping to death, at St. Joseph, Mo., of a merchant, named Willard, who was charged with having fraudulently contracted debts:—

Langston, Jennings, and Anderson were, on Friday last, brought before the examining Court. It was adduced in evidence, that Willard, the victim of this almost unparalleled atrocity, was taken, hand-cuffed, from his store, at 10 o'clock on Tuesday, the 27th ult., and conveyed through the most frequented streets of the town, to a wood in the neighborhood. He was then tied to a tree, and whipped till about 1 o'clock, when his murderers were so fatigued that they deemed it necessary to temporarily desist, and came into town for the purpose of procuring refreshments. After drinking at several houses they returned to their fiendish work. Willard soon exhibited symptoms of exhaustion, and it becoming apparent that he could not survive much longer, he was instantly killed by knocking him on the head with a club. These proceedings were witnessed by two persons who were secreted in an adjoining enclosure. The body was deposited in a thicket near by, where it was intended to be kept until night, when an opportunity would be offered of sinking it in the river. Fortunately, however, some account of the diabolical affair came to the knowledge of the citizens, and prevented this plan of concealment. A constable arrested Langston, Jennings and Anderson, and in performing the duty narrowly escaped with his life. The citizens, whose indignation scarcely knew any bounds, would have lynched the guilty parties on the spot, but for the law and order sentiments advocated by many of the influential residents of St. Joseph. At the time of the abduction, Willard was in the most destitute circumstances, and his family was nearly in a state of starvation. The people of St. Joseph, after becoming aware of their condition, raised for their relief nearly $500.

Successor of Mr. Downing.—The National Intelligencer says that William D. Breckenridge, of Washington, has been appointed the successor of the lamented Downing, to continue the improvement and embellishment of the public grounds, so auspiciously conducted during the past two or three years by the latter gentleman. Mr. Breckenridge is by profession a botanist and florist, and having in that capacity accompanied the exploring expedition under Capt. Wilkes, he has since its return had charge of the rare plants which it brought to this country, and has also been the assistant of Mr. Downing in improving the public grounds. It is supposed, therefore, that Mr. Breckenridge is in possession of the plans and purposes of his deceased friend.

The ship Robert Center, which was loading at a New York wharf for California, took fire on Friday night, Aug. 20, and was injured (including cargo) to the amount of near $100,000.

SUMMARY.

The English papers state that a line of steamboats is now in course of construction to run on the Thames, which are to be built without any chimneys. The smoke and the products of combustion are to be discharged in the wheel houses, so that the draft will be increased by the action of the paddles, and the unconsumed particles of the fuel mingled with the water. The object of this improvement is to give greater facility in passing the very low bridges over the Thames, which are necessarily built on a level with the streets of London.

The Norwich Courier says there has been a series of experiments at Lowell, by a committee of the Lowell Cotton Mills, during the past six months, for the purpose of testing the use of Rosin Oil upon machinery. The results are highly favorable, and have been published in a pamphlet form. The report states that there has no evil arisen from the use of this oil, for a long time past, upon their machinery, and that upon all machinery with heavy bearings, such as looms, &c., this oil, combined half and half with sperm oil, takes less power than pure sperm oil alone!

A new plan for building steamers has been brought out in England, and an experimental boat built to run from London to Boulogne. This boat is 235 feet long, 20 feet beam, of 250 tuns burden, and has an engine of 50 horse power. The bow and stern are filled with fixed air, like a life boat. If it meets the expectations of the inventor and builders, two immense vessels of 10,000 tuns and 1,000 horse power will at once be built on the same plan; they will run from London to the East Indies in 30 days, without stopping on the way.

On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 22, one of the skiff boats plying between Albany and East Albany upset, when about midway in the river. There were on board some fifteen to eighteen persons, men, women, and children. Eight or ten were picked up by small boats, which came to their assistance, but the remainder were drowned. The waves were running quite high at the time. The boat was overloaded, but the accident is attributed to the attempt of a person to get his hat, which had been blown into the river. Up to 7 P. M., seven bodies had been recovered.

The brig Medford, with dates from Cape Haytien to the 8th inst., and the schr. Eureka, from Port-au-Prince 4th inst., have arrived at Boston. They bring accounts of the continued ravages of the plague at Port-au-Prince, but state that Mr. Wilson, the U. S. Consul at the Cape, had discovered a remedy which had saved many lives. The disorder is described as a rotting in the stomach, which takes place in 24 hours, if not checked by remedies. The number of natives who have died all over the island of this disorder is very large. The number of foreign seamen that died of it at the Cape is 13, and many were still sick.

Died, in Fitzwilliam, N. H., on the 8th inst., Dr. Thomas Richardson, aged 86, and on the same day, at Leominster, Mass., Maj. John Richardson, a brother, aged 82; also in the same place, on the 27th of June last, a sister, aged 91. Of this family, the parents and nine children, one sister died aged 42, the only death under 74. The average age of parents and six children is 81 years. The two younger brothers are yet living, one at the age of 75, and the other 68.

On Tuesday, August 17, three men in a boat proceeded alongside the American ship Connecticut, in the harbor of St. John, for the purpose of inducing the crew to desert, when some persons on board discharged a quantity of stone ballast into the boat, which sunk her, and one of the men in her, named McGinnes, was drowned. The chief mate of the Connecticut has been arrested, and is to be examined on a charge of causing the death of McGinnis.

Recent arrivals from Havana, W. I., report that yellow fever, cholera and small pox prevail to a great extent, and almost every ship in the harbor has some cases of the fever. Out of one company of 120 soldiers, 110 had died, and in a chain-gang of 109 there died 100. The Government were sending the troops to the country. The sickness was chiefly outside the walls of the city.

Mr. Hatch, of Franklin, Conn., has become insane, he having devoted considerable attention to the subject of spirit rappings. Mr. Hatch left home on Saturday last, and his friends fear that he will commit suicide, as he, previous to his departure, represented that he had received a message from the spirit of a man who had committed suicide, urging him to leave the world.

Amherst College held its Commencement Aug. 12. Graduating class, 42. The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred on Curtis B. M. Smith, I. F. Conkey, and George Merriam, of Springfield. Rev. John Keir, Professor of Theology in Princeton College, and Rev. Seth Sweetzer, received the degree of D. D.

Died, at Yorkville, N. Y., Asahel Newcomb, a member of the Baptist church in Whitesboro, aged 72 years. His death was very sudden. He expired without any previous warning, as he sat writing, apparently in his usual health. He was a zealous friend of the Baptist Free Mission Society.

On the afternoon of the 27th ult., Cambridge, Ohio, was visited by a storm of great severity. The large three-story college building is a mass of ruins, the roof being blown off, and with it the walls of the third story.

The nomination of Hon. Joseph R. Ingersoll as Minister at the Court of St. James, in place of Abbott Lawrence, resigned, was confirmed by the Senate on Saturday last.

It is stated that the Hudson River Railroad Company are about to introduce upon their cars the Paine invention for keeping out dust, cinders, &c.

A destructive fire occurred in Dunnville, Canada West, (about 50 miles from Buffalo) on Friday night. It broke out in the most densely occupied portion of the village, and devastated no less than an acre and a half of land closely covered with stores and workshops.

At Fort Plain, N. Y., August 17th, three children of Mr. Peter Cougher were drowned in a mill-pond. They were a boy aged 11, and two girls, aged respectively 12 and 13 years. The boy falling into the pond, the girls tried to rescue him, and all perished before assistance arrived.

A duel is reported to have been fought near Washington, on the 20th inst., between Messrs. Cunningham and Collins—the former aged 30 and the latter 60 years. The difficulty is understood to have arisen out of some business matters.

An apparatus, consisting of large air-tight bags, sixty feet long and eight feet in thickness, has lately been invented, which is designed for raising sunken vessels. The bags are to be fastened to the wreck and inflated. An immense weight, it is said, can thus be raised.

Four American fishing vessels have been seized by English cruisers and carried into Charlottetown; it is also stated that 29 French boats, with 100 men, have been driven away and prevented fishing off Belle Isle.

Howes, who is now in Litchfield, Ct., jail, for attempting to murder Miss Buck, maintains an obstinate silence since his commitment, refusing to take food, and apparently intending to starve himself to death.

The Liverpool papers simply mention Kossuth's arrival at that port, under the name of Alexander Smith, and his departure the same day for London. The London papers are utterly silent concerning him.

Friday evening, July 9, a heavy freshet occurred in Richmond, Vt. It swept away two railroad bridges and did considerable damage. A house was torn down and the family were obliged to take shelter in a tree during the night.

At Washington, August 16th, Hon. Solon Borland, Senator from Arkansas, was indicted by the Grand Jury for an assault committed some weeks since upon Mr. Kennedy, of the Census Office.

There was a fire at West Troy, N. Y., on the 19th inst., originating in a lumber yard, which destroyed 16 houses, rendered houseless 30 families, and occasioned a loss of $60,000 worth of property.

The Rome Sentinel says that Mr. S. Rathbun, of Verona Mills, N. Y., sold his crop of hay of 300 to 400 tons at nine dollers per ton, delivered on the farm before the close of navigation.

Sixty Dollars have been sent to the Collector of the Port of New York by some conscience-smitten individual who had dishonestly retained it from duties paid to the Government.

Five stalks of corn, from the farm of Gen. Thos. Gatch, near Milford, Ohio, measured 18 feet 4 inches from the bottom to the tassel, and 10 feet 6 inches to the ear from the root.

The express train which left New York on the 6th, for Albany, made the trip in 2h. 58m., running time! The train consisted of three first class passenger and baggage cars.

The new bridge of the New Haven and New London Railroad Company, near New London, was entirely destroyed by fire on the afternoon of the 5th instant.

Mr. Gordon, tailor at Chester Factories, was run over and killed by the express train from Albany to Springfield, Saturday night, August 21.

The fall session of the Union Theological Seminary, New York, in consequence of repairs to the Seminary building, will not be opened till Oct. 6th.

Hon. Geo. W. Jones, Member of Congress from Tennessee, was recently fined $30 and costs for assaulting a clerk in the Penison Office.

Penn Green, a colored woman, 107 years of age, died in Philadelphia last week. She was born in Delaware County, Pa.

Seventh-day Baptist Anniversaries.

THE Forty-fourth Session of the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference will be held at Plainfield, N. J., commencing on Fifth-day, September 9, 1852, at 11 o'clock A. M. James H. Cochran is appointed to preach the Introductory Discourse.

All the Churches are at liberty to communicate with the Conference, either directly or through the Associations to which they belong. Churches not connected with Associations, and societies of Sabbath-keepers not organized into churches, are especially requested to communicate their condition, with the changes that have taken place during the three years since the last session of the Conference, together with any other matters that they may deem of general interest. Letters may be addressed to the Corresponding Secretary, Geo. B. Utter, New York.

The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society is to hold its Tenth Annual Meeting at Plainfield, N. J., on First-day, Sept. 12.

The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society's Third Annual Meeting will be held at Plainfield, N. J., on Second-day, Sept. 13.

The Ninth Annual Meeting of the American Sabbath Tract Society will be held at Plainfield N. J., on Second-day, Sept. 13.

Of the exercises and speakers at the meetings of the Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies, a more complete account will be given in due time.

Yearly Meeting of Rhode Island Churches.

THE Yearly Meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Churches in Rhode Island and Connecticut will be held with the Church at Pawcatuck, commencing on Sixth-day, August 27, at 2 o'clock P. M. Opening sermon by Eld. C. M. Lewis.

In view of the great need of a revival of God's work in this portion of our Zion, it is earnestly hoped, that fervent supplication will be offered by the churches, that the divine favor may be manifested in an abundant outpouring of the Spirit of God on that occasion.

Union Academy.

THE Academic Year of this Institution, located at Shiloh, N. J., for 1852 and '53, is divided into three Terms of fourteen weeks each, with two vacations of one week each, between terms.

The First commences the last Monday in August.
The Second commences the second Monday in Dec.
The Third commences the fourth Monday in March.
The year closes the first Monday in July.

Board of Instruction.

WILLIAM C. WHITFORD, Principal,
And Professor of the Classics, Natural Sciences, and Higher Mathematics.

GURDON EVANS, A. M.,
Professor of Agricultural Chemistry.

Mrs. RUTH H. WHITFORD, Preceptress,
And Teacher of the English Department, Painting, and Penciling.

Mrs. ELIZABETH P. JONES,
Teacher of the French Language and Literature.

At the opening of the Fall Term and middle of the Winter Term, Teachers' Classes will be formed, and continue seven weeks, for the purpose of reviewing those branches taught in District Schools, and giving each teacher an opportunity to test his own abilities in teaching and governing, by taking charge of a Model Class.

The Agricultural Department, during the Winter Term, is under the instruction of Prof. Gurdon Evans, A. M., and embraces the study of and daily recitation in Agricultural Science. Three hours each day are spent in the Laboratory, well furnished with good apparatus and chemicals, where students are instructed in the Elementary Analysis of Soils, Marls, Ashes of Plants, &c. Also, a course of Public Lectures is delivered on the application of scientific principles to practical farming.

Expenses:

Tuition, per term,	from $3 50 to $5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

Extras, per term—Penciling, $1 00; Embroidery and Monochromatic Painting, each, $3 00; Oil Painting, $6 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, $8 00; Piano Music, $10 00.

Tuition settled in advance or by satisfactory arrangement.

Board in the Boarding Hall or Private Families, from $1 25 to $1 75 per week. The entire expense of the year, including board, room, fire, lights, and tuition, need not exceed $82 00.

The aim of the Institution is to impart a thorough, practical, and complete academic education. In the Natural Sciences, all the facilities usually enjoyed in Academies, are presented to the student. In the Classical Department, those Latin and Greek authors read in a College Course are studied. A strict and wholesome discipline is enforced. Courses of Lectures, either moral, miscellaneous, or scientific, are given each term in the year.

For further information, address the Principal, the President, Rev. Wm. M. Jones of Shiloh, or Rev. Sheppard R. Kollock, D. D., of Greenwich, N. J.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Miscellaneous.

Narrative of Mr. John Wise's 131st Aerial Voyage.

Made from Portsmouth, Ohio, June 3, 1852.

The 3d of June was ushered in with squalls and thunder-clouds, which continued until the setting sun. The nature of the weather was such that few expected to see a balloon ascension, if one should be attempted. After I had commenced the inflation of the aërial vessel, the violence of the wind was such as to make the balloon so unmanageable that I should have despaired of success in the attempt myself, had not my confidence been strongly established by the frequent trials of the noble air-ship 'Ulysses.'

At 20 minutes past 5 P. M., the wind having somewhat abated, I made the final preparation for the voyage, and in ten minutes after cut the last cord that bound the air-ship to terra-firma. The ascent was slow at first, moving at a moderate elevation over the city, in a south-easterly direction, but by the time I reached the Ohio the ascent became rapid, and I soon attained an elevation of about 2,000 feet. This kept me below the range of the heavy cumulus clouds far and wide, and the balloon sailed sluggishly underneath them, laboring as it were under a heavy pressure.

Having got some distance into Kentucky, and passing along the range of a hill, three rifle shots were fired, and one of the balls struck my car, but the concussion was so slight that had it struck my person it would not have produced any injury or pain. The ball reaching and striking the car must have been the merest accident, for I am not willing to award such consummate precision of aim at that distance of hight, even to a Kentucky rifleman.

Taking a view towards the south, I noticed a thunder-gust moving toward my line of direction, and I had now attained an altitude that had fairly breasted the storm. From this I presumed that it was impossible the storm could reach me, believing the same current which was moving the storm along must move me along ahead of it, and the distance between the balloon and the storm was at least two miles. I must endure its peril or rise above it by discharging ballast. I became deeply interested in this meteorological phenomenon, especially when I saw the torrents disgorging from the upper cloud which seemed to cap the storm. The thunder and lightning was all displaying itself below. I say clouds, because they were detached and rugged, and occasionally the flashes would jump from one to another. I watched until its approach became so near that the outskirts of its rain fell on the balloon, and the car began to rock from the effects of its whirling motion. I now threw over sufficient ballast to raise me entirely above it, which gave me a direction more easterly than the course of the storm, and as we were separating, the parting salutes of heaven's artillery were grand and imposing.

As I had not determined to make a long voyage when I started, and knowing that my voyage had for some time past ceased to be of immediate interest to the audience I had left at Portsmouth, I made some observations preparatory to a descent, for I had now got into a region of atmosphere where occasional glimpses of the earth and the Ohio River were obtained, but there appeared no place suited for a landing within my range of vision, as all was the forest and river. I continued onward and eastward, gradually coming down to get a better view of the nether world under the clouds, with a view of making a final descent. The clouds were much broken below, giving me a tolerably extensive view of the earth and river; and, referring to my chart, I judged that I was about 12 or 14 miles north of Burlington, and going toward the east, and at the same time a thunder-gust was coming from the north-west. While I was considering the probability of getting into a drenching rain if I should hurry my descent before the storm would reach me, and also the uncertainty of meeting a proper landing place, and the next difficulty of certainly getting into the whirpool of the storm if I did land at all hazards, admonished me once more to seek refuge in the calmer atmosphere above the region of Jupiter's dominions. Accordingly, ballast was quickly discharged, sufficient to send the Ulysses mounting upward with majestic mein, and turning my attention southward, I found a storm coming directly under my path again.

Here now was presented an array of meteorological display that seldom falls to the lot of mortal man to behold. Involuntarily there sprang from my bosom an adoration of the God of Nature, through the adoration of His works, and I was rejoiced I had not made the descent when I first contemplated. Every thing at this point conspired to make this the grandest voyage that was, perhaps, ever made in modern times. Here were two tremendous thunder-storms approaching each other rapidly beneath me—in the distance and all around were piled in the most majestic and grotesque forms masses of dense vapor—here and there could be seen immense pillars and spires springing up with enchanting beauty, while ever and anon there came the most terrible discharges of electricity, and loud and frequent thunder continuing with increasing fury—a part of heaven's heaviest artillery was rapidly approaching in awful conflict—the 'Ulysses' was soaring above it, distended to its utmost tension, rocking in the undulations of the atmosphere like a ship in a heavy sea, for such was the power of the pealing thunder that the atmosphere seemed to be convulsed to its very center. All this time my own feelings were strung to the highest pitch of admiration, but a thousand regrets yearned in my thoughts, because I had no companion to share the grandeur of the scene. High as my feelings were now wrought in viewing this grand commotion among the elements of heaven, the most sublime spectacle was yet to follow.

Twice had the balloon attained an altitude where she had become expanded to her utmost tension, requiring the discharge of copious volumes of gas to get her steady, and while mounting so high the two storms had gained on me the distance of a mile or two, when I thought I might safely descend, as already gas enough had been discharged to bring me down through the lower clouds. Before I had come down a great distance, I felt a sudden check, and also a sudden chill, and looking upward I discovered a dingy looking cloud-cap almost over me, so much so that the balloon fell into its shadow, while at the same time the western edge of the cloud was brilliantly illuminated by the sun, and the clear blue heaven was unobstructed toward the west as far as the eye could see, at the hight I then was; but all this time I was under a slight shower of hail. Sometimes I would fall far enough back, or westward of the towering cloud-cap, so that the sun would shine on the balloon for a moment, then again it would suddenly rock into the shadow of it. Here, then, I had a magnificent view of the thunder and hail storm, from the side, or rather from behind it, at an immense elevation above the lower layer of clouds, and to the minute description which I will now give of it, I would call the earnest attention of meteorologists and all persons who feel an interest in the investigation of the phenomena of storms, as I shall detail every feature of it exactly as it presented itself to my observation.

This storm ranged at a much higher elevation than the other two of which I have spoken, and it seems to have been a compound storm formed from them, as it sprung up so suddenly, and at a point nearly, if not quite, over the junction of the two which came in contact with each other. At the time it commenced forming, I was in the act of a gradual descent, as above stated, and when I discovered it was really a fresh and third storm, the balloon was quickly relieved from her descent by discharging all the remaining ballast left. This raised me up to a level with the cloud-cap, and the balloon again became completely filled. This surprised me, as already so much gas had been discharged that by barometrical calculations, my altitude would have been at least 3 miles. Upon reflection and observation I came to the conclusion that the electrical medium in which I was floating was acting upon the gas, and attenuating it.

The clouds below me were very thin and somewhat detached, but the electrical discharges on them were vivid and in rapid succession. While the balloon was in this position a magnificent halo, or rather parhelion, was formed on the cloud surface below, and toward the east, proving that a refractory medium was around the body of the balloon. The halo soon after changed into the colors of the rainbow, very beautifully and distinctly defined. The balloon was now sailing in the clear sunshine, a little in the rear of the cloud-cap, and, believing that I was out of the influence of the storm, a gradual descent was again commenced. Great caution was now required, as every pound of ballast was spent, and a descent once commenced must be concluded, slow as it might be. When I had settled about half way down between the cloud-cap and the lower cloud, the uprising current arrested the descent, and the balloon was slightly drawn into the storm, and was also receiving a smart shower of hail, which I perceived was discharging from the cloud-cap. The hail made a terrible noise on the hollow silken globe. For a moment I felt uneasy; above me stood the bog, dingy cloud-cap, below me the lightning was playing too fearfully to attempt a descent through it.

The hail was pattering on the balloon, the thunder was roaring like a thousand pieces of artillery, and the balloon was rocking to and fro like a frail reed. I now determined to sail for some time in the wake of the storm, as to the west of me the sky was clear of a cloud. Several times sheet lightning undulated and quivered between the upper and lower clouds. It was of a slight orange color, and no thunder followed it. This also surprised me, and it moreover relieved me from the fear of its effects. This lightning seemed to have nothing to do with the electrical discharges below, and displayed itself precisely like the aurora borealis—I think it was that phenomenon. While in this position, the balloon was turning rapidly on its vertical axis, and rocking at the same time, which made me slightly sick, like sea-sickness.

Now, suddenly, a new scene presented itself; a rainbow was forming a little in advance of and below me, with its concave side toward me, somewhat distorted in the shape of the letter S. The balloon was now sinking slowly, and the storm also gaining a little speed in advance of it, which brought me under the arch of the rainbow. This was truly a sublime spectacle—viewing it from behind and sidewise through the arch, perspectively open to my gaze, with its ceilings and sides frescoed in prismatic colors. Nothing could surpass its grandeur, and in addition to this, every hail drop was prismatically illuminated, and below the arch the mighty cauldron of dense vapor was bubbling and boiling like a mælstrom, rolling out most terrific thunder, and to the side of the cauldron was pictured the beautiful parhelion, caused by the sun shining on the balloon all the time she was above the lower cloud, but still the outskirt of the hail was falling on it.

When I found that the sheet lightning did not endanger the balloon, and as I felt secure from the electrical discharges below, and the hail being small, I began to regret that it was out of my power to follow this grand meteor to its conclusion. But my ballast was all expended, except some newspapers and provisions, which I threw overboard to check the balloon a little longer; it must now inevitably soon come to earth, and in fifteen minutes after I was sinking through the lower cloud, which was quite warm. This was about eight miles west of the Ohio River, and ten miles from Gallipolis.

At 6 P. M. I landed on a clear spot, (and they were scarce in this region,) in Guyan township, Gallia Co., Ohio, under a shower of rain, near the house of Richard Harbor, under whose roof I slept that night. This was something over a hundred miles from Portsmouth by the steamboat route.

As I was under the impression that rain and hail, as well as snow, were formed in the lower cloud, having on former occasions, during thunder storms, either sailed in the lower cloud or above the upper, and never before viewed storms from their sides so close as to be partly in them, I will now briefly recapitulate its phenomena. It will afford good data, because both of the storms of which I received a portion of the rain and hail, presented the same appearance.

First: Thunder storms have two plates of clouds, the upper discharging the contents, whatever they may be, hail, rain, or snow.

Second: Sheet lightning, of an orange color, undulates silently between the upper and lower clouds in a waving motion.

Third: The discharges of electricity take place in the lower cloud. By discharges are meant thunder and lightning.

Fourth: The distance between upper and lower cloud was not less than 2,000 feet. This is by a mere eye measurement.

Fifth: The uprising current was not continued higher than the lower cloud, and was rising and whirling as I was in the margin of the storm, being in it twenty-five minutes.

Sixth: The storm was much wider below than above, the deposit diverging at least 25 degrees from a perpendicular line.

Seventh: The deposition of rain and hail was thicker in the center of the storm. I could not of course look through it, but I viewed one from its front, the other from behind its line of direction, and both appeared the same.

Eighth: Under the shadow of the upper cloud it is very cold; and in the lower cloud it is quite warm.

Ninth: The upper cloud was moved by the current which always blows from east to west.

Tenth: Other causes than the upper current may affect the horizontal course of thunder storms, so as to increase or diminish their violence.

I might deduce some data from what was so distinctly observed on this occasion, but will for the present leave that for abler heads, and particularly to Prof. Espy and the Smithsonian Institute.

John Wise.

Presence of Mind.

During the summer holidays of 1800, I had a young friend staying with me and my younger brother Edward. His name was John Raynor; and how he came by so much information as he seemed to have, I do not remember that we troubled ourselves to inquire; but my father, who liked John exceedingly, said it was from his constant habit of observation. He was then only fourteen, only two years older than myself. One evening, during the abscence of my parents, we occupied ourselves with assisting the gardener. The garden sloped down to a broad river, which joined the sea a few miles distant. I was not so busy but I looked up every now and then to watch the beautiful sunset that sparkled on the water, or the passage boats and country barges that glided by at intervals. Suddenly I observed, at a small distance, something floating on the water.

'It is the body of a boy!' said John, and in a moment flung off his jacket and threw himself into the water. Fortunately, he was a good swimmer, and his courage never left him. He swam with all his strength towards the floating body, and seizing with one hand the hair, with the other directed his course towards the shore. We watched eagerly, and the moment he came within reach, we assisted him in laying the body on a grass plat. My brother Edward recognized him as the son of a washerwoman, as he burst into tears—

'Poor woman, she will never see her boy again."

John replied in a hurried tone, 'She may, if we lose no time, and use the right means to recover him. Edward, run quickly for a doctor, and as you pass the kitchen, tell Susan to have a bed warmed.'

'We had better hold him up by the heels,' said the gardener, 'to let the water run out of his mouth.'

'No, no,' exclaimed John; 'by so doing we shall kill him, if he is not already dead; we must handle him as gentle as possible.'

When the body had been carried into the house, the gardener urged to place it by the fire, but after a little persuasion they yielded to John's entreaty, and the body was rubbed dry, and placed on his right side between hot blankets, on a matress. The head was bound with flannel and placed high on pillows; four bottles were filled with hot water, wrapped in flannels, and placed at the arm pits and feet, while the body was constantly rubbed with hot flannels. John took the bellows, and having blown out all the dust, directed me to close the mouth and one nostril, while he by blowing in at the other, filled the chest with air; he then laid aside the bellows, and pressed the chest upwards to force the air out; this was done from twenty to thirty times in a minute, to imitate natural breathing. All this time the windows and doors were left wide open; Edward at length returned without the doctor; he was absent from home. The use of friction, with warm flannel, and artificial breathing, continued for one hour and a half, and no signs of life appeared. John continued his efforts. Another half passed, and to the inexpressible delight of us all, the boy opened his eyes, and uttered a faint sigh.'

What a good thing it was for the mother of this poor boy, that John Raynor once read, on a framed printed paper, 'Rules of Humane Society for recovering persons apparently drowned.' Better still that he had taken pains to remember them. Every item that we glean, calculated to benefit the distressed, should be treasured in memory's garner for the hour of need.

Preserving Peaches.

The following communication, from a man who has had considerable experience in putting up fruit, appears in a Mississippi paper. The season is approaching when the information it contains may be needed:—

"As this is the season for putting up peaches in cans for winter use, I suppose my experience in that line will not be unacceptable to many of your readers. In the first place, be absolutely certain that the cans are made air-tight. Peel your peaches, cut them in halves, take out the stones, and fill the cans within a half inch of the top, shaking the peaches down as close as possible. Then take loaf sugar, in the proportion of two pounds to a pint of water; boil and strain. Pour this syrup over the peaches in the cans, and then have the square piece of tin put on, leaving a small vent in the center. Place the cans in a kettle with water enough to come within an inch of the top of the cans. Boil the cans from 15 to 30 minutes, or longer, if necessary, keeping the vent open with a knitting-needle until the air or syrup ceases to flow. Remove the kettle from the fire, and while the cans remain in the hot water, close the vent with solder.

"This is decidedly the best plan, as I well know by experience. It takes no more sugar to make the syrup than it will take to sweeten them after you open the cans for use."

Cure for Dysentery.—A highly respectable and aged correspondent of the "Georgia Constitutionalist" gives the following recipe for the dysentery. Though very simple, it has not failed under his observation for many years: Take an equal quantity of sweet molasses, olive oil, and good West India rum; stir together and simmer over the fire, stirring whilst simmering until the decoction is well incorporated together; then take it off the fire, but continue stirring until the mixture is quite cool. It is then ready for bottling or use. The dose for an adult, if the disease is very violent and system much reduced, is one table-spoonful three times a day, morning, noon, and night; and if the attack is slight, one spoonful taken at night, will have the desired effect. For children and young persons, in proportion to age; for infants, a tea-spoonful is sufficient. It is also a radical cure for summer-complaint in children. If the disease should be checked too suddenly, so as to occasion costiveness, reduce the dose, and use a little castor oil.

Economize Your Manures.

Notwithstanding the rapid progress which agricultural science has made, there is one point which never has been, or is likely to be attained—we have yet to learn how to cultivate our lands successfully, without the aid of manure. The introduction of steam has wrought such an entire revolution in machinery, that we may reasonably indulge the hope that sooner or later it will be profitably applied to agricultural purposes, so far as plowing and many other of the operations of the farm are concerned. The electric telegraph has annihilated space and time—facilitated the transmission of news, and materially changed the character of many important departments of trade. But neither steam nor the telegraph have yet been applied to the restoration of exhausted soils, or can supply those constituents which continued vegetation in the form of wheat, corn, oats, &c., annually take from them. There is no soil, however fertile it may originally be, that will, for any length of time, bear without partial, and often complete exhaustion, a system of uninterrupted cropping. The deep, rich soils of the Western prairies, the fertility of which was at one time thought inexhaustible—and to which, for the first 8 years, the application of manure is not only superfluous, but prejudicial—now give unmistakeable evidence of the loss of productive power. Thousands of acres in Pennsylvania and New York, that once yielded abundant crops, (but were robbed of their very life by improvident farmers,) and which are now regarded as waste lands, also attest the necessity of gaurding against the future increase of this gradual but certain dissipation of our agricultural wealth.

If, then, manures are so vitally essential to the maintenance of the fertility of our soils, is it not a matter of the highest importance for every man who has land to cultivate, to make himself familiar with the nature—the best method of preparing—the most economical plan of securing—and the most profitable mode of applying them? The generality of farmers never look beyond the mere products of the stable for their supply of this all-important material. They appear to forget that they possess a thousand other sources from which fertilizing matter may be procured in greater or less quantities. This should never be. Every farm should boast not only a well cared for barn yard manure heap, but also a compost heap at every point where a sufficient amount of enriching matter to form one may be found. Let the farmer who relies wholly upon his stable manure reflect a moment upon the vast amount of valuable organic and inorganic material he annually loses from want of a very little care and attention. If he be a man of observation, he cannot fail to perceive that his carelessness in this respect is a source of continued, and very frequently irreparable loss. At least one-half of the inconvenience and losses which farmers sustain in meagre crops, and in lands, gradually, but certainly decreasing in value, are the effects of this improvidence. [Pa. Hearing with the Teeth.

Curious as the assertion may appear, it is easy to prove it by the following simple experiment:—Lay a watch upon a table, glass downwards; then stand so far from it that you cannot, in the ordinary way, hear the ticking. Now place the end of a small deal stick, say six feet long, upon the back of the watch, and grip the teeth to the other; with the fingers, close each ear to exclude all external noise; the beat of the watch will then be as audible as if placed against the ear. All other sounds can be conveyed in the same manner, no matter how long the stick is; for instance, if one end is upon a piano-forte in a sitting-room facing a garden, and the stick is thirty or forty feet long, extending to the farther end of the lawn or walk, now, if the instrument is ever so lightly played, "the tune" will be instantly distinguished by any person applying the teeth to the opposite end of the stick.

We clip the foregoing from an exchange paper. Many years ago, an old subscriber who was entirely deaf called at our office, and with the help of a slate which he always carried with him, we were enabled to converse with each other. In the course of our interview he remarked that for many years he had not been able to hear even the loudest thunder; but added that, to his great surprise, a few evenings before, he was at the house of a friend, and was seated by the side of a piano, his elbow resting upon it, and his teeth upon his thumb, when he heard distinctly the tune which the daughter of his friend happened to be playing. Again and again he tried the experiment, and he could always hear when the connection thus formed was kept up, but could hear nothing whatever when it was broken either by the removal of his elbow from the piano, or by placing his thumb upon any other portion of his face. From the character of our informant, we have never had a doubt of the truth of his narrative; and we give it now chiefly as a suggestion whether some simple instrument cannot be framed by means of which deaf persons may be enabled to hear with their teeth. An African Funeral.

The room in which the body was lying was crowded with women. All of them appeared very sad, and tears were rolling down the faces of many of them. The people had come together, as they do here, to perform the last rites for the dead. They have no sacred enclosure to bury their friends in, such as are every where found in this country. The forest is their grave-yard. Slaves carry out the body and dispose of it. No friend or relative follows it to the grave, nor do they ever visit the place where it is laid. The term for burying, in their language, literally means "to throw away." While the women were working, some men were getting ready a rude box, somewhat like a coffin. The body was dressed, as he used to be while living, with a cloth fastened round the waste and extending below the knee, and a hat on the head. His other clothes, some of which were quite gay, were spread over him, and his face was kept covered. After he was laid in the coffin, a cup was put in for him to drink with, and a knife and fork for him to use in eating. Then they nailed on the cover, and lashed a long stick, lengthwise, on the top, by which to carry it.

After these arrangements, which had occupied much time, were completed, a rude drum was brought, and preparations were made for "mourning." Women came, bringing their chairs with them, and sat round the door. When all was ready the drum was beat, and the women all set up the most piteous cry and wailing, which they continued for half an hour. They mourned like those without hope. It seemed like giving voice to the wail of a lost soul. When they ceased, eight or ten slaves took up the body and carried it into the "bush" to bury it. These washed all their clothes after they came back, and when night came they built a fire, and danced around it and yelled till morning, making the mangrove forests ring again. This they did to keep off the spirit of the dead man.

Presentation to an Apple-girl.

The habitual visitor at the City Hall, New York, cannot fail to have met "Sally," a neat, well-behaved little Irish girl, who has for the last ten years assisted a widowed mother in supporting several small sisters and brothers by her industry in selling apples and candy about the court-rooms. The lawyers all know her, and she walks unconcerned upon the Judges' bench, in the midst of an exciting trial, and deposits the fruits which she knows will please her customer, taking her pay whenever the Judge may have leisure to think of her. Last Tuesday morning, (says the N. Y. Tribune,) as quite a crowd of young members of the Bar were waiting the arrival of the Judge in the Marine Court, Sally entered, with her cheerful face and full fruit basket. A young man proposed that the Bar present Sally with some token of their esteem. The proposition meeting with approval, another gentleman forthwith drew up a form of subscription for the token, which is to be presented "as a mark of respect for her uniformly becoming and courteous behavior on all occasions during the last ten years, while selling fruit and candy about the court-rooms of the City Hall." Twenty-five dollars were subscribed during two days, by judges, lawyers, constables, sheriffs, and clerks, and the Committee purchased a neat gold locket, and requested Sally to sit for her daguerreotype, which in due time was taken, with apple basket and hood, in the locket, by Mr. M. B. Brady, the well-known daguerreotypist, who generously declined pay when he learned the object. The Committee had in hand a surplus of cash, which, with the locket, was presented to Sally in the vestibule of the Marine Court, and the universal satisfaction the incident gave, and the smiles of Sally on the occasion, created a pleasanter little episode than is often witnessed in the harsh jargon of the court-rooms.

Hoeing Corn.

Some ask how many times it is best to hoe corn and other crops. The best answer to that question was given us a few days since by a farmer whom we had observed often at work in a field of corn in sight of our window. In going over the piece with him, and remarking the remarkable growth, we asked him how many times he usually hoed his corn. "Why," said he, "I do as I was brought up by my father to do. He never had any particular number of times, but hoed it all he could. I find it grows faster and stands dry weather better the oftener it is hoed."

This is the true philosophy of culture: stir the ground. The directions to be given for early and good crops, after the proper previous preparation, would be to stir the ground. Crops are like animals; they need petting and care. A friend was remarking to us, last evening, the difference in the growth of melon vines in a neighbor's garden and in his own, side by side, on the same kind of soil and both rich, with the same kind of preparation for the seed, and the seed sown at the same time. The neighbor's melons were in blossom, while his own, he said, were but three or four inches in height. This difference had been produced by the constant labor and care of the gardener in stirring the ground and regulating the amount of sun and shade, air and moisture they received. [Granite Farmer.

Death from Foul Air.—Lives are frequently lost in consequence of descending into wells containing foul air. Sometimes, when a person is seen to fall insensible in a well, others descend to his rescue, and all perish together. Were newspapers more generally read, these distressing casualties would not occur. The remedy in such cases is an extremely simple one, and has been published in hundreds of journals during the last half century. It consists in dashing several bucketfuls of water into the well, which dissipates the foul air, so that a person may descend in safety. The sufferer can then be drawn up, and speedily restored by the same simple application.

Salt your Hay.—About as much salt applied to the hay on placing it away, as the cattle would naturally eat during the time they are consuming the hay, gives it a relish which is very agreeable to the stock. Besides, hay keeps better with two or three quarts of good salt applied to the ton. Hay that is not cured thoroughly is much improved by it. Try it, alongside with that not salted, and observe whether there is a difference. You will then know next year whether it is a waste of salt or not to apply it to hay.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, Teacher of Mathematics.

The Terms of 1852 and 1853 are as follows—

The first Term commences Wednesday, August 25; closes Tuesday, Nov. 30.

The second commences Thursday, Dec. 2; closes Tuesday, March 15.

The third commences Thursday, March 17; closes Tuesday, June 28.

There will be a recess of one day between the Terms, and of one week at the middle of the Winter Term.

Tuition must be arranged before entering classes, and, if less than a Term, paid strictly in advance.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Analysis, Composition, and Beginners in Algebra,	4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.,	5 00
Heating and Sweeping Halls, Ringing Bell, &c.	50

Extras.—Chemical Experiments, $1; Drawing, $1; Monochromatic Painting, $3; Oil Painting, $5; Writing and Stationery, 50 cents.

Board.—In private families, from $1 25 to $1 50 per week. In Clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

N. B.—Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the Common School Branches, with daily Lectures on "the Art of Teaching," the Laws of Health, School Laws, Chemistry, Physiology, &c. Tuition, $2 50. THE MORMONS.

THE MORMONS; OR, LATTER-DAY SAINTS, IN THE VALLEY OF THE GREAT SALT LAKE. By Lieut. J. W. GUNNISON. 12mo. pp. 165. Lippincott, Grambo & Co.

The author of this volume, who was a member of the Exploring Expedition to the Great Salt Lake, under the command of Capt. Stansbury, had ample opportunities for personal observation of the singular manners and customs of the Mormons, and has recorded the results of his experience in a remarkably intelligent and candid narrative. We can freely recommend his work as containing the most satisfactory account that we have seen of the history and character of the peculiar people among whom he resided for over a twelvemonth in his official capacity.

The Valley of the Great Salt Lake is situated midway between the States on the western bank of the Mississippi, and the gold regions of California. With inhospitable tracts of land on the North and South, the slope of the Rocky Mountains on the East, and immense salt deserts on the West, it is isolated from the usual abodes of civilized man, and presents a locality with rare natural advantages for a great social experiment. The name of Deseret, which has been applied to this territory by the Mormons, is a mystic word taken from the Book of Mormon, signifying the Land of the Honey Bee. In this sequestered and romantic valley, a colony of 4,000 persons was established in 1847, under the conduct of Brigham Young, who claimed to be the Lord's Prophet and Seer to the Latter-day Saints.

The land was consecrated by solemn ceremonies to the service of the Church, and a permanent location made on territory to which none of the wandering tribes of Indians could show a title. In five days a large tract was plowed, planted with potatoes, and the site of a city laid out. During the following year, every month was so mild that the settlers plowed and sowed in each; but their provisions were reduced to such a degree, that they were compelled to eat the hides of the slaughtered animals, which they collected out of the ditches, or tore from the roofs of houses. Their miserable meal was eked out by the wild roots which they dug side by side with the savage Utahs. The famine was aggravated by an army of locusts, which, descending from the mountain sides, destroyed every green thing, cutting off the tender wheat-stalk, while the grain was in the milk, and eluding every attempt to avert their fatal progress. At last, a welcome aid appeared from an unexpected quarter. Flocks of glossy white gulls, with bright red beaks and feet, dovelike in form and motion, with plumage of downy softness, filled the air with their graceful careerings, and alighting on the smooth and gentle slopes at the base of the mountains, feasted on the insect banquet, which was profusely spread for their entertainment. Since that season, the crops of the Mormons have more than supplied their wants; the fields are in a better state of cultivation; the assiduous gulls continue their annual visit, which at first was supposed miraculous; and the colonists have been able to furnish food to the California emigrants at a less price than at Fort Laramie, four hundred miles nearer the States.

From the original colony on the Salt Lake, four other colonies have branched off. Cities, with populous and rapidly growing suburbs, extend on a line of nearly two hundred miles, and a chain of posts will soon be established for the convenience of emigrants by the seaports of the Pacific. The number of inhabitants in the mountains has been variously estimated; but there are probably now in Utah not less than 30,000, and the number is rapidly increasing by the influx from England, Wales, and the Continent of Europe.

The Mormons profess a complete separation of Church and State, but their political character and administration are made subservient to the theoretical or religious element. They call their system of Government a "Theo-Democracy," professing to stand, in a civil capacity, like the ancient Israelites under Moses. For the rule of those not fully imbued with the spirit of obedience, as well as for things purely temporal, tribunals of justice are at present necessary; but the laws of Heaven are the ultimate authority, and those holding the revelation of the Divine Will are the legitimate Governors. The President of the Church is the temporal civil Governor, by virtue of his office as Seer of the Lord. Should one be assigned to them not of their creed, or other than their Chief, he would find himself without occupation. While received with the courtesy due to a distinguished personage, in his official capacity, to use the phrase of the people, "he would be let severely alone." A form of Courts might be established to which Gentile sojourners or emigrants could have recourse; but the members of the Latter-day Church would completely ignore them; their causes must be settled by the Church, which is the Court for doctrinal error; other offenses are treated according to the statutes of Deseret, and the "Common Law of the Mountain." Among themselves, all disputes are to be settled by a Church organization, which includes the civil officers from the inferior Justice of the Peace up to the Governor. The Justice is a Bishop of a ward in the city, or precinct of the town or county; the Judges of the Superior Courts are taken from the High Priests, from the quorums of seventies, or from the College of the Apostles; while the Seer is the highest ruler and consulting Judge. A double name is therefore required, by which the same persons execute the functions in their different official capacities, according as things relate to civil or spiritual matters. The entire management is under the Presidency, which consists of three persons, the Seer and two Counselors.

As respects their religious position, the Mormons claim to be the Only True Church of God and his Son, believing that, under the guidance of the Spirit, they will gather to themselves all who are destined to listen to the voice of Truth, when they will absorb all the sects of Christendom. Two hosts will be marshaled against each other; one under the banner of the Pope of Rome, the other around the Flag of all Nations, led by their Seer; the great battle of Gog and Magog will be fought; the earth will become the property of the Saints, and the Lord will descend from his heavenly throne to reign over them through a happy millennium. The Mormons believe in God the Eternal Father, in his Son Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Ghost. They believe the Word of God, recorded in the Bible, in the Book of Mormon, and in all other good books. They believe in the literal gathering of Israel, in the restoration of the Ten Tribes, in the resurrection of the body, and in the personal reign of Christ on the earth for a thousand years. The Supreme Hierarchy, which is the object of the Mormon worship, consists of a Trinity, or rather a Duality of Persons. God the Father is held to be a man perfected, but so far advanced in faith, intelligence, and power, that, in comparison with man, He may be called the Infinite. The Son, Jesus Christ, is the offspring of the Father and the Virgin Mary. The Eternal Father came upon earth, sent his herald-angel Gabriel to announce his union with Mary, and the Holy Babe that was born was the tabernacle prepared for the Spirit's Son, who now constitutes a God. The Holy Ghost is the concomitant will of both the Father and the Son, differing from both in being merely a Spiritual Soul or existence, without ever having taken a material body.

A priesthood, the Mormons contend, is essential to the being as well as to the perfection of a Church. The priestly order receives tithes of all one possesses on entering the Church; and the members pay a tenth of all income, and devote a tenth part of their time, to the temple and other public works. The bishops have charge of the tithe labor, and put the proceeds in the public store-houses. The priesthood has many grades of officers and gifts. The first is the Presidency of three persons, corresponding to the Trinity in Heaven, and more particularly to Peter, James, and John, the first Presidents of the Gospel Church. Next in order is the traveling High Apostolic College of Twelve Apostles—then the high-priests, priests, elders, bishops, teachers, and deacons, with the evangelists or missionaries of the three seventies. Each order constitutes a full quorum for the discipline of its members, but appeals lie to higher orders, and the whole church is the final appellate court assembled in General Council. A High Council consisting of twelve members is selected out of the high-priests, and holds a perpetual session for the advice of the Presidency; each one being free to give and argue his opinion; but the decision of the President is absolute, and demands implicit obedience. This Council is eye, ear, and hand to the President; the members are spies in all matters, in the field or temple, in the social party or the domestic circle.

"Their mode of conducting worship is to assemble at a particular hour, and the senior priest then indicates order by asking a blessing on the congregation and exercises—when a hymn from their own collection is sung, prayer made extempore, and another sacred song, followed by a sermon from some one previously appointed to preach; which is usually continued by exhortations and remarks from those who 'feel moved upon to speak.' Then notices of the arrangement of the tithe labor for the ensuing week, and information on all secular matters, interesting to them in a church capacity, is read by the council clerk, and the congregation dismissed by a benediction.

"While the congregation is assembling and departing from the house, it is usual for the large and excellent band of music to perform anthems, marches, and waltzes, which drives away all somber feelings, and prepares the mind for the exciting and often eloquent discourses. As there are a large number of Welsh in the meetings, and many of them not understanding the English language, a version of the principal discourse is sometimes made to them by an interpreter, and a Welsh choir will then exhilarate all present by singing one of their hymns, to one of their charming, wild, romantic airs."

The doctrine and custom of polygamy has been gradually introduced among the Mormons, and may now be regarded as a characteristic feature of their social organization. It was at first announced that the founder, Joseph Smith, and those he thought faithful, like the saints of old, David, Solomon, and Jacob, should be privileged to have as many wives as they could support, to raise up a holy household for the service of the Lord. The privilege, such as it is, seems now to have become universal, and to claim the sanction of a religious principle. It is taught that the use and foundation of matrimony is to raise up a peculiar, holy people for the Kingdom of Christ on the earth, and that at the Millennium the glory of the man will be in proportion to the size of his household of children, wives, and servants. None, however, but those eligible to the priesthood have a right to marry at all. The woman that marries out of the priesthood marries for hell. Marriage is to be a pure and holy state; prompted alone by religious motives and a sense of duty; sensual motives being held up as an abomination. It is affirmed that a woman cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven, without a husband to introduce her as belonging to himself. The addition of wives after the first to a man's family is called 'a sealing to him.' This constitutes a relation with all the rights and sanctions of matrimony. The idea of an exclusive love is derided. The Seer alone has the power of allowing the number of wives to be increased; the suitor must obtain the consent of the parents, then of the lady, and finally of the Seer. Every unmarried woman has a right to demand a man in marriage on the ground of the privilege of salvation; the President who receives the petition is bound to procure her a husband; he may command any man he deems competent to support her, to add her to the number of his wives; and unless he can show just impediment, if he declines the union, he is punished for contumacy. The Seer has also power to annul the marriage contract, and dissolve the relationship of the parties. In some instances, several wives occupy the same house, but it is more usual to board out the extra ones, who are generally able to pay their way, by sewing and other female employments. The Mormons assert "that this system is the preventive and cure for the awful licentiousness—the moral and physical degradation, in the world; and they make it both a religious and a social custom, a point of personal honor, for a man whose wife, daughter, or sister has been led astray, to kill the seducer; and considering this as 'common mountain law,' based on the Mosiac code, a jury will acquit the murderer at all hazards. That the wives find the relation often a lonesome and a burdensome one, is certain; though usually the surface of society wears a smiling countenance, and to all who consent from a sense of duty or enthusiasm the yoke is easy. The wife of the prophet Joseph rebelled against it, and declared if he persisted she would desert for another, but the only satisfaction she received was 'that a prophet must obey the Lord.' When such wives rebel, the proceedings are very summary, and public opinion sustains the cause against the woman. A very exemplary lady in the valley is looked upon as having broken her vows for deserting the 'sealed one' and marrying another, and therefore is not invited into social parties."

"Another method of increasing the household and adding to the glory of the chiefs is by 'adoption.' This consists in taking whole families and adopting them as part and parcel of the family of the chief, and arises out of the humility of the person so proposing to attach himself to the sacred character of some great dignitary of the Church. The man is called, for instance, the 'son of Brigham by adoption,' and lives with him, or near by, and acts for him as a child does for his parent, and receives his subsistence, clothing, and living, conjointly with the family."

With the prevalence of polygamy, woman, of course, is placed in a position of relative inferiority. The deference to female excellence, which marks a refined state of society, is stigmatized by the Mormons as "Gentile gallantry and fashion." To give the post of honor or of comfort to the lady, in the code of "Latter-Day" etiquette is reckoned an absurdity. If there is but one seat, it belongs of right to the gentleman, who is bound to lead the way, and let the Mormon dame enter the room behind him.

"In social parties and lively meetings the Mormons are preëminent, and their hospitality would be more readily extended to strangers, had they suitable dwellings to invite them into.

"The adobe or sun-dried brick is now furnishing material, and the one-room log buildings are being replaced by spacious and commodious houses.

"In their social gatherings and evening parties, patronized by the presence of the prophets and apostles, it is not unusual to open the ball by prayer, asking the blessing of God upon their amusements, as well as upon any other engagement—and then will follow the most sprightly dancing, in which all join with hearty good-will, from the highest dignitary to the humblest individual; and this exercise is to become part of the temple worship, to 'praise God in songs and dances.'

"These private balls and soirées are frequently extended beyond the time of cock-crowing, by the younger-members, and the remains of the evening repast furnish the breakfast for the jovial guests."

"The cheerful, happy faces—the self-satisfied countenances—the cordial salutation of brother or sister on all occasions of address—the lively strains of music pouring forth from merry hearts in every domicil, as women and children sing their 'songs of Zion,' while plying the domestic tasks, give an impression of a happy society in the vales of Deseret."

"The dignity of labor is held sacred by the Mormons, and exemplified in their organization and requirements. A lazy person is either accursed, or likely to be; usefulness is their motto; and those who will not keep themselves, or try their best, are left to starve into industry. This is inculcated in their creed, though the prophet Joseph was excused from physical labor at Kirtland, his attention being sufficiently occupied with the government. Every one is expected to work and bring in his tithes, and the President sets the example in the valley, by working at his trade of carpenter, on his own mills in the kanyon. It is a well-devised scheme, and the more flourishing the laborers the greater is the income of the priests. This income is expended on public works, the temple, the bridges, and public charity, and support of the families of those on missionary duty.

"The labor for support of one's self and family is taught to be of as divine a character as public worship and prayer. In practice their views unite them so as to procure all the benefits of social Christianity, without running into Communism. The priest and the bishop make it their boast that, like Paul the tentmaker, they earn their bread by the sweat of their brow; and teach by example on the week day what they preach on the Sabbath, concerning the virtue of industry. On the pulpit stand they dispense the word of the gospel, and work harder than when they plant, sow, or reap in the field, or team for wood in the kanyon, or ply the spade, the trowel, or the hammer. This brings all orders together, and makes them acquainted where no art or concealment of feeling is practiced, and destroys that distinction of pastor and layman by the difference of dress and demeanor, which keeps them strangers to each other's real sentiments. And it gives the priest the advantage of knowing the turns of thought, the doubts on doctrines, and degree of enlightenment of those who are to be his auditors, and he can adapt his discourse accordingly, and make an impression."

The most offensive feature in the Mormon economy, as described in this volume is doubtless the custom of polygamy. Destroying, as it does, all freedom of affection in woman, degrading her to the rank of a cypher in society, and converting the most sacred relation of life into a state of abject dependence, it must soon become as intolerable to the Mormon community, as it is odious to the civilized world. Many on the frontiers have already deserted the "sealed" relation and married half-breeds and Potawatamies, preferring a life of reciprocal privileges in the cabins of Nebraska, to the subjection and ennui of a Mormon seraglio. The young men also are indignant at the iavasion of their rights, when a daughter rejects their suit in obedience to a mother's ambition, which aims at an alliance with a seer or an apostle, in order to obtain a celestial queenship in the world to come.

The theology of the Mormons is evidently a tissue of contradictions and gross absurdities. Connected, however, with the pretension to miraculous gifts, it will no doubt continue to appeal to the elements of superstition and fanaticism, which abound in every transitional age like the present.

PRECEPTS.

THOMAS RANDOLPH, 1630.

First worship God; he that forgets to pray,
Bids not himself good-morrow nor good-day;
Let thy first labor be, to purge thy sin,
And serve him first whence all things did begin.

Honor thy parents to prolong thine end;
With them, though for a truth, do not contend;
Whoever makes his father's heart to bleed
Shall have a child that will avenge the deed.

Think what is just; 'tis not enough to do,
Unless thy very thoughts are upright too.

Defend the truth; for that who will not die,
A coward is, and gives himself the lie.

Take well whate'er shall chance, though bad it be:
Take it for good, and 't will be good to thee.

First think; and if thy thoughts approve thy will,
Then speak; and after, that thou speak'st fulfill.

* * * * *

So live with men, as if God's curious eye
Did everywhere into thine actions pry;
For never yet was sin so void of sense,
So fully faced with brazen impudence,
As that it durst before men's eyes commit
Their brutal lusts, lest they should witness it;
How dare they then offend when God shall see,
That must alone both judge and jury be?

Would'st thou live long? The only means are these,
'Bove Galen's diet, or Hippocrates';
Strive to live well; tread in the upright ways,
And rather count thy actions than thy days;
Then thou hast lived enough amongst us here;
For every day well spent I count a year.
Live well, and then, how soon soe'er thou die,
Thou art of age to claim eternity.
But he that outlives Festor, and appears
To have passed the date of gray Methusalem's years,
If he his life to sloth and sin doth give,
I say he only was—he did not live.

OXFORD AND ITS COLLEGES.

BY REV. A. FOSTER.

Oxford is sixty miles by railroad, west by north, from London; has about 20,000 inhabitants, is the seat of a Bishop and of the Universities. It is in a [illegible] Cherwell and Isis streams, running into the Thames, on which are the most luxuriant meadows.

There is no other city in the world, of an equal number of inhabitants, which has buildings of equal magnificence. The magnitude of these buildings, the elaborate architecture, the number of domes, and towers, and spires, is very imposing. Oxford is chiefly known as the seat of the greatest and richest University in the world. It consists of twenty Colleges and five Halls, each of which forms an establishment within itself, having its own set of buildings, government, funds, teachers, and students, and they are all united in one University, as our States have separate governments, yet are one Union. The buildings of each of these corporations are several times more expensive than any University building in this country. Their beginnings run back into the uncertainties of history; certainly to Alfred, 880, and probably three centuries earlier. In these immense buildings, the architecture of different ages is readily distinguished, the old Saxon, and Norman, and the age of the Tudors.

Each set of college buildings is placed around a square, with an open court, often two or three acres, in the center. Some of them have meadows and walks under lofty elms, or ornamented with every variety of flowers and shrubbery, containing from five to fifty acres. If I should ever so strongly affirm that these buildings are massive and expensive, yet even then none of your minds will come up to one half the truth, for there is nothing in our country that has any likeness to Oxford.

A University was in operation a long time before the Colleges were established, both at Oxford and Cambridge. A University is a place where men study their professions and take their degrees and pay for all, and may have boarding-houses and Professors. But these Colleges are separate funded institutions. Some rich man gives a fund from which the buildings are made, and the professorships, fellowships, and scholarships are funded. A fellowship, in Oxford and Cambridge, is a fund which supports one man after he has taken his first degree. The incomes vary from $150 to $750. Each Fellow may retain his fellowship for life, if he does not marry, nor inherit a property of a large income. Some of these Colleges have many more fellowships than others, varying from twelve to seventy—in all the Colleges are 480 fellowships. These Colleges also have scholarships, which yield a support to students out of a general fund. The present number of these, in all, is 270. Besides these, the Colleges support many undergraduates by charity. There are about 5,500 students at Oxford, and as many at Cambridge, one-third of whom are supported by charity. The five Halls are like the other Colleges, only they have no fellow or scholarships.

Some of these Colleges have been and are more popular than others. At present one has a thousand scholars, and another has not one. Of these Colleges, all but two were founded between 1200 and 1620, chiefly in the 13th, 14th, and 15th centuries. They are proofs of the great wealth and love of learning in England in those early times, and a greater proof of devotion to the Monastic orders. Dr. Humphrey says that in 1300 there were only three Colleges, and about 300 halls or boarding-houses. I suppose this is true, and that in 1200 there were only boarding-houses, and not one incorporated or funded College. The University was there, but no College.

It is surprising that no dissenter from the Church of England has ever been admitted a student either at Oxford or Cambridge; so that half the nation is now excluded from these seats of learning. On several occasions, efforts have been made to overcome these restrictions and gain the privilege, by dissenters, but there is no present hope of doing this.

My time and patience fail me to describe the rooms, and libraries, and paintings, and curiosities of Oxford. I noticed an old hat which Bradshaw had on his head when he presided at the trial of Charles I., and the lantern found in the hand of Guy Fawkes under the Parliament House, at the time of the gunpowder plot, 1604, and the original letter which notified Monteagle of the plot. I sat down in Drake's chair, surrounded by full-length portraits of many of the distinguished of his time. This is the chair in which Sir Francis sat when it was struck by a cannon-ball, Nov. 11th, 1595, off Porto Rico. I was very much entertained by a painting representing Duns Scotus. He had made a vow to translate the whole Bible before he ate or slept, under the belief that God would help him to perform the miracle. He died in the attempt, pen in hand, his eye upon the Bible, and writing for dear life. Such a countenance! He was professor in Merton College in 1301.

It is a curious fact that even the names of half the founders of these Colleges and fellowships are not known—every thing of them is forgotten, even their graves; so that the Professors and Fellows who fatten, some of them, for fifty years on these endowments, know not whose corn they feed on. The benefactors were not preserved in records, while they were in memory, and before it was thought of to write their history, it had passed out of the memory of every living man. Their money is taken care of, but the names and characters of the donors are cast away. Mr. Warne, in his article on the "Oxford Founders," says, "A half crown ought to purchase a book giving information of the founders of these Colleges to all the curious inquirers. But neither the gratitude, nor the learned leisure, nor the love of fame, of the thousands who have vegetated on fat fellowships in Oxford, has produced any to provide such a volume. This is a strange fact, which supplies its own comment."

The founder of Christ Church College, Wolsey, because he is known for many acts, is known for this also, 1525, and no College has been more popular. Of a summer evening, there is not a more charming walk in all Europe than in Christ Church Meadow, with its wide and shaded walks by the side of the Cherwell. For hours I sauntered here, and in the avenue called "Addison's Walk," thinking of the great men who [illegible] here before me, and passed on to another life, leaving their works—Wickliffe, Hampden, Locke, Addison, Blackstone, Lowth, Johnson, Gibbon, Fox, and many a humble believer, now nearer the Saviour than some of these. Oh, that I could walk here one evening of every summer. For the privilege I would give the very best evening that I shall enjoy in America.

You will find nothing in Europe to which you can give a week with more satisfaction than to Oxford. For all this I am very much indebted to that excellent man, Joseph Warne. We were walking High-street, when he suddenly said, "If you had been here Oct. 16th, 1555, you would have seen this street and these houses loaded with people, and would have scented the smoke and fumes of burning human flesh, for in the center there," (and it was inlaid with a cross of brass,) "good old Latimer and Ridley were consumed; and, the next spring, Cranmer also. Here in the center street of Oxford, midway among these Colleges, in open day, before thousands of spectators, these martyrs for Christianity were consumed in the flames."

GOOD FOR THE SOUL.

Rev. E. Hartvig, a Moravian missionary on the island of St. Thomas, relates the following:—

Maria Theresa, an aged communicant widow of our congregation, always attracted our notice by her bright and peaceful countenance; for whilst the generality of the negroes, when asked about their health, constantly complain of one thing or another, this good old widow always looked cheerful and contented, replying to our "How do you do?" with "Thank God, quite well;" while every feature of her countenance testified of the peace which filled her soul. It was always a mystery to us how she made her living at her very advanced age; for she never seemed to suffer any want, much less to ask for assistance, as many of our people from necessity are in the habit of doing. Some days ago she too came to pay her annual subscription. My wife, who at first was painfully struck with the thought that the poor woman labored under the wrong impression that every one was compelled to pay, refused to take the money, and said it was not expected of her. In return she stretched forth her hand with the amount, and said with a friendly and cheerful look, "It is good for my soul." My wife, still hesitating, called me to her, and I remonstrated in the same way, but to no purpose, for she kept presenting her offering with the same saying—"It is good for my soul." We were soon convinced that if we refused taking what she offered, we should have well nigh broken the poor woman's heart, and destroyed the greatest delight and satisfaction she ever felt. My curiosity as to the way in which she had raised the amount was, however, not yet satisfied. I therefore began to question her more particularly about it; when she gave a detailed account of her profitable traffic; but this I do better to give in her own words:

"Me boil coffee in the morning, and sit in street; when people go work, one come and take a cup, and give me a stiver (two thirds of a penny); another come take cup and give me a stiver; but when me sweeten it, me get two stiver. Me get sometimes three and sometimes four bits a morning, but this week plenty people come, me sell for five or six bits, and the Lord help me that I can pay the church; thank God, me can pay the church!"

O, how much I wish that you could have been present, to see the dark eyes of the aged woman, how they beamed with love, joy and delight, when she uttered this last sentence, evidently with increased emotion—it would certainly have done your heart good, as it did ours.

A BETTER WAY.

"I have come to tell you," said Mr. Williams to Mr. Holmes, "that I cannot endure Smith's ill treatment any longer."

"I know," said Mr. Holmes, "that he has not treated you very well, but as I had heard nothing new lately, I was in hopes he was coming round a little."

"If I had given him any just provocation, his course towards me would not be so utterly intolerable."

"You have borne his ill-treatment thus far with a good deal of meekness. I hope he will not succeed in causing you to render evil for evil. That, I presume, is what he desires. If he could provoke you to some act of retaliation, he would not feel the trouble which he now doubtless feels from a sense of injustice."

"I have made up my mind to go and see him, and tell him how he has treated me, and warn him that I will submit to it no longer."

"I would do no such thing."

"Why not?"

"Because, in the first place, he does not need to have you tell him how he has treated you—he knows that already. In the next place, you would probably get angry and say something which you would have to repent of, besides furnishing him with a self-justifying plea. No, my friend, I will tell you a much better way. Do as Hezekiah did when he received the insulting letter from the king of Assyria. You know he went and spread it out before the Lord. Go and spread out your case before the Lord. Instead of telling Smith how he has treated you, tell the Lord how he has treated you. You may enter into all particulars; for the Lord has a patient ear for all the troubles of his children. When you have made a full statement of your case, you will find yourself relieved, you will find yourself in a very different frame of mind from that which would result from telling your story to the author of your injuries.

"When you have told the Lord your affliction, ask him to give you grace to bear it without murmuring, and to sanctify it to your growth in grace. Use as an argument the fact that he in his wise providence has permitted the affliction, and that his glory is concerned in your bearing it aright. It is always wise for us to interest his glory in the accomplishing of the ends sought by prayer. Use also as an argument when seeking for grace to bear your trial, the fact that Christ, your great example, suffered patiently and silently the insults and injustice of men. Say, 'O Lord, help me to bear this grievous wrong calmly, because Christ, when he was reviled, reviled not again, when he suffered he threatened not, but committed his cause to him who judgeth righteously.' Ask him for grace to forgive your enemy, and urge as an argument the fact that otherwise you cannot obey your Saviour, who bids us pray, 'forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.' You see, we have storng arguments to use with the Lord—so strong that they must prevail. Now when you go home, enter your closet, and spread this whole matter before the Lord, somewhat after the manner I have set forth."

Mr. Williams sat for a few moments in silence, then thanked Mr. Holmes for his advice, and expressed his determination to follow it. He then bade him good morning and retired.

About a week afterward he called on Mr. Holmes again. He appeared to be in good spirits, and made no such complaints as he had been wont to make on former visits. After some conversation on a variety of topics, Mr. Holmes asked, "How are you and Smith getting on?"

"Much better than when I saw you last. He has been to see me, and has made some concessions and promises to do better for the future."

"What has caused the change in him?"

"I do not know."

"You did not go to him and give him warning to change his course, did you?"

"No, I tried to follow the advice you gave me."

"If you had gone and spread your case before him, instead of spreading it out before the Lord, I doubt very much if he would have made any concession or promised amendment. I am satisfied from experience and observation, that it is best to make our complaints to the Lord and to the Lord only. You can reach a man's heart more readily by prayer than in any other way. I make it a rule to tell the Lord all my troubles, and I have seldom occasion to tell them to any one else."

A BEAUTIFUL PRAYER.

Lord, bless and preserve that dear person whom thou hast chosen to be my husband; let his life be long and blessed, comfortable and holy; and let me also become a great blessing and comfort unto him, a sharer in all his joys, a refreshment in all his sorrows, a meet helper for him in all the accidents and chances of the world. Make me amiable forever in his eyes, and very dear to him. Unite his heart to me in the dearest union of love and holiness, and mine to him in all sweetness, charity and compliance. Keep me from all ungentleness, all discontentedness, and unreasonableness of passion and humor; and make me humble and obedient, useful and observant, that we may delight in each other, according to thy blessed Word and ordinance, and both of us may rejoice in thee, having our portion in the love and service of God forever. FORGIVENESS.

[Concluded]

It is sometimes argued, that we are not bound to manifest forgiveness, unless the offender confesses his fault, and shows a wish to be forgiven. And to justify this view, the example of God in forgiving sinners is referred to. He, it is said, never manifests his forgiving mercy, till the sinner humbles himself, and seeks it; and as no greater exercise of mercy can be expected from us, so it is maintained, that till the offender becomes sensible of his fault, and humbly asks to be restored to favor, we are justified in carrying ourselves with reserve towards him.

This is shallow sophistry. It proceeds on the assumption, that we are invested with a sort of governmental jurisdiction over one another, by reason of which every man has a right to call his neighbor to account, and punish him if he supposes him to have done wrong. There is no such authority entrusted to us. We all stand on a footing of equality as the creatures of God, and each one is bound to love his neighbor as himself. When one becomes offended, his love changes into alienation of affection. That this is so, is evident from the fact that there can be no consciousness of offense where the feelings suffer no alienation. If this be so, then, in being required to forgive, we are simply required to cease our dislike, and return to the exercise of love, and to give the offender proof that we have so returned by our carriage towards him.

But if, under the fallacious notion of imitating the Divine example, we withhold the manifestation of our love till the offender shall make ample atonement, by confession of his faults, and by begging to be restored to favor, then we act as if we had some right to punish him. We assume the proud position, that we are invested with a sort of governmental authority, the dignity of which requires some kind of atonement for wrongs committed against it. For this is the true ground on which God withholds the manifestation of pardon from the sinner who has never yet humbled himself. As the rightful Governor of the universe, the Sovereign to whom all are accountable, he withholds temporarily the manifestation of that which he has a right to withhold altogether. But you, being but the equal of your fellow man, withhold that which you have no right to withhold for a single moment.

But consider, again, that though God withholds the full expression of his pardoning mercy from those who refuse to confess their sins, he does not withhold the most unwearied attempts to make them sensible of their fault, and so to bring them into a condition of mind to appreciate and enjoy his forgiveness. This he does, accompanied with every manifestation of kindness. It is not strictly true, that he waits for their return to him; but he goes after them, into the wilderness where they are wandering. He woos them; he entreats them; and finally exerts his mighty power upon their hearts, to change them from enmity to love.

By no means do we pretend, that the offender is not bound to acknowledge his fault, and ask to be forgiven; but we do maintain, that the offended has no right to make this the condition of forgiveness. While his enemies were in the very act of crucifying him, Christ prayed that they might be forgiven. Luke 23:34. He waited not for them to see their errors. At that very time, he felt kindly towards them, and would have rejoiced to see in them that state of mind which would have made them appreciate his forgiving spirit. Christ is set forth as our example, and "he that saith he abideth in him, ought himself also to walk even as he walked." 1 John 2:6.

And how often must we forgive? The Scripture prescribes no bounds. "Not only until seven times, but till seventy times seven." That is, as we understand it, to an indefinite extent. "If thy brother trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent, thou shalt forgive him." Matt. 18:22, and Luke 17:4. To the question itself we reply, Forgive your offending neighbor till your obligation to love him as yourself ceases. God has no other law for his kingdom but that of love.

RUM AND SUNDAY.

For a few weeks past, vigorous efforts have been made to close the liquor stores of New York, Brooklyn, and Williamsburgh, on Sunday. Whether a desire to abolish the liquor traffic, or a wish to secure the better observance of Sunday, has most to do with the movement, may be difficult to determine. Quite certain we are, however, that if the real design is to abolish the liquor traffic, this is a round-about and very questionable mode of getting at it. When a rum-seller is told that he must close his shop on Sunday, and is left quietly to pursue his nefarious business on the other six days of the week, he very naturally concludes that people generally do not consider his buisness as wrong in itself, but only that it is wrong to pursue it on Sunday. Thus the very men who take the lead in this movement effectually uphold the traffic six days in the week by their efforts to stop it on Sunday. If they believe that rum-selling is wrong, they should give their influence to stop it, not only on Sunday, but on the other six days of the week. In that way, and in that way only, can they consistently enter their protest against the business. But if it is a better observance of Sunday which they desire to secure, then let them say so, and, consistently with their professed desire, endeavor to put a stop to all kinds of traffic on that day. This mixing and mincing of matters is sure to defeat the end sought.

The following item, from the N. Y. Tribune of Second-day, Aug. 30, shows the present position of the affair in Brooklyn:—

"On Thursday last, an injunction restraining the enforcement of the ordinance known as the Sunday law, was granted by Judge Strong, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the Second Judical District, on the application of N. F. Waring, Esq. The order was served on the proper parties on Saturday evening, and yesterday morning the Chief of Police directed the captains of the several Districts not to interfere with those who should keep open house. The consequence was that the taverns and porter-houses generally, together with many confectionary establishments and cigar shops, were open for customers the same as heretofore.

"The complaint in the case brought before Judge Strong, is filed by Miles Wood against the Mayor of Brooklyn and Chief of Police, in behalf of himself and all other persons who are licensed tavern-keepers in the city, and it is to set aside the ordinance of the city of Brooklyn, on the ground that it is contrary to the Constitution of the State of New York, and prevents him from exercising his lawful calling as a tavern-keeper, and deprives him of the means of supporting himself and family, and asks for a perpetual injunction staying the enforcement of said ordinance. Upon this bill being presented, an order was made requiring defendants in the action to show cause in the Supreme Court, in the City of Brooklyn, on the 9th of September next, and in the mean time an injunction is granted, ordering and directing the Common Council, their attorney or attorneys, and each or every of their servants, agents, officers and police officers, to absolutely desist and refrain from taking any steps or measures, or doing any act, matter, or thing, in prosecuting or imprisoning the plaintiff or any other person or persons in whose behalf the action is commenced under the law or ordinance commonly called the Sunday law, or prosecuting or enforcing the same, or causing the same to be done under their authority or direction."

Sunday Incidents—Thunder Storms and Death—Clerical Convocations.

GLASGOW, August 13th, 1852.

Some interest has been kept up for a time as to a promised fete at Paris, to be given by the French President on Sunday. It should therefore occupy its place among the remarkable instances of Sunday observance—were it not for the fact that there is nothing remarkable in it as regards the Parisians or the French. But connected with this expected distribution of the eagles, there is a circumstance deserving to be noted. Yesterday an excursion train—a cheap excursion train—left Presbyterian Glasgow and Edinburgh, carrying [illegible] probably to spend the Sunday in French fashion. And, in a community very generally adopting as the Confession of their Faith that prepared by the Westminster Assembly of Divines, which asserts that ever since the resurrection of Christ the Sunday has been the Sabbath, the intimation of this train put the matter thus before them, "Grand Military Fete in Paris, on 15th August."

Another of Her Majesty's sea cruises, from Portsmouth, had been fixed for Sabbath last; but having been postponed on account of stormy weather, a second order was issued for the vessels composing the squadron to be in readiness to start on Sunday evening. The gale continuing, however, this form of royal desecration was averted. She, with Prince Albert, and several of the younger members of the royal family, sailed on Tuesday, and cast anchor the following evening at Antwerp.

Over all the country there has, this summer, been a very unwonted number of thunder storms—at times in almost unbroken succession. The consequent floods have destroyed much property; while the lightning itself has occasioned the loss of many lives. On the 10th instant four masons were killed who were working at a row of houses in the vicinity of Manchester, three of their companions having also been struck at the same time, and six out of eight buildings, of which the row consisted, being seriously injured. On the same day, a carpenter, working at a new house being erected a few miles from this city, by one of the subscribers to the Sabbath Recorder, was killed by the lightning, while two of his companions were also struck down by his side. Nearer to town, in the same direction, a man working at the railway was struck dead while standing on one of the rails. And, besides other instances that might be mentioned, a woman was killed in a street adjoining that in which the writer dwells.

Surely, such visitations call for solemn reflection. In no case of death, or disease, or injury, it is true, should we fail to discern the doings of Him who numbereth the hairs of our head. But, while in the case of a man who falls from the house-top and loses his life we may be able to discern a want of caution on his part, or some other circumstance on which the attention may be ready to rest, in such cases as those we have narrated, all such subterfuges for unbelief are withdrawn, and we are compelled to behold the right hand of Jehovah immediately hurling the bolt. The act is all His own, and we are called to see it as His "strange act" of judgment, and to stand in solemn awe. In addition even to the lightning, there have descended several balls of fire; one of these half a mile from where the man was killed on the railway; another entered a house in an eastern suburb of the city. Two weeks ago, a severe shock of earthquake also was felt at Kilmarnock, although it does not seem to have occasioned damage; added to all which, the blight in the potato crop is extending throughout the whole country—having manifested itself decidedly at an earlier period of the season than in 1846, when it proved so severe.

A petition is being signed, addressed to the Archbishops and Bishops, that their efforts may be directed to revive Synodical action in the Church of England, which means the exercise of a power through Convocation, which we might expect would, if obtained, abridge in no small degree our religious liberties. What they aim at is a conclave exclusively of clergymen—the promoters of the movement in their meetings to elect proctors (members of Convocation) deprecating the idea of a lay element being introduced. For nearly two hundred years they have had only the semblance of the power of holding ecclesiastical synods; the petitioners entreat the dignitaries of the church "to withstand any undue attempts to silence" their deliberations in convocation assembled. Nonconformists, of all classes, are, of course, decidedly hostile to the Episcopal Church's acquisition of power, the sad abuse of which in former days, history so fully records. The Times has thundered (in this case, indeed, I ought to say, reasoned well) against it—viewing the ecclesiastical establishment as an institution deriving all its authority from the State, which, it says, saw the danger of continuing what at one time it deemed it expedient to allow. We do not expect the Times to see the matter in a Scriptural light; but even the Record, the organ of the Evangelicals, as they are termed, equally repudiates powers more extensive being entrusted to their clergymen. THE MINISTRY OF ANGELS—NO. 2.

These points conceded—that angels are messengers, as the name implies, and that the saints are in close proximity with them; that they are sent forth to minister to those who shall be heirs of salvation; that we, by a provision in our natures, may hold converse with them, and they be made visible to us, by the mere derangement of our powers, like the removing of a screw or a pin in a piece of machinery; that this is done by the will of God, as when communicating with the prophets, or by his providence, as when by disease the screw or pin is displaced, or by art and prostitution of our powers, as in magic or necromancy—then another question will arise, which is, Where is the dividing line as to the right and wrong? This it is important to know; for the advocates of necromancy claim that their avocation is the same as that of the prophets, and therefore bring the veracity of the Scriptures in question, which have denounced the art. But one rule will apply safely, and that is, when God, by his will or providence, puts us in condition to open intercourse, we are not to be faulted; but when we seek to pry into the secrets of the spirit world, by arts of magic, astrology, and sooth-saying, and prostitute our powers by such devices, we are obnoxious to the displeasure of God, and sure to be deceived by base and foul spirits, if by spirits at all. So that, though we are prohibited from conversing with the spirits of the dead, as an abomination to the Lord, he can, and we may, safely communicate, when the communication comes in the order of his providence.

We will not, for the present, suppose that communications are often received in modern times; still, there are cases in which it requires but a small portion of credulity to believe in supernatural appearances, as in the trances mentioned in the foregoing article, and the visions that appear to dying Christians, as attending angels, to carry the disembodied saint to the bosom of his God. And why may not the dying Christian, when earth recedes and disappears, and heaven opens to his view, hear the invitation expressed by the poet—

"Sister Spirit, come away!"

There seems to be an impression, from the statements of Scripture, that this may be the case; and men of eminence as Bible students have considered it as a matter of assurance, that the Christian has a guard of angels about him.

There is another point, however, which may have interest to some, and that is, does every Christian have a guardian angel, who particularly interests himself in his case? This may be more of a speculation than the other points considered; still, much may be drawn from Scripture to support the idea, though perhaps not entirely to the satisfaction of all. Our Saviour, speaking of the offenses against the little ones that believe in him, says, "Their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven." What may we understand by "their angels?" is the inquiry. Not their spirits, surely, because they are still living. Not the angels generally, for this could not be well understood as "their angels." But the natural suggestion is, that there are angels or messengers attached to their particular concerns, that are always in the presence of God, and represent them in particular; and there is nothing in the numerous cases before cited, or similar ones that might have been named of ministering angels which attended ancient saints, to preclude the idea of their standing in this very interesting relation.

Should this point be rested, we might still inquire if, such being the case, those near and dear to us may not be permitted to interest themselves in us, and become our attending or guardian angels? Some will have serious doubts, perhaps, respecting this position. But if the Apostle was correct in his conclusion, (1 Cor. 13:12,) that "then I shall know even as I am known," there must be a full recognition of the saints on earth by those in heaven. Who can suppose that all the endearments of friendship and ties of consanguinity on earth, the labors of love and travel of zeal that have been suffered for friends, children, or others, will be forgotten by them when called to their higher and holier labors? Is there joy in heaven over one repenting sinner by the whole choir of angels? And is no one more interested than the rest? Dives had compassion on his kindred; and have not saints the same, or higher and nobler sympathies? To sustain this conclusion, observation may have added something. In a number of cases of the sick and the dying which have come more immediately under my observation, persons have expressed their consciousness of the presence of "glorious forms," of known and recognized friends, who wistfully watched around them, and who seemed comforted by the recognition of their presence; and those supposed to have been entranced have represented the same to those with whom they have communicated. Still, I admit that this is not valid proof, but merely collateral and corroborative, which may, and perhaps ought to, interest us. We are all destined to the spirit world, and daily some are taking leave of earth, and entering its boundaries; and shall we, or shall we not, be interested in all that we can glean to illuminate the passage, and cheer us in the pilgrimage? Shall we meet with our Saviour? So also shall we see the patriarchs and prophets, the apostles, the saints and martyrs, the fathers and mothers in Israel, and parents and children, brothers and sisters, and friends, who have died in the Lord, who shall welcome the weary pilgrim to the land of rest. And why may we not comfort one another with these thoughts?

SABBATH-SCHOOL CELEBRATION.

The Sabbath-School of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., had a celebration and pic-nic, in a grove on the premises of Bro. Jesse Maxson, near Adams Center, on Fourth-day, August 25th. The exercises of the day were conducted by Eld. James Summerbell, Pastor of the Church, and were of the most interesting character.

The morning exercises were opened by singing William Cheerful's Sabbath-School Hymn, "Never Late," and prayer by the pastor and school; after which were exercises by the Bible, Infant, and other Classes. There were eighteen addresses and six dialogues, most of which were original, and written for the occasion.

The exercises were interspersed throughout with music by the Infant Class, and some choice pieces by several young ladies and gentlemen, members of the choir; and ended by singing the doxology,

"Praise God, from whom all blessings flow," to the tune of Old Hundred, in which the whole congregation joined as with one heart.

In the course of the exercises, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

Whereas, we have read with pleasure, in the Sabbath-School Visitor, the resolutions adopted by the Sabbath-Schools of New Market and Plainfield, N. J., at their festival on the first of August, therefore—

Resolved, That we heartily concur in the sentiments set forth in those Resolutions, and adopt them as our own.

Resolved, That we hail with delight the reports which come bounding over the hills and valleys, borne on the wings of our Sabbath-School Visitor, laden with good news from New Market, Plainfield, and Hebron.

Resolved, That the next number of the Sabbath-School Visitor be our messenger to convey to them, and to all others engaged in the same good work, our warmest sympathy; and at the same time to say to them, We are friends.

Resolved, That we tell them also, that we are opposed to the horrible law which has transformed our formerly fair and free North into a fugitive-slave prison-house; and that, if we know ourselves, we would rather submit to its penalties than, like willing slaves, yield to its cruel demands, and become slave-catchers for southern slave-holders.

Resolved, That we are greatly in favor of Temperance, and consequently opposed to smoking, chewing, and snuffing Tobacco; and hope for the time when the "Maine Law" shall become the law of the land.

Resolved, That we came to the grove to enjoy a season of happy festivity, and have not been disapointed.

Resolved, That we love our Sabbath-School, and will cling to it; we love our teachers, and will attend to their instructions; we love our Bible, and will search it, for in it we think we have eternal life.

Resolved, That the Sabbath-School Visitor is a most welcome and indispensable visitor, and that we will rally to its encouragement, and not forget to subscribe for the next volume, and recommend it to others.

Resolved, That these proceedings be forwarded to the Sabbath Recorder and Sabbath-School Visitor for publication.

The weather had been very warm, and the roads dry and dusty, for some days; but a shower, the night before, laid the dust, cooled the air, and rendered the day one of the most agreeable of the season. The grove was one of exquisite beauty, consisting of forest trees, with spreading branches, richly laden with green foliage, the happy home of merry songsters, who ceased their warblings as if to listen to the songs of the Sabbath-School Choir. The refreshments were abundant, and served up in good order; and it seems safe to conclude, that all present were made better by the occasion.

This School was organized last May, and has now fourteen teachers, and over one hundred scholars, all eager to learn the way of life and salvation, as taught in the Scriptures. May God bless and prosper our Sabbath Schools, and hasten the time when every church in our denomination shall have one well organized. E. R. MAXSON.

ADAMS CENTER, August 27, 1852.

THE GERMANS AND NORWEGIANS.

A Convention of colporteurs—Germans, Norwegians, &c.—connected with the American Tract Society, was recently held at Milwaukie, Wis., which continued in session five days. It was a curious assemblage, and of it the following account is given by Rev. A Ranchenbush:—

"No less than fifteen different nationalities and languages were represented in this little band of brethren. One is a Norwegian, but speaks the English fluently, and some German; another is German, but speaks also the Norwegian and the English; another is quite as much a Hollander as a German; a fourth speaks both the German and the French fluently, and has preached in both these languages; a fifth speaks the English nearly as well as his German mother tongue; two speak only German and a little English. The deliberations were all conducted in German, as this was understood by all.

"Each session was commenced with singing and prayer, and the morning sessions with the reading and exposition of a chapter from the Bible, having reference to personal efforts for the salvation of men. After this, one or two would relate how they had been led to Christ, and then a number of themes were taken up, one by one, concerning the various duties and relations of the colporteur. This exercise was so much the more necessary, as all the brethren, with only one exception, were new men, who have been in the field only from three to ten months."

THE STANDARDS OF ORTHODOXY.—Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, of Brooklyn, has been pretty severely censured, and his orthodoxy called in question, by such papers as the Puritan Recorder, N. Y. Observer, and Christian Observer, because he favored the admission of the Universalist Sunday-Schools to a participation in certain festivities thrown open to the "orthodox" of Brooklyn. In an article upon the subject in the Independent he makes the following allusion to the standards of "orthodoxy:"—

"But what earthly motive can an American clergyman have to pretend to be Orthodox, if he is not so? Do Orthodox sects treat each other with any such profitable tenderness as to make it a man's interest to dwell among them with feigned opinions? In fact, the Orthodox sects are a vast compound threshing machine, flailing away at each other as if the chief end of man was to thresh his neighbors. I have never yet seen an acknowledged Orthodox man. Every body is Orthodox as compared with those below him; and no body is Orthodox, compared with those above him; and Orthodox reputations, like country bank-bills, circulate only in a narrow circle, very near home. If one is Orthodox in Hartford, he is a heretic in New Haven; if he is sound at New Haven, he is too loose for Andover; if he is up to the mark at Andover, he is yet hopelessly below East Windsor; if he climbs up the toilsome cliffs to the eyrie of East Windsor, it is only to bring himself within the reach of the Princeton Orthodoxy; and when yet climbing up, out of sight of all sublunary things, he sits down on these pinnacles of Old School Presbyterian Princeton Orthodoxy, and divides his time between Turretin and efforts at breathing on such thin-aired august heights, then, down comes the good old-fashioned Scotch Presbyterian Orthodoxy, carrying him away at one swoop, to be devoured in a yet higher eagle's nest. In fact, it is a very hard thing to be Orthodox. It is a thing of degrees; it is a question of the scale; and beginning at zero, all the degrees above pelt all the degrees below. Now, if a preacher is heterodox he is but suspected, and shampooed, and flailed; and he gets that if he is orthodox. So that, if a man's convictions do not keep him among the orthodox, he is a fool who stays. The company is no great things."

INCIDENTS AT SEA.—Rev. J. P. Thompson, pastor of the Tabernacle Congregational Church in New York, is now journeying for the benefit of his health. A long letter from him, giving some account of his voyage from New York to Liverpool, appears in the last number of the Independent, from which we clip the following paragraph:—

"Early one morning I was summoned to baptize a child, supposed to be dying. Its parents were members of the Church of England, and I baptized it according to the rites of that Church. It would have edified Dr. Pusey himself to have heard me read that service, with certain omissions for conscience-sake. A few days afterward I read the burial service, and committed its body to the deep. Just before we reached Liverpool an old man in the steerage died suddenly of apoplexy. I had talked with him the Sabbath previous, and had found him to be a Christian. He was almost immediately thrown overboard in a loaded sack, without any religious service—it not being usual on the ship to have such service for the steerage passengers, on account of their diversities of belief and frequent religious contentions! Sad and sorrowful was such a disposition of a body, dear no doubt to many. God grant me to rest by the side of those whom he has called before me; yet, blessed be his name, He hath promised that the sea shall give up the dead that are in it. He will not forget his children, though they lie many fathoms deep beneath the cold rolling wave."

WORKING OF THE LIQUOR LAW.—A gentleman now recreating at Newport, R. I., writes from the Ocean Hotel to a friend in New York as follows:—

"The Maine Law at this house, which is the largest and most fashionable here, is not regarded in the least. They sell liquor in a bar in the basement, and furnish wines for dinner, and there is a large quantity drank. I understand that they do the same at the other hotels. There is very little sold in grog shops and groceries. I have seen but two drunken men since I have been here, some five weeks, and one of them was a Colonel from New York. I have reason to believe there is not now one half the liquor sold there was before the law was passed."

"I was at Fall River and New Bedford. In Massachusetts generally the trade is entirely broken up and suppressed. In both the cities I referred to, I did not hear or see or smell rum. There is very little drank there excepting by snobs who are strangers."

REVIVALS IN WESTERN NEW YORK.—The Baptist Register mentions several interesting revivals in Niagara and Orleans Associations since March 1st. In Wilson, under the care of J. H. Morrison, about forty have been baptized. In Newfane, under the care of T. Fuller, some over sixty have been baptized. In Hartland, G. W. Walker, pastor, eighty-four have been baptized. In Yates, A. Haskell, pastor, thirty-seven baptized. In East Carlton, H. G. Mosher, pastor, some fifteen baptized. In Albion, Br. Illsley's church, eleven baptized. Medina, Br. Reed's church, eight baptized. Br. D. Moore, of Murray and Gaines church, has recently baptized several. The above includes only those who have been baptized. In most of these places, numbers have joined other denominations."

A FRENCH FESTIVAL.—A letter from Paris, dated August 5th, says that "preparations for the solemn desecretion of the Lord's Day, on the 15th, are being made on a vast scale. In the morning, the saint of the day will hear Mass and Te Deum; in the evening, all the theaters will be thrown open gratuitously to the people; and as these are too small to contain those who are willing to attend, vast theaters are to be established in the open air, in several places of the city, for the enjoyment of the public. During the day, military displays, races on land or water, &c., &c., will occupy the time. When night comes, splendid illuminations, magnificent fireworks, in which the imperial crown, the eagle, and the crowned N., will occupy a large place, are to close that day of profaneness, vainglory, and folly."

TEMPERANCE AMONG SEAMEN.—The friends of Temperance in the Seamen's Retreat on Staten Island, near New York, organized a Society last November, and have maintained weekly meetings ever since, the Superintendent and Chaplain taking a leading part in the movement. About six hundred of the seamen there enduring the pangs of disease have taken the Pledge, of whom at least two-thirds have nobly adhered to it, the residue having been enticed back into their old tippling habits by vicious associates and rum-selling boarding-house keepers, who so often fatten on the frailties of Poor Jack.

"HE WAS BORN THERE."—An exchange says that Somerset County, N. J., is noted as the birth-place of 28 ministers of the gospel, now in the service of the Dutch Reformed Church; five others became residents of the same county in early childhood; four more are the sons of parents of that county, until near the nativity of their offspring; and besides, this same county has furnished "honorable woman not a few," to very many clergymen of different denominations.

WHAT IS WANTED.—Speaking of the wants of the church just at the present time, the Congregationalist says:—

"Men, the right men, more than all things else, are needed, to build up our churches and save souls—not men who seek large and rich churches, cultivated society, or large salaries; but such as can find their reward in saving souls by the simple preaching of Christ and him crucified."

LITERARY INSTITUTIONS OF TEXAS.—The following list shows the locations of the literary institutions of the several religious denominations of Texas:—Methodists, at Rutersville and Marshall; Presbyterians (O. S.) at Huntsville, Goliad and Fredonia; Episcopalians at Anderson and Cumberland; Presbyterians at Dangerfield.

SAILING OF MISSIONARIES.—A Mr. Smith and wife, Free-will Baptist Missionaries to India, sailed from Boston on the 19th of August, in the ship Rose Standish. Rev. Mr. Williams, a missionary of the Presbyterian Church, appointed to labor in Northern India, sailed in the same vessel.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.—Excursion tickets for those coming by the New York and Erie Railroad to our Anniversaries at Plainfield, N. J., can be obtained at Deposit, Alfred, Andover, Friendship, and Dunkirk—good from the 5th to the 25th of September. Excursion tickets from New York to Plainfield can be obtained only at the office of the Sabbath Recorder.

CARSON ON PROVIDENCE.—Edward H. Fletcher, New York, has published a neat duodecimo of 356 pages, entitled "HISTORY OF PROVIDENCE, as manifested in Scripture; or, Facts from Scripture illustrative of the Government of God. By Alexander Carson, LL. D." In this volume, the author brings together and comments upon a great many passages of Scripture going to show that all physical laws have their effect from the immediate agency of Almighty Power, and that God is now working in his Providence as truly as he wrought in his works of creation—very comforting and wholesome doctrine to every pious mind.

"THE MASTER BUILDER; or, Life at a Trade," by Day Kellogg Lee, author of "Summerfield, or Life on a Farm," published by Redfield, Clinton Hall, New York. A neatly-printed volume of over 300 pages, in which the author brings out a character designed—and adapted—to inspire the reader with respect for every honorable calling, and encourage him to rise to a noble and enlightened life.

"The boy that some proud idiot spurns,
With a celestial spirit burns,
And he with blistered feet may go
Where passed the high Palladio;
And with those little hands, in time,
Build temples that will stand sublime,
And show the radiant fame he rears,
And shelter it a thousand years."

THE YOUTH'S CABINET for September contains a great variety of well-arranged matter for the little folks. Its editor, Rev. F. C. Woodworth, is expected home in a week from his six-months tour of Europe.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, AUG. 23.

The SENATE spent the whole day in discussing an amendment to the River and Harbor Bill, proposed by Mr. Douglass, authorizing the States to levy tunnage duties in order to improve rivers and harbors on their own account. The measure was finally voted down, and the Bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate.

The HOUSE passed a resolution requiring the Speaker to appoint a Committee of Five for the purpose of investigating the relation of Secretary Corwin to the Gardiner claim. The regular appropriations for ocean steamer mail contracts were passed. A bill was passed for the relief of Margaret L. Worth; 10,000 copies of the proceedings of both Houses on occasion of the death of Henry Clay were ordered; and the Light-House Appropriation bill was taken up, when Mr. Evans made a speech against the continuance of the present system; after which the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, AUG. 24.

The SENATE spent the morning in talking about the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill, Mr. Clark occupying considerable time in opposition to an increase of salary for the Commissioner to China. The River and Harbor bill was then taken up, the amendments made in Committee concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed by a vote of 31 to 17.

In the HOUSE, the day was occupied in personal altercations, in which Mr. Polk, Gen. Cullom, and Addison White, were prominent.

FOURTH-DAY, AUG. 25.

The SENATE passed the Bill for the election of a public printer, and the River and Harbor Bill, agreed to the amendments to the Post Route Bill, referred to the Committee on Commerce the House amendments to the Steamboat Bill, and made some progress on the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

In the HOUSE, the Steamboat bill, after more than a hundred and fifty amendments, proposed by the Committee on Commerce, had been adopted without debate, and the rejection of a substitute proposed by Mr. Bowne, passed by a vote of 147 to 27. The rules were suspended in order to take up the Saut Canal bill, which, after some ineffectual opposition, passed by a vote of 115 Yeas to 48 Nays. The Light-House Appropriation bill occupied the remainder of the session.

FIFTH-DAY, AUG. 26.

In the SENATE, the Post Route bill was passed, and after some other business the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill came up. Mr. Bright moved an amendment, that the Assistant Postmasters General be appointed in future with the advice and consent of the Senate, and that the salaries be fixed at $3,000 each. The amendment to compensate the Spanish Consul, &c., ($20,000) at New Orleans, was agreed to, and also various other amendments. The Committee reported another amendment for the recompense of Ministerial Officers in the service of the United States, when they incur extraordinary expenses in the prosecution of their duties, to which Mr. Sumner moved to add: "Provided that no such allowance shall be made for expenses under the act of September, 1850, known as the Fugitive Slave act, which act is hereby repealed." In support of his motion, Mr. S. made the speech on the Fugitive Slave Law which on a recent occasion was refused a hearing. Considerable debate followed, after which the proviso was rejected, it having received but four votes. The amendment proposed by the Committee was agreed to.

The HOUSE passed the Light-House Appropriation bill, and several bills of minor importance. The latter part of the session was spent in discussing the Indian Appropriation Bill. The amendment appropriating $690,000 to carry into effect the treaty with the Sioux of the Mississippi, was concurred in, together with others.

SIXTH-DAY, AUG. 27.

In the SENATE, the Florida contested election case was taken up, and Mr. Yulee consumed a large portion of the time of the session in a speech in favor of his claim to the seat. The resolution reported by the Committee in his favor, was finally adopted by a vote of 41 to 9. The Civil and Diplomatic Bill was then taken up. The immediate question was upon the amendment, to pay Texas the $5,000,000 hitherto reserved for her creditors, which was withdrawn by Mr. Mason. Mr. Ritchie's demand for compensation for alledged losses in doing Congressional printing, occupied the time of the Senate until late in the evening. In the end, the Senate fixed upon $50,000. The House amendments to the Postage Bill were agreed to.

The HOUSE accepted the Senate's amendments to the act reducing and modifying the rates of postage. A bill relating to the transport of landed merchandize through certain routes of Texas and New Mexico, was passed. The Indian Appropriation Bill was considered a while, and then the House went into an election of public printer, which resulted in favor of Mr. Armstrong.

SABBATH-DAY, AUG. 28.

In the SENATE, the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill was taken up, and all the amendments made to it in Committee of the Whole were agreed to. The bill then passed and went to the House. A message was received from the President in relation to the Lobos Islands, and transmitting documents. Mr. Armstrong was elected Printer on the part of the Senate, having 35 of 45 votes. All the House amendments to the Senate amendments, save three, to the Indian Appropriation bill, were adopted, and a Committee of Conference appointed in relation to those. Mr. Davis' Steamboat bill caused some debate, and finally all the hundred and fifty amendments of the House were concurred in. The Army Appropriation bill then came up. $30,000 were appropriated to purchase camels for the army, and some other amendments were made. Bills in relation to the Post-Office and Ocean Postage passed, and the Naval Appropriation bill was before the Senate when that body adjourned.

In the HOUSE, an ineffectual attempt was made to do something about a Mint in New York. The River and Harbor bill then came up, and the Senate amendments was concurred in. The Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill came up [illegible] ments, and led to a Congressional "scene," which was settled by voting to non-concur, and to appoint a Committee of Conference. Some other matters of less importance came up, and the House adjourned.

European News.

The steamer Asia, with European news to Aug. 14th, arrived at New York on the 25th.

The most interesting item in the news brought by the Asia is the report that Thos. Baring, the head of the house of Barings, is to be sent to this country as a special minister to settle the fishery question. He is a brother of Lord Ashburton.

There have been severe thunder-storms in various parts of England causing, the loss of some six or eight lives. Heavy gales have prevailed along the south and west coasts, but no serious accident to the shipping is recorded.

A public meeting of Merchants, Bankers, and others, has been held in London, to take measures for the relief of the sufferers by the great fire at Montreal. The Lord Mayor presided. Many of the gentlemen present put down their names for sums varying from £10 to £200, and subscription books are open at all the banking houses.

Considerable uneasiness is felt by the French Government from the circumstance that large numbers of French refugees are assembling in Jersey and the other Channel Islands. The Union says that the organization of Secret Societies in France is again extensive, and that the fact is not unknown to the Government.

Twenty-five Arabs, fellow-prisoners of Abd el Kadir, have been set at liberty and will be sent to Algeria. About 40 prisoners now remain in confinement with the Emir.

Cholera is committing ravages in the Posen districts, bordering upon the Polish frontier, near Kalisch. At Ostrowo, Pleschen, Kroloschin and Przggodice, the deaths are numerous.

The King and Queen of Spain have had a quarrel, growing out of the jealousy of the former.

A letter from Portugal says: This season, which promised to be one of plenty, will, it is feared, prove to be one of scarcity. There has been no summer, but a succession of foggy and rainy days, extremely injurious to the crops.

A Sad Story.

Miss Ida Williams, a young English lady of twenty years, called at our office yesterday, (says the Detroit Democrat,) to give us the particulars of her sad losses by the steamer Atlantic. Miss Williams is a lady-like and interesting person, and narrated the few simple, but touching, details with great propriety and modesty. She had just arrived in this country from England, and was traveling westward with a view to select a location for a future residence, in company with a twin-brother, a married sister, a brother-in-law, and two nieces, all of whom were lost. She states that the last recollection she has of anything which took place on the Atlantic, she was standing in company with her friends on the deck, when a beam or piece of wood fell and killed her brother, and hitting her also in its fall, injured her back, when she fainted. She had no consciousness of anything which took place afterward, until she found herself on board the propeller, on her way to Erie, without clothing, except her night dress, without money, and without a friend on this side the broad Atlantic—her friends were all lost! Without knowing where to turn for succor, she took passage on board a Detroit boat, and reached that city, where her immediate wants were supplied, and where she has been kindly offered a home in the family of a highly respectable and hospitable resident of Detroit.

New Hotel.

The Metropolitan Hotel, built by P. S. Van Rensselaer, Esq, on the site of Niblo's Garden, New York, under the supervision and for the tenancy of the Messrs. Lelands, late of Clinton Hotel, will open on Wednesday, Sept. 1st.

This Hotel extends three hundred feet on Broadway and two hundred on Prince-st., is built of brown stone, six stories high, but three-fourths of the first-story is surrendered to stores, leaving only seventy-five feet in the center for a spacious office, baggage-room, &c., with two reception rooms for guests (one of them for ladies) who have just arrived and are waiting for rooms to be assigned to them. The house has five entrances, two of them for ladies and their attendants, two for servants, besides the main entrance from Broadway. It has three dining-rooms besides the servants'—that for ladies being calculated to seat two hundred and fifty persons, amid every appliance for the satisfaction of the palate. The third dining-room is for children and nurses. The Public Parlors are near these, supplied with every fitting auxiliary to comfort and elegance. The private suites of rooms on this floor include parlor, one, two or more bed-rooms, bath, dressing-room, store-room, &c., and are superb in all their appointments, as they well may be, since the most eligible are charged from $75 to $100 per suite per week, and are eagerly taken up at those rates. Thence to the uppermost story the rooms diminish in size and expense, those in the sixth story being let at $2 per week. The price of board is uniformly $7 per week, and of board and lodging to transient guests who do not require extra accommodations is $2 per day. One dazzling suite of rooms is fitted up for bridal parties. The furniture is all of solid oak, thoroughly polished; the beds are all Spring and Hair Mattresses; all of the suites and some of the single chambers have private baths, store-rooms, closets, &c., while the cheaper single rooms have wardrobes, Croton water, &c., with baths, closets, &c., immediately at hand. The house is lighted by gas and heated by steam throughout, though any guest may have a coal-fire in his own room if he sees fit—the steam-heat being diffused through the halls. Ample provision is made for Ventilation everywhere. One wing of the house is devoted to Families and Ladies; the other to bachelors or gentlemen transiently in town. No lady need see or be seen by half a dozen persons out of her own set in the course of a winter unless she chooses to be.

The numbered rooms are 353, of which perhaps 100 are Parlors and 250 Bed-Rooms, though many are both. The house is calculated to entertain in perfection about five hundred guests, though one thousand, including servants, might be comfortably lodged under its roof. The Metropolitan will be opened to the public on Wednesday, Sept. 1st, and already a great portion of its rooms are engaged, though its books have been opened but a few days. Some idea of its extent and thoroughness of appointment may be gathered from the fact that its Glass alone cost $37,000, and its Plumbing over $70,000.

AN ILLUSTRATION OF SLAVERY.—Under the head of "The True Plan," the Richmond Republican publishes the following facts, and commends the course pursued by the slave-overseer:—

Some few days since, an overseer on one of the large river plantations below this city, where hundreds of negroes are constantly employed, was met by a negro man in a ravine, on the outskirts of the plantation, beaten in a most cruel manner, without cause or provocation, and would have been thrown into a deep marl pit close by and instantly killed, but for the timely aid rendered by an old negro, who came to the rescue of his manager and saved his life. The whole affair transpired within full view of a number of the negroes, who during the fight were consequently ordered to his relief by the overseer, but not one of whom budged a peg. Here was a crisis to be promptly met and overcome, for if conquered by one of the slaves, and the others permitted to disobey the orders of their overseer with impunity, he felt that his life was always in peril, and his service of no value to his employer. But he was not the man to submit to such treatment, or to throw up his command, so he repaired instantly to his house, and arming himself for another conflict, returned to the scene of his late defeat, where, finding the head man on the farm, the negro who had beat him, and a number of others together, he ordered the head man to seize the rebel. The fellow refused to obey the order, when he was instantly shot down in his tracks. A second man was ordered to lay hold of the fighting negro, but failing to do so, was fired upon and fell. A third one shared the same fate as the first two, and a fourth one would have been similarly treated, had he not obeyed the command of his superior with alacrity, and with the aid of other fellow servants harnessed up the belligerent to be appropriately dealt with.

THE SLAVE-HOLDERS WAKING UP.—The Southern Central Agricultural Society of Georgia has issued an address, inviting the cultivators of the soil, in every section and district of the State, to send delegates to Macon, on the 20th day of October next, for the purpose of adopting measures preliminary to the assembling of an Agricultural Congress of the slaveholding States, at such time and place as may be deemed most acceptable to the States to be represented in it. The chief objects of the Congress are set forth as follows:—

"To improve the present system of agriculture; to develop the resources and combine the energies of the slaveholding States, so as to increase their wealth, power and dignity as members of the confederacy; to fortify a public opinion within the borders of the slaveholding States in antagonism to that without; to enforce the growing sentiment that the children of the South shall be reared and educated at home instead of abroad; to foster scientific pursuits, promote the mechanic arts, and aid in establishing a system of common schools; to assist in bringing the South in direct commercial intercourse with distant countries; and to cultivate the aptitudes of the negro race for civilization, and consequently Christianity—so that, by the time that slavery shall have fulfilled its beneficent mission in these States, a system may be authorized by the social condition of that race here, to relieve it from its present servitude, without sinking it to the condition of the free negroes of the North and the West Indies."

TRIBUTE TO PRINTERS.—In a letter addressed to the Printers of Baltimore, in reply to an invitation to be present at a grand banquet given to the members of the National Convention of Printers, held recently in that city, Governor Lowe, of Maryland, wrote the following:—

"Without wishing to draw invidious distinctions, I may be permitted to say, that if there is one class of men who claim my regard and admiration more than another, it is that large, intelligent, industrious, and most valuable, but often least appreciated class, the Printers. Day and night, winter and summer, they toil, quietly, patiently, incessantly—and for what? Not to make food and raiment for the body—not to add merely to the material comforts of our fellow men—but to disseminate truth and knowledge—to enlighten the public mind of a nation whose duty and destiny is self-government—and more than all to sow the seed of liberty in foreign soils, where the blood of the Patriots may germinate it into fruitfulness. Senates and Cabinets have learned wisdom from the praise-worthy Printer, and nations are indebted to him for much of all they enjoy. Allow me to offer the following sentiment. The Press: The Archimedean lever which can move the earth."

GREAT FLOOD AT THE NORTH-WEST.—The Selkirk Settlement was visited on the 2d of May with a flood as great and sweeping as one that fell twenty-six years ago. It lasted this time from the 2d of May to the 25th, when it began to recede. A letter, received but a few days since at St. Pauls, Minnesota, describes the spectacle which was there witnessed:—

"Twenty-two miles in length of the colony are now under water. For a distance of four miles the water has spread over the plain for six miles on each side of the river, and in all that distance not a house has escaped. Loaded boats may be seen sailing on far beyond the habitations. The sight is as melancholy as it is novel. Of the population, 3,500 have had to fly before the torrent, and abandon all. The loss of property already is estimated at £150,000 sterling."

Horses, cattle, houses, barns, crops, all were comparatively swept off, and the colony is almost ruined. The labor of twenty-six years is all gone.

WONDERFUL ESCAPE.—Lothrop Smith, of New Orleans, a few days since, while on a visit to the White Mountains, made a misstep over the precipice, near the Flume House, into the abyss below. He fell into the pool. By great presence of mind, though the water was icy cold, and he was encumbered with his clothes, he made his escape by swimming to a crag of the rock on a level with the water. Here, we are told, he was lodged forty feet beneath the distance from which he fell. There was no means of ascent except by ropes, which were procured by friends who were with him at the time of the fall. He fastened a rope around his body, and was raised aloft, drenched and bruised, but the only human thing, we presume, that ever came from the pool alive after such a fall. [N. Y. Express.

SUMMARY.

A large silver medal was found some weeks ago by Mr. Churchill, of Columbus, Iowa, upon the banks of the Mississippi, in Alamakee County. Its weight is upward of five ounces. It has on one side the likeness of John Quincy Adams, with the words "John Quincy Adams, President of the United States, 1852," on the rim; and the other, the words "Peace and Friendship," with the tomahawk and pipe of peace crossed, and the clasped hands. The medal was some four or five feet under the surface, and near it were found the skeleton of an Indian chief, the remains of a dog, a gun, and a box in which there were thirty-six dollars silver coin.

A London correspondent of the Inverness Courier, in describing what he saw at the Opera, writes thus: "Of Jenny Lind, too, I had that evening a glimpse. She is a wreck of her former self; I could hardly have recognized her. She looks pale, worn and haggard, in bad spirits and bad health; and as she sat, the center of a hundred opera-glasses directed upon her, there was but one wondering and sympathizing murmur throughout the vast building."

The first seizure of Liquor in Boston, under the new law, was made Thursday, Aug. 26, when Patrick Keenan and John McLaughlin, grocers, were arrested for selling it. The former was fined $20 and costs, and the latter's case was postponed. By order of the Court, the liquor, embracing various kinds, of no great value, was emptied into the sewer in Court-square—a large crowd quietly looking on. Moses Williams, one of the wealthiest wholesale liquor dealers in the city, has been complained of.

Isaac W. Lewis, of Bridgeport, Ct., returned from California, by the last steamer, apparently in good health, but on getting out of the cars at B., he appeared very feeble, and died in the station house, before seeing family or friends. A Mr. Stone, of Litchfield, Ct., came home with $15,000 in gold, and in tolerable health, but became suddenly weak, and died in four or five days.

Experiments have been made by some of the London physicians, for curing diseases of the lungs by breathing medical vapors. So successful have been these experiments, that a hospital has been built for the cure of bronchitis and consumption; and it is paid that 75 of every 100 admitted into it have been cured.

The celebration of the immense structure by which the Buffalo and New York City Railroad crosses the Genesee River near Portageville, took place on Wednesday, Aug. 25. Some ten thousand persons assembled and took part in the festivities of the occasion. An excellent dinner was provided by the Company, which probably some 3,000 persons assisted in demolishing.

A man named Samuel H. Klapp has been arrested at Philadelphia, charged with fraudulently obtaining $1,460, in gold coin, from the United States Mint. On his return from California, several months since, he deposited gold dust of the value of $500 in the Mint, and when he sent for his certificate the clerk, by mistake, gave him the certificate of another depositor for $1,460, which Klapp retained, and refused to give up when applied to.

James Wool, another of the heroes of the Revolution, died on Wednesday, near Troy, on the farm where his father lived and died. In 1776 the family were compelled to flee from their home and seek safety for their women and children. This done, the men went forth to battle, and never laid down their arms till victory had crowned them.

The Macon (Ga.) Journal states that Ellen Craft, the fugitive slave, is now in London, having entered the service of an American gentleman, on the condition that he would restore her to her owner, Dr. Collins, in Macon.

The Collins line of steamers have crossed the Atlantic one hundred times, and nine thousand passengers have been taken across the ocean by this line without one losing a life or being injured.

Letters have been received from the Rev. Mr. Barnes, who is traveling in Europe for the benefit of his health. We regret to learn that he has yet obtained no relief of the affection in his eyes.

Two runaway slaves, named George Goode and Samuel Smith, have been caught at Petersburg. They had traveled from Alabama, by the aid of forged papers, and were on their way to the North.

We have intelligence of the sinking of the steamer Highland Mary, in the Missouri River. No lives were lost by the disaster. Her cargo was mostly saved.

Orders have been received at Norfolk to put in commission the iron steamer Allegany. She is destined for an exploration of the China Seas, under command of Capt. Ringgold.

The recent heavy rains near Charlottesville, Virginia, have almost entirely destroyed the tobacco crop, and caused great damage to other growing crops in that region.

The trotting horse Reindeer has been purchased by Mr. George W. Smith, for $1,075. This horse is of Western stock, and is said to trot a mile in 2.32.

Cassius M. Clay is very sick, of a fever which has recently carried off two of his children.

Mrs. General Taylor, relict of the late President, died at East Pascagoula, on Saturday night, Aug. 14.

The Philadelphia Inquirer learns, through Dr. Fahnestock, the attending physician, that Commodore Stewart was seized with an apoplectic attack, on Sunday morning, Aug. 24, at his farm, adjoining Bordentown, N. J., but that he has recovered his consciousness, and there is every reasonable prospect of speedy restoration.

From the same source, the Inquirer learns that Joshua Shaw, Esq., the eminent artist, who resides at Bordentown, sustained a paralytic attack some two weeks since, while engaged in preparations for a public sale of some of his best paintings, in this city, during the ensuing month, but which unfortunate occurrence will necessarily delay the sale until some time in October. Mr. Shaw is still confined to his chamber, but it is hoped that he may be able, in a short time, to attend to the arrangements necessary to carry out his design. He is now in the seventy-fifth year of his age, and but little more, if any thing, may be expected from his easel.

The Montreal Investigating Committee estimate the loss by the late fire at $2,000,000. It has been determined to apply to the Government for a loan of $800,000 to enable the poor proprietors of lots to rebuild, for the repayment of which the city, in its corporate capacity, will be responsible; the buildings to be either of stone or brick.

The Quebec Mercury relates the following: "Two carters, Langlois and Coté, who were at the Falls of Montmorenci on Thursday, with some strangers, being left by themselves for a few minutes, began wrestling for amusement, while standing upon the wooded platform covering the dalleau, which being rotten gave way, and the poor fellows falling into the water, were carried off and drowned.

Bostonians are having great times fishing. A shoal of mackerel recently entered the harbor, and passed round even into the Back Bay, and were to be caught from the wharves, bridges, &c. A few days since a person fishing on one of the Charleston bridges hooked a fish so heavy that he was forced to call a passenger to his assistance in pulling him out. It proved to be a bass, weighing 28 lbs.

The bark Matagorda arrived at Mobile, Aug. 19th, 42 days from Boston, having encountered head winds for a large portion of the passage. On Friday, the 20th July, the vessel was struck by lightning, while a short distance off Tortugas Island. The fluid passed down the mainmast into the cabin, killing Captain Purchase and his wife, and prostrating the mate.

Heinzen, the Editor of the Janus, in a lecture recently delivered at Cleveland on the Germans in America, in speaking of what the German immigrants should learn from the Americans, says that of the things they should not learn the chief are humbug, tobacco-chewing, and brandy-drinking.

The Clarksville (Texas) Northern Standard learns, on reliable authority from Portes's Bluff, that Capt. Stevens, together with his other officers, and 56 men, have been killed by the Camanches, about 40 miles from Fort Belknap. An express had been sent into Texas for reinforcements.

The New York and New Haven Railroad have made an arrangement with the Stonington Road by which a day line to Newport is formed. Passengers leave this City at 8 o'clock every morning.

Two young girls at Henderson, Ky., on Monday, Aug. 15, committed suicide by tying their hands together and walking out into the Ohio River, where they laid down and drowned themselves. The girls were sisters, aged 16 and 18. When found, they were locked in each other's arms. Cause, family difficulties.

Adams' Express Company had $50,000 in bank bills in their iron chest, which sunk in the Atlantic on Lake Erie. On Monday, Mr. Adams started for the lake, accompanied by Mons. Maillefert, to attempt to raise the steamer, which Mons. M. is confident he can do. She is sunk in 175 feet of water.

Forty-eight drinking-houses, it is said, were open in the Second Ward and forty-one in the First Ward of Williamsburgh on Sunday, notwithstanding they are not licensed, and the Common Council does not allow them to keep open on Sundays.

DIED,

In Petersburgh, N. Y., August 14th, Miss PHIDELIA E. MAXSON, daughter of Daniel and Susan Maxson, aged 21 years. She made a profession of religion in early life, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Petersburgh. In the first part of her sickness, she had considerable anxiety of mind, appeared deeply sensible that she had not been as faithful in the cause of Christ as she ought to have been, and manifested deep contrition in view of her past deficiencies. In the progress of her sickness, she obtained the evidence that God had forgiven her sins, could trust in Christ for salvation, and hoped to reign with him in glory.

In Lincklaen, N. Y., July 27th, very suddenly, of erysipelas in the face, originating from cancerous humor, Mr. WM. STILLMAN, aged 59 years. Bro. Stillman experienced religion when young, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Berlin, N. Y. He afterwards removed to Lincklaen, Chenango Co., and became a member of the Church in that place at its organization, and remained such until his death.

In Truxton, N. Y., July 16th, Mr. DAVID CARDNER, aged 64 years. He was a professor of religion, and died in hope of a blessed immortality beyond the grave.

In Brookfield, N. Y, Aug. 20th, Mr. PELEG LANGWORTHY, in the 77th year of his age.

In Brookfield, N. Y., Aug. 27th, of consumption, terminating in dropsy in the chest, RICHARD E. SAUNDERS, in the 26th year of his age.

Seventh-day Baptist Anniversaries.

THE Forty-fourth Session of the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference will be held at Plainfield, N. J., commencing on Fifth-day, September 9, 1852, at 11 o'clock A. M. James H. Cochran is appointed to preach the Introductory Discourse.

All the Churches are at liberty to communicate with the Conference, either directly or through the Associations to which they belong. Churches not connected with Associations, and societies of Sabbath-keepers not organized into churches, are especially requested to communicate their condition, with the changes that have taken place during the three years since the last session of the Conference, together with any other matters that they may deem of general interest. Letters may be addressed to the Corresponding Secretary, Geo. B. Utter, New York.

The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society is to hold its Tenth Annual Meeting at Plainfield, N. J., on First-day, Sept. 12.

The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society's Third Annual Meeting will be held at Plainfield, N. J., on Second-day, Sept. 13.

The Ninth Annual Meeting of the American Sabbath Tract Society will be held at Plainfield N. J., on Second-day, Sept. 13.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Miscellaneous.

A Plea for Eggs.

BY MRS. F. BOXER.

Be gentle to the new-laid egg,
For eggs are brittle things;
They cannot fly until they're hatched
And have a pair of wings;
If once you break the tender shell,
The wrong you can't redress—
The yolk and white will all run out,
And make a dreadful mess.

'T is but a little while, at best,
That hens have power to lay.
To-morrow eggs may addled be,
Although quite fresh to-day.
O! let the touch be very light
That takes them from the keg;
There is no hand whose cunning skill
Can mend a broken egg.

An Important will Case.

From the Albany Argus.

An important suit is now pending in the Supreme Court of the City of New York, involving the validity of several of the provisions of the will of Dr. Wm. Barthrop, late of Kinderhook, in the County of Columbia. The legal questions to be settled in the case are of great importance, and in the result of the suit the public have a direct interest; as upon that result depends the disposition of several hundred thousand dollars. The precise question is, whether the estate shall be devoted to objects of public charity, as the testator intended, or whether it shall be enjoyed by individuals, not of his kin, and to whom it was not in any event intended to be given. The brief history of the case is this:

Dr. William Barthrop, an Englishman, resided in Kinderhook, and pursued the practice of his profession as a physician for about forty years. He died in 1838, possessed of an estate valued at that time at about two hundred thousand dollars, consisting mostly of personal property. He left a widow, but no children, or other relative in the United States. His nearest relative living was Mrs. Mary Bonsor, of Nottingham, England. She was the mother of several children, the nephews and nieces of the testator.

Dr. Barthrop, prior to his death, made his will—the most important provisions of which are as follows: He gave his widow ten thousand dollars in cash, with various specific legacies, and the use of a house during life. To his sister, Mary Bonsor, he gave an annuity, and directed his executors to purchase a farm for six thousand dollars for his nephews and nieces, to be kept for them fifteen years, and then sold by the executors, and the proceeds divided among his nephews and nieces. All the residue and remainder of the estate was disposed of substantially as follows:

As soon as sufficient funds should be realized, the executors were directed to erect a public dispensary, on a plan similar to that in New York City, for indigent persons, to be attended by a physician, elected to the establishment, at their own houses, and also daily at the dispensary. Sufficient funds were directed to be set apart for the erection of the building and annual expenses. Although the place for the location of the dispensary is not named in the will, the testator evidently intended that it should be erected in Kinderhook, the place of his residence.

Before any money was to be appropriated to the erection of the dispensary, he gave his executors, or the survivors of them, $19,000 in trust, that if the executors were satisfied of their proper management, they should pay to the Society for the Benefit of Tailoresses and Seamstresses in the City of Philadelphia, and the Society for the Benefit of Tailoresses and Seamstresses in the City of New York, each $1,000 annually for five years after his death. To the Female Assistance Society, and the Society for the Relief of Respectable Aged and Indigent Females, and the Female Benevolent Society, all of the City of New York, each the sum of $500 annually for six years after his decease. But if the executors should be of opinion that any of these societies should not merit the legacies given them, by reason of mismanagement or other cause, then the money should be withheld, and the executors were directed to pay and apply the same to any other charitable societies, incorporated or not, which they should think deserving of the bequest.

The concluding clause of the will is in the following words: "And in the second place, after satisfying the provision in my will in regard to the Dispensary mentioned in my will or in the first codicil thereto, I give and bequeath all my estate then remaining, if any there shall be, to my executors in trust; they shall and may apply the same, in such sums, at such time and times as in their discretion they shall think fit and proper, to the Treasurer or other officer having the management of the pecuniary affairs of any one or more societies for the support of indigent respectable persons, especially females and orphans, and for the use of said society or societies, hereby intending to give my executors full discretionary power as to the disposition of the same, but so as that the same shall be applied to objects of charity."

Upon the decease of Dr. Barthrop, in 1838, the executors named in the will presented it to the Surrogate of the County of Columbia for probate and proof. The proof of the will was contested by Dr. John P. Beekman, of Kinderhook, a son of the widow of Dr. Barthrop by a former husband, on the ground of the incompetency of the testator. A long and spirited contest ensued, which resulted in the establishment of the will. All the executors named in the will (for reasons and considerations not necessary to be here stated) renounced the execution of the will on the day it was admitted to probate by the Surrogate. The widow of Dr. Barthrop then applied to the Surrogate for letters of administration upon the estate, with the will annexed, and had her son John P. Beekman joined with her in the administration. By this means the whole estate came into the hands of the present surviving administrator, Dr. John P. Beekman, who, having retained it for near fourteen years without executing the trusts created in the will, now comes into Court claiming that they are invalid.

The suit now pending is brought by John P. Beekman, as surviving administrator, &c., of Dr. Barthrop, against The People of the State of New York, Mary Bonsor, the sister of Dr. Barthrop, and her children, and the administrator of Mrs. Barthrop, the widow, who died in 1848.

The complaint alleges, among other things, that there was not in existence, at the death of the testator, any corporate institutions or societies, or any societies of the name, character or description of "The Society for the Benefit of Tailoresses and Seamstresses in the City of Philadelphia," or "The Society for the Benefit of Tailoresses and Seamstresses in the City of New York," to whom were given $1,000 for five years after the death of the testator.

It is then alleged, that the provisions of the will respecting the purchase of the farm for $6,000, for the benefit of the nephews and nieces of the testator—the provision for the establishment of a public dispensary—and the disposition of the residue and remainder of the estate in trust to the executors to pay and apply the same at their direction, for the benefit of one of more societies for the support of respectable indigent persons—"are indefinite and uncertain in their objects, invalid and unauthorized by law, and unlawfully suspend the absolute power of alienation of said estate," and are therefore void.

The residue of the estate in the hands of the administrator must now amount to over $300,000, the whole of which, if the will is valid, must be devoted to objects of charity. Many years ago this will was submitted to eminent counsel for their opinion as to the validity of the trusts created, and it was generally believed that they were valid. Among others, Hon. Ambrose L. Jordan, of New York, late Attorney-General, gave an elaborate written opinion, in which he held the trusts valid and capable of being enforced. His opinion is concurred in by many eminent lawyers.

A Visit to the Tunnel Machine.

Correspondence of the Springfield Republican.

NORTH ADAMS, Tuesday, Aug. 17, 1852.

Since I was last in this region, and visited the great machine for boring a hole through the Hoosac Mountain for the Troy and Boston Railroad, the machine has been set up, and an actual experiment made with encouraging results. Yesterday, I clambered over the mountain again, to learn of the precise progress of the wonderful experiment. We found the work suspended, on account of repairs and alterations; the cutters proved too frail to stand the quartz and flint found in the mica state, which forms the chief material of the rock; they were soon broken and rendered unfit for service. Now it is proposed to make them heavier and firmer, and then the work will be resumed. This will be in the course of a fortnight or three weeks time.

The great machine imposes strongly on the imagination, as now seen, all in position. It is a huge affair, massive, strong, and apparently perfect as a machine in all its parts. It is inclosed in a rough house, which is nearly as large as a common-sized two-story dwelling. Twenty-five cents admission fee is charged to see the monster—a petty exaction, which, however necessary it may seem to the proprietors to secure themselves from annoyance, or to "put money in their purses," dwarfs the great achievement of mechanism somewhat into one's conceptions of an elephant or monkey show.

Conceive of a huge iron windmill, with massive frames and supports, wheels within wheels, a central shaft as big as a barrel, and as long as a boa-constrictor, this shaft moving forward with a center drill five inches in diameter, as the wheel, 75 feet in circumference, with cutters distributed along its outer edge, moves around some five or six times a minute—conceive all this, if you can, and you have an idea of what the thing itself is. The cutters or knives are differently arranged from what I had supposed. Instead of thickly studding the circumference of the great wheel, they are placed only at intervals, and set out several feet in advance, like a sort of huge plough-share. They are made in the form of pulleys, and revolve as they come in contact with the rock. They are perhaps ten or twelve inches in diameter, and two sets of three each and two of two each were arranged upon the wheel, as it was originally set in operation. It is intended, however, to increase the number.

The experiment thus far made amounts to this: At the bottom of the face of the rock, the machine has cut in from three to four feet very smoothly and successfully, so far as represented, and as can be seen since the blasting has commenced. The depth diminishes as the rock ascends, and that part opposite the upper part of the wheel has not yet been touched by the machine. The face of the rock was not prepared perfectly perpendicular, or "plumb." So that the machine has not yet operated simultaneously throughout the entire circumference of its wheel. It cut from a 16th to an 8th of an inch at a revolution, and makes five or six revolutions in a minute, which more than meets the warrant of the builders. The core of the rock is blasted while the machine remains close by, but there is no apprehension that it will be essentially injured by the exploding masses of rock. The building over it suffers heavily with each explosion, however, and requires a corps of carpenters to keep it in order. After the machine gets its length into the rock, however, there will be another sort of a building over it, not made with hands, and requiring no repairs.

Improvement of the Dunghill Fowl.

Every one is aware of the fact that, generally speaking, the fowls kept by our farmers are small in size, and usually but indifferent layers. Neither their inferiority in size, nor their poor egg-laying qualities, is, however, to be attributed to the kind of the food they receive, (for farmers' fowls generally fare well,) nor to any want of attention; but to the fact that in very many cases the stock is never changed, or if changed at all, so seldom as to be productive of no good results. Thousands of miserable, weak-minded people, idiots and lunatics, attest the evil results of marriages between blood relations. If such be the consequences resulting from breeding in and in from the human family, will not the principle apply to fowls? Will not a stock of fowls degenerate from year to year, both in size and in other good qualities, if no additions from other varieties or from other premises are made? Look to the condition of the chickens usually known as "dunghill fowls," a variety more generally had than any other kind in the United States, and which, although now small and comparatively worthless, were doubtless at one time in every respect equal to those for which such enormous prices are now asked. Why this degeneracy? It is very easily understood. The idea of improving the breed of fowls rarely visits a farmer's mind, and in the multiplicity of duties resting upon him, he does not think it a matter of sufficient importance to change "crowers" with his neighbor, or to kill off his old ones and purchase new. But this is a great error, as I shall endeavor to prove by facts gathered from my own experience.

Several years since, convinced that by changing my plan of breeding chickens, I could very materially improve them in some very essential particulars, I purchased twenty of the finest dunghill chickens I could find—eighteen hens and two cocks—paying attention to size and form only, color being disregarded. The oldest chicken in the flock was not more than seven months. I purchased them in the fall of the year, provided comfortable quarters for them during the winter, fed them well, and received in return a fair supply of eggs.

From this flock I raised, during the ensuing summer, about two hundred chickens. The young cocks were either sent to market or served up for my own table. I did not retain a single one of them. The old ones were also disposed of, and an entire new supply of young cocks, of the best size and form I could find, purchased. The ensuing spring the same system was pursued, and I thought the progeny of the second year somewhat superior in size to their progenitors. Their laying qualities were certainly better. The year following, the cocks of the previous year were discarded, and their places filled with new ones. The two year old hens were also put aside, or retained merely for hatching. The third year I had the satisfaction of beholding the results I had anticipated.

My chickens were not only greatly improved in appearance, but I received nearly double the quantity of eggs from the same number of fowls. I still pursue this plan, and cannot but commend it to the attention of some of our farmers. My fowls are one half larger than formerly, and cost me no more feed or trouble than the smaller ones, and when sent to market they command a much better price.

I do not believe it necessary to change the cocks every year, although I have done it with advantage. Every second year would perhaps answer as well; but changed they should be by all means, if larger fowls are desired. [Cor. Pa. Farm Journal.

An Hour in the Car of a Balloon.

The following letter has been addressed to the editor of an English journal:—

SIR: Although numerous have been the descriptions given of the beauty and delights experienced in a balloon voyage, still, perhaps, the following account of my visit to the regions of space on Monday last, in Mr. Hampton's Erin-go-Bragh, from the Rosemary Branch, Islington, may prove not altogether uninteresting:

At 7¼ in the evening, every thing being in readiness, we took our seats in the car, viz: Mr. Hampton, Mr. Dean, and myself; and just as the signal was given to let go, Mr. Coxwell, in the Sylph, which started from the Eagle Tavern, passed directly over our heads, but was almost immediately afterwards lost sight of in a cloud. Being released from our earthly ties, we darted upward in pursuit of our rival; and it was not long before we followed his example, by entering the same cloud, and for some time remained in a considerable state of doubt as to whether he was above or below us, and although an aërial collision would have been a novelty, I doubt much if it would have been very agreeable.

We continued floating silently along in the midst of a dense mass of scud, when suddenly I perceived before us, in a thin white vapory cloud, a spectral looking balloon, with car, passengers, &c. "There's the Sylph," I instantly exclaimed, but Mr. Hampton knew better, for he sharply replied, "No, no, look, look! 'tis the reflection of ourselves, on the cloud;" and then saluting the specter aëronaut, by taking off his cap, and waving the flag, which compliment was as quickly returned, our ghostly companion melted into thin air, and was seen no more.

Immediately afterward, we emerged from the clouds into a glorious sunshine, and the gas, thus suddenly acted upon, changed color, from a dirty yellow to a state of perfect invisibility, at the same time rapidly expanding, which caused us to ascend with increased rapidity.

Such a sight as was now presented to our astonished gaze was, perhaps, never before witnessed for grandeur and magnificence; it is almost past the power of pen or pencil to depict with any degree of truthfulness the glory of that scene. To the westward there appeared to be a mighty range of gigantic mountains, covered with snow, piled one above another, in frightful confusion, and assuming the most fantastic shapes, which were constantly changing; there were huge domes, lofty spires, vast pyramids, giant castles, dashing against and finally annihilating each other, but only to take new forms. Above, in the clear blue sky, myriads of little pink and white fleecy clouds, floating gently on, like fairies or angels of another world; below, the vast city of the earth, with its thousand steeples, its countless streets, its bridges, its railways, its wide-stretching suburbs, and its noble river, winding like a silver thread far, far away into the rich verdant country. Up, up we go, and another change comes on; the mountain tops are burnished with the brightest gold; anon another change, the sun sinks near them, and they are on fire—yes, fierce volcanoes appear on every peak, and running lava runs down their snowy sides; and now the sun finally sinks to rest in the midst of streams of fire, shooting upward brighter than the flight of a million rockets. Again a change—the spell is broken, the magic of the scene is past; the fierce fires rage no more; domes, spires, castles, fade away, and nothing is left but the bright blue sky (even the little fairies and angels are gone,) and a mass of shapeless leaden clouds lazily floating far away beneath us.

During my travels, in various parts of the world, I have seen many strange and beautiful scenes. I was on one of the loftiest peaks of the Alps on the night of the memorable storm which passed over Switzerland, in the month of August, 1840; I have seen many a glorious sunset from the summit of Lebanon; the wild and strange appearance of the sky while traversing the burning deserts of Egypt; a moonlight night on the calm Mediterranean, amid the Grecian Isles; a tempest on the broad Atlantic; but never can I call to my recollection a scene of such surpassing grandeur, magnificence and sublimity as that which I witnessed from the car of that balloon; and I firmly believe, that had the most skeptical man, with regard to the existence of a Deity, been present, that scene, so awfully grand, would have done more to convince him that there is a Supreme Being than all the arguments and preaching his fellow man could bring forth.

Immediately after the setting of the sun, the gas became condensed, and we began rapidly to descend, and effected a safe landing in a meadow, near Enfield. The greatest hight we attained was about two miles, and the time we were up exactly an hour. J. G. MOON.

Borrowing Money.

We are often addressed (says the editor of the N. Y. Tribune,) by persons at a distance, who, reading in our Commercial Reports that Money is plenty in Wall-street at 4, 5 or 6 per cent., ask us to negotiate them loans at these or higher rates on Real Estate in Ohio, Michigan or Iowa, which they represent (we presume truly) as worth double or treble the sum they wish to borrow on it. And yet it is no more available in Wall-street than so much self-righteousness.

The loans made in Wall-street at 4 or 5 per cent. are demand Loans—that is to say: A. B. has several thousand dollars on hand (perhaps other men's money left with him for future or contingent use) which is not likely to be wanted for some months, though it may be called for to-morrow. In all, there are several Millions of such funds in Wall-street. The holders would like to have it earning something, but they must at all times be able to put their fingers on it at an hour's notice, as some creditor or depositor may call for it. Now there is another set of rich men, (perhaps in good part the same men who lent last year,) who want to use money in their business, and can give for it the most unboubted and immediately convertible security. For instance, one has $100,000 invested in United States or the very best State Stocks, which are his clear of debt, yet he is willing to make more if he can do it safely. He says, "I believe Erie (or Harlem, or Hudson River, or some other) Railroad Stock must soon rise; so I will risk half I am worth upon it." So he pledges half his own United States or State Stock for a loan of $50,000 in cash at 4 or 5 per cent. on call—that is, he must pay the loan when demanded, or the creditor may sell the stocks pledged for it and reimburse himself. With the $50,000 thus borrowed, he 'spreads himself' on the stock or stocks he believes destined to rise,—perhaps buying only to the extent of his means, and perhaps buying ten times that amount 'on time,' and only paying or depositing five to ten per cent. as a 'margin.' If the stock rises, as he anticipated, he makes largely; if it falls, he loses in proportion. But in any case, the lender of the $50,000 can get it back whenever he wants it, beyond a moral possibility; and this is why he lends it at so low a rate of interest.

There is no such thing as borrowing here at 4, 5, 6, 7, or even ten per cent. on distant Real Estate—at least we know not where or how it may be done. Loans on City property are daily negotiated at 6 to 7 per cent., but on no other. The same men who lend at 4 or 5 per cent. as above, probably would not lend at twenty per cent. on Illinois lands—nor at any rate. They need to know, first, that their security is ample; then that they may obtain their money back the very hour they want it, no matter though the borrower be a knave and a bankrupt.

European Railroads.

A correspondent of the Salem Gazette, after commenting upon the frequent railroad accidents in this country, gives the following account of regulations to prevent them on European roads:—

"In the first place, every part of the road is guarded by watchmen, who stand so close together that they have each other in sight, whose duty it is to keep the track clear of obstruction. Every such watchman [bahnwarther] has a house on the road, where he lives with his family. They communicate with the depots by telegraph, which is a pole about fifty feet high, with arms, of which the different positions give the required signal. All the crossings are provided with gates, and a watchman has to close it about five minutes before the train arrives, and as soon as the gate is closed foot passengers and vehicles have to wait until the train has passed. On the top of the first car of each and every train is a watchman placed, who is to look out that all goes in safety; he communicates immediately with the engineer, and causes the train to stop when there is any danger in view; he also has under his control a brake. Every car is kept under account how many miles it runs, and, after having run 5,000 miles, is put under a thorough examination. Every engineer must be by trade a machinist, and, besides this, he must serve one year and a half apprentice on a locomotive in operation, and, if he proves a skillful engineer, he is then placed into responsible service, with minute instruction as to his duty, and any transgression of this instruction is fined, and the punishment is a great deal heavier when an accident has happened, caused by his carelessness. No foot passengers are allowed to travel on railroads."

The Use of Fruit.

Instead of standing in any fear of a generous consumption of ripe fruits, we regard them as positively conductive to health. The very maladies commonly assumed to have their origin in the free use of apples, peaches, cherries, melons and wild berries, have been quite as prevalent, if not equally destructive, in seasons of scarcity. There are so many erroneous notions entertained of the bad effects of fruit, that it is quite time a counteracting impression should be promulgated, having its foundation in common sense, and based on the common observation of the intelligent. We have no patience in reading the endless rules to be observed in this particular department of physical comfort. No one, we imagine, ever lived longer, or freer from the paroxysms of disease, by discarding the delicious fruits of the land in which he finds a home. On the contrary, they are necessary to the preservation of health, and are therefore caused to make their appearance at the very time when the condition of the body, operated upon by deteriorating causes not always understood, requires their grateful, renovating influence. Beautiful Mirage.

On Saturday last, says the Lake Superior Journal, while the steamer Baltimore was leaving Marquette Bay, we had the pleasure of seeing several remarkable exhibitions of mirage. The day was beautifully calm, and the slightly smoky atmosphere hung like a light blue veil over the land and the water. At first we noticed the low shores of the bay rising up like huge walls, soon the evergreen trees grew to the size of the tallest pines, and the beautiful hills to the west rose like high mountains against the sky. There were two peaks that might have been well taken for living volcanoes. The shores everywhere around this beautiful bay took a columnar shape, and the Palisades of the Hudson were more than equaled in grandeur by that we saw along the rocky cliffs of Presque Isle.

But the most interesting exhibition of this phenomenon was seen in the shape of a tower-like structure, that rose over one of the isolated rocks of the harbor. Sometimes it presented the appearance of a single column of immense proportions; sometimes it would take the shape of a magnificent gateway, or the last two standing columns of the wreck of some grand old temple. It seemed to stand far out in the lake alone, and with slight change in appearance it remained for three or four hours, being one of the most interesting optical ilusions we have ever witnessed on the lake.

The Battle of the Bees.

Galignani's Messenger says a curious circumstance occurred recently at Guilleville, in France. A small farmer had in a field about two hundred and fifty beehives, containing a vast number of bees. He sent a man with a cart, drawn by five horses, to remove some earth from the wall near which the hives were placed. The carter having occasion to go to the farm house, tied the horses to a tree. Almost immediately after, a multitude of bees, either irritated at the shaking of their hives by the removal of the earth from the wall, or excited by the electricity with which the atmosphere happened to be charged, issued from their hives, as if in obedience to a given signal, and with great fury attacked the horses. In an instant the poor animals were entirely covered with bees from head to foot; even their nostrils were filled with them. When the carter returned, he found one of his horses lying dead on the ground, and the others rolling about furiously. His cries attracted several persons; one of them attempted to drive away the bees, but they attacked him, and he had to plunge into a pond, and even to place his head under water for a few seconds in order to escape from them. The cure of Guilleville also attempted to approach the horses, but he too was put to flight by the enraged insects. At length two fire-engines were sent for, and by pumping on the bees a great number were killed on the horses or put to flight. The horses, however, were so much injured that they died in an hour. The value of the bees destroyed was about 1,500f., and of the horses 2,500f. A few days before, bees from the same hives killed seventeen goslings.

On Good Terms with Death.

In the Southern part of Tonquin, the highest compliment you can pay to a distinguished personage, and the dearest token of esteem for a revered friend, is the present of a coffin. A number of Catholic Priests, of native origin, joined in giving a coffin, as a New Year's present, to the Bishop of Laranda, who had instructed them in theology, saying that he was growing old, and they could never have a more suitable opportunity to offer him that necessary piece of furniture. At the same time they called his attention to the excellence of the wood and the beauty of the work. Such is the custom of the country; no person who has reached the age of fifty is without his coffin, which not only stands ready for its prospective use, but serves even now as a table by day and a bed by night. The children of a family in good circumstances will combine to offer handsome coffins to their father and mother, and pupils make the same present to a venerated teacher. Death there has no terrors. A poor widower, with young children, fell dangerously sick, and the first care of his friends was to borrow a coffin for him. When this was announced to the sufferer he trembled with joy, and asked to see the borrowed article: "Now," said he, "let me die, for if I live I shall have to return it, and who knows if I can ever procure another?" In the same spirit the friends of a dying person speak in his presence of his approaching end, and of the preparations for his funeral. The Bishop above referred to, says that one day he visited a chatechumen, whose malady, though likely to be prolonged, was sure to end fatally, and found a woman sitting by his bed-side making the mourning clothes for the family. At the door was the carpenter, engaged in making the coffin in sight of the patient, who directed the work with the utmost particularity.

—These particulars we gather from a letter of the good Bishop's, to a friend in France, published in the Journal des Debats. [Trib.

How to Get Rid of Cockroaches.

Mr. Tewksbury, of Nottingham, in a letter to the Manx Sun, says: "I forward an easy, clean and certain method of eradicating these insects from dwelling houses. A few years ago my house was infested with cockroaches, (or clocks as they are called here,) and I was recommended to try cucumber peelings as a remedy. I accordingly, before bedtime, strewed with the green peal the floor of those parts of the house most infested with the vermin, cut not very thin from the cucumber, and sat up half an hour later than usual to watch the effect. Before the expiration of that time the floor where the peal lay was completely covered with cockroaches, so much so, that the vegetable could not be seen, so voraciously were they engaged in sucking the poisonous moisture from it.

"I adopted the same plan the following night, but my visitors were not near so numerous; I should think not more than a fourth of the previous night. On the third night I did not see one; but anxious to ascertain whether the house was quite clear of them, I examined the peel after I had laid it down about half an hour, and perceived that it was covered with myriads of minute cockroaches, about the size of a flea. I therefore allowed the peel to lie till morning, and from that moment I have not seen a cockroach in the house; it is a very old building. I am certain that the above remedy only needs to be persevered in for two or three nights, to completely eradicate the pest; of course it should be fresh cucumber peel every night."

NEVER GET IN A PET.—A curious case is related by the Troy Budget, of a girl in that city losing her speech for a whole week! Being disobedient, and refusing to answer her mother, when spoken to, she found—after sitting dumpishly in the corner for about an hour, brooding over her bad conduct—that she was unable to utter or articulate a word! Her friends did not take particular notice of her for a couple of days, supposing she was keeping up her pet. Finally, she wrote down that she could not speak, when her friends became alarmed, and consulted several physicians. After a week had passed, she awoke one morning, and found herself again in speaking order.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, Teacher of Mathematics.

The Terms of 1852 and 1853 are as follows—

The first Term commences Wednesday, August 25; closes Tuesday, Nov. 30.

The second commences Thursday, Dec. 2; closes Tuesday, March 15.

The third commences Thursday, March 17; closes Tuesday, June 28.

There will be a recess of one day between the Terms, and of one week at the middle of the Winter Term.

Tuition must be arranged before entering classes, and, if less than a Term, paid strictly in advance.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Analysis, Composition, and Beginners in Algebra,	4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.,	5 00
Heating and Sweeping Halls, Ringing Bell, &c.	50

Extras.—Chemical Experiments, $1; Drawing, $1; Monochromatic Painting, $3; Oil Painting, $5; Writing and Stationery, 50 cents.

Board.—In private families, from $1 25 to $1 50 per week. In Clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

N. B.—Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the Common School Branches, with daily Lectures on "the Art of Teaching," the Laws of Health, School Laws, Chemistry, Physiology, &c. Tuition, $2 50. THOUGHTS ON EMIGRATION.

When I was a boy about fifteen years of age, the tide of emigration first began to move west and north, from Westerly, R. I., and towns adjacent, to the "new countries;" and many of our friends and relatives left us, and settled in a place called Hoosac, in Rensselaer County, N. Y., which was then "a howling wilderness," with but very little improvement on the land.

From the various reports we received from them, from time to time, of the super-excellence of their land, and its wonderful productions, I actually concluded that they had got on the borders of the land of Paradise, or the land "flowing with milk and honey;" and I earnestly persuaded my father to sell his poor little farm and follow them. At length, he so far conceded as to undertake a tour of observation, which I have no doubt he performed with his usual candor and foresight; but judge of my disappointment, when he returned with an evil report of the goodly land, or, in other words, he could not discover any prospect of adding to the comforts of his life or those of his family by removing into the wilderness.

But a few years soon passed away, when I found myself at liberty to choose my own course of life. I now, as I had previously contemplated, made my arrangements to bid adieu to my "fader-land," and having furnished myself with a horse, and a little of the needful, on new-year's day I left home, as I thought, for the land of promise.

Nothing could exceed my disappointment, however, on meeting with my old friends at Hoosac. In them I recognized the same unchanged human beings; and, as it appeared to me, doomed to a much worse state of labor and privation than before their emigration; or, in other words, they had lost instead of gaining by their removal from Rhode Island. To me, who had never seen a mountain larger than Lantern Hill, the appearance of the country was awful in the extreme. Although I had been used to hear it spoken of as a mountainous country, yet my imagination did not reach one-fourth of the reality, Yet, great and lofty as the mountains were, I found some of my friends on the summit of them. One of my uncles, who was one of the pioneers or first settlers, (and, one might suppose, had his choice of the land,) was so high up that it was more than an hour after I began to ascend the mountain before I reached his habitation, and a part of the way was so steep that I dismounted and led my horse. But then I found him quite comfortably situated, with his family, as respects the substantial comforts of life. His land, after reaching it, I found of a good productive quality, and he had been there long enough to get it in a tolerably good state of cultivation; and, being naturally very industrious, they found no difficulty in supplying the calls of nature with food and nourishment; but if they happened to raise a surplus, it was worth but little; the difficulty of getting to a market, and the expense attending it, would swallow up one half the amount of sales. Troy was the nearest market, which was twenty miles, and the road was so mountainous and rough, that it took two days to accomplish the journey, and then a span of horses could carry only about twelve or fourteen hundred weight without some extra help. My uncle had built him a small one-story frame house, quite comfortable while wood was abundant. Most of my other friends were content in their log houses. For a while I enjoyed myself very well on the top of the mountain with my cousins, especially as one of them, a young man near my own age, had a couple of first-rate fowling-pieces, and there were plenty of squirrels in the woods, numbers of which we had the satisfaction of having each day served up for dinner.

After spending three or four weeks in that region, viewing the wonders of creation, and enjoying the hospitality of my friends, I left them, and shaped my course for Leyden, in Massachusetts, where I had a sister living, with several other relatives, who had likewise strayed from Rhode Island, and I believe with but little better success. They were, however, in a very different country from the one I had left. It had been longer settled; the stumps had disappeared; and beautiful villages were to be seen springing up in place of the awful mountains. "Think 's I to myself," this looks a little more like living than Hoosac; but still there were no attractions sufficient to wean my attachment from my native place. The sleighing being excellent, my brother-in-law took me, with most of his family, and two or three select friends, on a very pleasant excursion, to see the country and its wonders, among which Springfield, with its Armory, which was then in its infancy, stood most conspicuous. Deerfield and Greenfield were pretty little villages, but not old enough to be of much consequence.

After spending several days here very agreeably, I turned my course towards home, where I arrived after an absence of nearly two months, perfectly satisfied with my tour, and that I could gain nothing by a removal to any of those places I had visited, as I had not met with a single person who I thought had gained anything by removal on the score of happiness or the enjoyments of life, though some of them, it is true, had increased their property by the rise in value of new lands. But where they had been the gainers in one point, they had been the losers in another. Some, with the increase of money, had imbibed a corresponding degree of pride and vanity, which led to discord and contention, and finally divisions in families, which in many cases have never been healed to the present day. Others, by a change of circumstances, have been induced to engage in business with which they were unacquainted, and of which they could not consequently foresee the results, and which accordingly has terminated fatally to health, life, and property. I met with several of my old friends, who, on account of the low price of grain, or the difficulty of getting it to market, had established whiskey mills or manufactories, and the consequences may be easily predicted, not in favor of a happy life. One of these men, a kind friend of mine, and a most respectable mechanic previously, soon became intemperate, and died at the age of about forty from the effects of the poison he was manufacturing for others. Another similar case came within the scope of my acquaintance. A very respectable man, who had been many years a preacher of the gospel, became badly entangled in the same snare, and for several years it was feared the same result would follow; but happily, through the prayers, tears, and entreaties of his family, brethren, and friends, he was restored, and lived several years a sober, exemplary man, and I hope died a happy man. Finally, I have no doubt that the inhabitants of Westerly, who remained at their posts, have enjoyed as great a share of happiness, or the comforts of life, as those who emigrated from thence, and much less of the sorrows and sufferings that usually attend the emigrants on their travels, especially when misfortunes or disappointments overtake them.

A volume might be written on the disappointed hopes and unexpected suffering by emigrants in pursuit of an easier or happier life, which they were never permitted to enjoy; but I will leave the task to some one better qualified, and close with one case more, with which I have been familiar, and which I think is a fair specimen or illustration of many others.

John Bliss, an uncle of the writer by marriage, and a son of Elder Wm. Bliss, of Newport, R. I., left that country an emigrant to Saratoga Co., N. Y., when it was a wilderness; and he purchased land sufficient for a farm in what is now the town of Greenfield, when there was neither road nor path to direct him to and from his purchase, and his only guide was the blazed trees. Possessing a remarkable constitution, his labors were unceasing, and his progress almost or quite without a parallel, till he had built himself a log house, and cleared land sufficient to commence the operation of farming and raising something towards a subsistence. He then returned for his wife, whom he had married and left in New Bedford, with two or three small children. With them he took possession of his new home, and continued his labors with his family increasing, until it consisted of fourteen living children, he having lost one, a promising young man, in the war of 1812, and two having did in infancy. In process of time, Mr. Bliss had several neighbors around him, but no religious meeting. Possessing a pious heart, and a good talent for public speaking, his mind was drawn to spiritual concerns, and meetings were appointed at his house on the Sabbath, till some place more convenient could be provided. Thus situated, Mr. Bliss, with a contented mind, might have enjoyed as many of the comforts of life as reason could require. His land was well cleared and cultivated; his family healthy, prudent, and industrious. Saratoga and Ballston Springs, the one eight, the other fourteen miles distant, furnished a ready cash market for most of the products of his farm; and, in short, I think he had a very pleasant prospect of spending his latter days in peace and comfort.

About this time a land speculator appeared, and proposed exchanging land with him, and offered fifteen acres of new land in Pennsylvania, lying in Clearfield county, on the Cinamahoning Creek, for one of his farm, which would give him about sixteen hundred acres of new land. In conversation with him, I saw the bait was like to take, and warned him to beware of the consequences, especially in trading with a Pennsylvania land speculator, who would not give him an opportunity to see the lands before signing the contract; to which he replied, "I have a large family, you know, and not land enough to employ them all; some of them are already arrived at maturity; others soon will, and begin to scatter, some one way and some another; but if I go with them now, I shall have land enough to employ them all, and there will be no necessity for scattering at all; we can remain together, and form a Seventh-day Baptist church, and I can be authorized by the General Conference to preach and administer the ordinances, &c., and in that respect we can be much better situated than we are here, and if others settle around us, as they undoubtedly will, we shall be the only church, and they will fall in with us, and in a few years we will have a respectable church of Seventh-day Baptists." To which I answered, "Your sons that are grown to maturity are mechanics, and the others will be if they live; a mechanic will rarely attack the forest if he can find employment at his trade or profession; and Illinois, which is said to be the garden of America, is now offering great inducements to mechanics of every kind. You will help them half way, and they will help themselves the other half, and you will find it more difficult to keep your sons together than you imagine, especially in the heart of a rough wilderness. Besides, you run the risk of bad titles, which are common in Pennsylvania new lands." But reasoning and warning were of no use; the offer was too flattering to be resisted; he accepted it, and sold his farm, exchanged lands without seeing his new land, and prepared for his departure.

As the perpetuation of the Sabbath and the prospects of a church were objects of the first importance to him, he obtained ordination, agreeable to his first impressions, and was soon on his way to his new habitation at Cinamahoning, leaving two of his sons, who had families, in Greenfield, calculating to follow when it was convenient. During the first winter they suffered much for want of provisions; nothing could be bought nearer than sixty or seventy miles, and that by canoe navigation down the Creek to its entrance into the Susquehannah where there was a village, a place of some trade. With one voyage down the Creek in their canoe, and a little venison which the oldest sons procured in the mountains by the aid of their rifles, which they had the precaution to take with them, they reached another season of vegetation; but before it was passed their title to their land was challenged, contested, and about three fourths of it proved invalid, which left them with about 400 acres, worth but little except for timber and coal. A scattering then commenced. One son returned to Livingston Co., N. Y., where the two brothers left in Greenfield had located themselves. The eldest two took up their abode on the Susquehannah, where they had been the winter before to procure provisions. One had gone to Iowa. Two remained on the remnant of their farm. One daughter (the only one they carried with them) married, and remained in the neighborhood. One daughter was married before they left Greenfield, and remained there. Elder Bliss and his wife returned to Livingston County, and took up their residence with their sons in that vicinity, where they ended their days; he about five years since, and his wife since the beginning of the present year, 1852. He received a pension of ninety dollars a year for revolutionary services, as long as he lived, and half the amount afterwards went to his widow. What has become of the others, I cannot say; they are all living, or were in March last. But what is most extraordinary, and what could not have been very consoling to the aged and affectionate father, they have every one forsaken the Sabbath he had so strenuously exerted himself to maintain and perpetuate as the Sabbath of the Lord. TRANSITORINESS OF GREAT MEN.

Dr. Humphrey, of Louisville, in his discourse on Henry Clay, gives the following striking facts:—

Mr. Clay was admitted to the Court of Appeals of this State, in October, 1799. During the period of his professional life, ten judges of that court have died—Muter, Todd, Grundy, Edwards, Tremble, Logan, Boyle, Clark, Mills, and Rowan. At that time Mr. Garrard was the Governor of the State. He and eight of his successors are dead—Greenup, Scott, Shelby, Madison, Adair, Desha, Breathitt, and Clark. Hundreds of his professional brethren have fallen at his side; among those of his own generation, we may name Bledsoe, Barry, Breckinridge, Davis, Innis, Nicholas, and Pope.

At the time we have taken as the commencement of Mr. Clay's public life, Gen. Washington was living. Now, not only Washington, but nine of his successors are dead. He entered the Senate of the United States in 1806. The President, Vice-President, all the secretaries, all the judges of the Supreme Court, and nearly all his fellow senators of that day are dead. Of those who have from time to time served with him in the Congress, what crowds of eloquent and accomplished men, young and old, have preceded him into the eternal world!

In 1814 he negotiated the treaty of Ghent. His colleagues, Adams, Gallatin, Bayard, and Russell, are all dead.

In 1824 he was a candidate for the presidency with Jackson, Adams, and Crawford. In 1832 he was again a candidate with Jackson; and in 1844, yet again, with Polk. These, his competitors, are all dead.

In 1825 he became Secretary of State. Adams the President, Calhoun the Vice-President, Barbour and Porter, the Secretaries of War, Southard, the Secretary of the Navy, and Wirt, Attorney General, in that administration, are dead. All the judges of the Supreme Court of that day, with the venerable Marshal at their head, have been summoned to the bar of a higher tribunal. "It is appointed unto men once to die; but after this is the judgment."

SHAKSPEARE AND THE BIBLE.

Not only did Shakspeare frequently enrich his plays with ideas from the Bible, but he sometimes transferred the very language of Scripture to his scenes. Portia, in the "Merchant of Venice," says:—

"The quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath."

"Mercy is seasonable in the time of affliction, as clouds of rain in the time of drought." Eccles. xxxv. 20.

——"It is twice bless'd;
"It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes."

"Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." Matt. v. 7.

Again—

——"Therefore, Jew,
Though justice be thy plea, consider this—
That in the course of justice, none of us
Should see salvation."

"Enter not into judgment with thy servant; for in thy sight shall no man living be justified." Psalms cxiii 2.

In the same play, Gratiano says to his friend Antonio:—

——"I am Sir Oracle,
And when I ope my lips let no dog bark;
Oh, my Antonio, I know of these,
That therefore only are reputed wise
For saying nothing."

"Even a fool, when he holdeth his peace, is counted wise; and he that shutteth his lips is esteemed a man of understanding." Proverbs xvii. 28.

THE DYING CHRISTIAN.

The following lines were suggested by hearing an account of a converted heathen, who, when dying, exclaimed to a missionary present, "My boat is on the sea, its sails are spread, and I am only waiting for a breeze to rise to waft me home!"

My boat is on the sea,
Tempestuous winds are gone;
The waves float past half joyfully,
While I look calmly on.

Not so in days gone by,
When launched upon the deep,
Winds howled and clouds rode in the sky,
While waves my boat would sweep.

My sails above I spread:
Those sails, how white they are!
How pure, while floating overhead,
Like some bright beacon star!

Once they were black as night,
With sin all stained and dark,
But Christ's pure blood has washed them white,
And hung them o'er my bark.

My boat is on the seas,
Its sails are spread to-day,
I only wait a friendly breeze
To bear me hence away.

Away! away! I long to go;
Kind winds, O come, O come!
I'm weary of my stay below,
I pine, I pant for home!

Home! home! sweet home! dear word!
When will the moment come?
Joy! joy! I move: my sails are stirred;
Home! home! I'm going home!

THE CABIN-BOY.

It was a dark and stormy evening in November, when a large vessel was driven on some dangerous rocks, near the Land's End, Cornwall. No help could be given from the shore; for the waves ran so high, that a boat could not venture out. The few people who lived near were on the cliffs; having heard the guns that, in any danger, are fired from a vessel as a signal for help. This help it pleased God to deny these poor sailors; the guns were heard no more, and the vessel went to pieces on the rocks. Those who were in her were thus called out of the world at an hour's warning, whether they were fit to die or not.

The storm lasted all night; but the next day the sun shone upon the beautiful blue sea, and it looked almost as calm and smooth as the clouds above it. Some fishermen were leaving the shore in their boat, to earn their daily living. As they got near the rocks where the vessel had gone to pieces the night before, they picked up some parts of the wreck that were floating about.

"Look!" said one of them; "what is that upon the shag-rock—it cannot be a man!—let us pull nearer!"

As they got closer to the rock, they found, to their great surprise, that a boy was kneeling on the highest part of the rock, but seemed not able to move. They quickly got to him, but feared that he was dead. He was almost stiff with the cold and wet; but when they moved him he groaned faintly; and they lifted him into the boat, and pulled as fast as they could to the shore. Many people were there, picking up pieces of the wreck; several bodies of the poor seamen had been washed ashore, and were lying covered with a sail, until they could be taken to the church-yard, and laid in the grave so few had thought they should lie in for many a long year. The people gave every help to the fishermen, and the boy was soon placed in a warm bed in one of the cottages; the doctor was riding along the shore to look at the wreck, and thus could soon give assistance.

After some time, the poor boy could tell them, that he had been religiously brought up, and bound apprentice to the sea, as a cabin boy; that he had neither father, mother, nor friend, in this world. "But," said he, "God is my friend, and has always been so. I prayed to Him last night, when the sailors were drinking, and swearing, and the captain was ill in his berth—I prayed to him who has always been my comfort, to spare my life; and he did spare my life; for I found myself this morning on the top of that high rock, where the waves could not then reach me, though they carried me there and left me. I prayed to him again, and He sent these good men to my help."

The poor boy was so weak that he now fell back on the pillow, and could say no more. His words made a deep impression upon those who were standing around the bed, and who thought little about God or the means of grace, that always had been in their power. From that time, many began to think that they had souls to be saved, as well as bodies to be taken care of.

The cabin-boy got, in a few days, strong again; and, as the people were too poor to do anything more for him, he thanked them for their great kindness, and wished he had it in his power to repay them. The doctor gave him a letter to the captain of a vessel at Falmouth, and a small sum of money was raised for him in the next village. The clergyman was the means of getting him a jacket, shoes, and hat, as he had lost everything belonging to him except his shirt and trousers; he also gave him a good dinner, and assured him that if he kept the religious feelings and principles it had pleased God to bless him with, he would not fail to be happy in this life, and in that which is to come.

The cabin-boy then went on his way, and in a few months was almost forgotten by his kind friends the fishermen. He did not, however, forget them. Many years afterwards, a tall, fine-looking seamen came to the fisherman's cottage, and asked leave to rest. An old, gray-headed man was sitting in the corner reading the Bible; he took off his spectacles, and said—

"You are kindly welcome, sir; my good woman will be home directly, and will give you some cider, and bread and cheese." The sailor looked around the cottage. "You do not seem to know me, my kind friend; but I well recollect this room, which is not altered as much as we are. I am the poor cabin-boy, whose life, through God's mercy, you were the means of saving; and I am come to thank you, and I hope you will let me now be a little help to you."

The old man looked surprised. "I do not, indeed, recollect you, sir," said he, "but I have never forgotten the precious words spoken by the poor cabin-boy while lying on my bed. From that moment I felt that I had been too long in the world to be caring only for the things in it. My good wife was of the same way of thinking. We could, happily, both read, and were not without a Bible; we read together, and talked. Our good clergyman helped to make us feel that God would be our friend as well as the poor cabin-boy's, if we would try to make him so; and from that time, we have lived in peace and content that we never knew before. If you are, sir, that poor cabin-boy, you can never be any better help to us than you have been."

"My kind old friend," said the sailor, "your words give me great pleasure, but you must let me beg that you will accept this trifle"—and he put a small canvass bag before the old man, with five pounds in it—"keep it for a time of need."

The old man did not well like to take the money, but he saw the sailor had set his heart upon it, and so he would not refuse.

"I will take your offer," said the sailor, "of something to eat and drink; and here is your good woman, I see, just coming in. Why, she is as brisk as ever!"

The old woman was as much surprised and pleased as her husband had been, and they had a comfortable meal together.

The seaman, before he took leave, told them that from the time he had left their cottage, God had raised him up friends; he had got on well in the world, as the good clergyman had told him he would do. The doctor's letter had been well received by the Captain of the vessel, who entered him again as cabin-boy. "I am now steward of a large ship," said he; "my trust is still where it ever has been, since I can remember the good lessons of my youth; my Heavenly Father is my friend, and my Bible is my greatest worldly comfort."

INSANITY.

Rev. Mr. Gregg—of Cheshire, England, we think—author of the beautiful hymn, written on 1 Tim. iii. 16, "Seen of Angels," commencing, "Beyond," &c., had an insane brother, who lived with him, and spent his time wandering about the yard, garden, and sometimes finding his way into his brother's study, but never seeming to take much interest in the things about him. Mr. Gregg, therefore, used no precautions in reference to his manuscripts, generally allowing them to remain exposed on his desk, especially while in course of completion. On this occasion, he had written the hymn with the exception of the last two lines, and being unable to get a suitable climax, walked out to refresh himself with pure air, and contemplate his subject. After he left the room, the lunatic brother walked to the desk, read the manuscript, took a pen and wrote:—

"Clapped their triumphant wings, and cried,
The glorious work is done."

As the hymn is in very few books we quote it.

Beyond the glittering starry skies,
Far as the eternal hills,
Yon heaven of heavens with living light
Our great Redeemer fills.

Legions of angels, strong and fair,
In countless armies shine,
And swell his praise with golden harps,
Attuned to songs divine.

"Hail, Prince!" they cry, "forever hail!
Whose unexampled love
Moved thee to quit those glorious realms,
And royalties above."

While he did condescend on earth
To suffer grief and pain,
They cast their honors at his feet,
And waited in his train.

Through all his travels here below,
They did his steps attend;
Oft wondering how and where at last
The mystic scene would end.

They saw his heart, transfixed with wounds,
With love and grief run o'er;
They saw him break the bars of death,
Which none e'er brake before.

They brought his chariot from above,
To bear him to his throne;
Clapped their triumphant wings, and cried,
"The glorious work is done!"

THE DYING DEACON'S PRAYER.

He had long been faithful and exemplary as a Christian, and now he lay upon the bed of death. He felt, and his physician assured him, that the close of life was at hand, and in a few short hours he must enter eternity! His minister came in to see him, and before departing proposed prayer, asking for what he should pray—if there was any particular petition that his dying friend wished him to offer. "Yes, pray for me the first three petitions of the Lord's prayer: Hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven!"

What a spectacle of sublimity! What a triumph of faith! What an example of self-forgetfulness, in the all-absorbing interest in Christ's kingdom, and the desire that it might every where be extended through the world! In circumstances in which, of all others, the holiest saint might well feel his need of Divine support and comfort, and specially pray for upholding and sustaining grace, he forgets himself, to pray that God's name may be hallowed, and his kingdom come, and his will be done on earth as in heaven!

Here was the true spirit of Christ, who, in the hour of his agony in the garden, still could say, "Not my will, but thine, be done." Here, too, is the true spirit of benevolence, which forgets self in its anxious desire for the spread of Christ's kingdom, and the salvation of souls. Here is the spirit by which every one, like this good man, must be animated in life, if, like him, they would feel it in the hour of death.

"Thy kingdom come!" Is this our daily prayer; our constant desire; the end for which we toil, and give, and pray, and habitually live? Does this lead us to speak for God; to pray for the impenitent; to supplicate the influence of the Holy Spirit; to circulate the Bible, the tract, the religious paper; to be faithful to the means of grace; to co-operate with the ministry of reconciliation, and earnestly pray for a blessing on their labors; to look well to our own example; to do good at home; to send the missionary to the ends of the earth? For this do we seek to be holy ourselves, and to train up our families for God? For this are we faithful in the church, and consistent and exemplary before the world?

"Thy kingdom come!" There is no better prayer; no loftier end that we can propose to ourselves or others; no higher object to fill our thoughts and engage our pursuit in life, or to engage our desires even in the very article of death! He whose interests, and aims, and ends, are one with those of God, must be safe, must be useful, must be happy, both here and hereafter. Let the prayer, then, of our lips, and also of our life be, "Thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven!" [Puritan Recorder.

SUPPOSE.

"Now what did you do that for? Suppose he should buy rum with it?"

To this querulous exclamation, the beautiful woman who had just given a bit of silver to a poor beggar, replied, "If we are to suppose any thing, why not suppose good?"

Noble answer; let us take it to our hearts and shrine it there; ye whose lips seldom part but to censure, remember these words, "If we are to suppose any thing, why not suppose good?"

Why not suppose good of that pale woman, who shuns society, and whose face seems ever dark under the shadow of shame? Even if she has strayed from the right path once, why not suppose good now? Why not give her your hand and your confidence? You have sure proof of her repentance; your character cannot be broken against such a frail reed as she; you are rooted and grounded in the right; and even should you be subjected to censure, what is the whisper of a puny world to the approving benediction of God?

Why suppose, because your neighbor has a row of fine houses, and you have remained poor, though starting in life with him, that he has obtained his wealth by fraud and evil doing? If you are going to suppose at all, why not suppose good? Why not suppose that he had more tact, better business qualifications, a more mature judgment, a happier faculty of turning knowledge to account—why not suppose good?

Why suppose, because your neighbor dresses in more showy or fashionable attire than you can afford, that therefore she is vain and extravagant? How can you tell the depth of her purse? Who has inducted you into the mysteries of her weekly expenses? Why not suppose good?

Why suppose, because a girl, in the exuberance of youth and animal spirits, forgets at times that she is among censorious mortals, and gives way to childish impulses of mirth, that she is bold, forward, and presuming; that she is in danger of losing delicacy and reputation? Much misery has the thoughtless tongue, created for some poor child, whose boisterous glee, because she was "grown up," has been converted into barbed arrows, and pointed against her all her after life, through supposition.

It is dastardly to suppose evil; what does the word mean? "Suspicion without proof; to lay down or state as a proposition or fact what may exist or be true, though not known to be true or exist."

How more than insufferably mean is it, then, in supposing wrong motives to regulate the conduct of those around us, and yet how prone to the sin is the majority of mankind!

"M. is mean."

"How did you find that out?"

"O, I don't know; I have an impression that it is so, from some little things I have noticed."

There is a supposition founded on very slight tenure; the listener thinks not of analyzing the nature of the report but takes it for granted that he is not only mean, but possesses those bad qualities inherent in such a character; and, in time, M.'s reptuation is established, though he may be one of the most deserving men in the community.

Let us take care, then, how we suppose; there may be harm and evil enough all around us, but it is best for us not to suppose defects where we can out of every cloud glean a ray of light.

INFLUENCE OF ONE TRACT.

To the editor of the N. Y. Recorder:—

One of your correspondents recently alluded to Rev. Morgan Edwards, whose labors as an evangelist have been blessed at Chicago, and many other places in the North-west. I have a fact concerning that excellent but eccentric brother, which perhaps may interest your readers; and as I received the particulars from his own lips, there can be no doubt of its correctness.

In the year 1837, Mr. Edwards was an officer of a brig then lying in New York harbor. A tract distributor coming aboard, handed him a tract. He received it very ungraciously, cursing the man to his face, asking him what wages he received, and telling him that he might be in better business. The distributor mildly expostulated with him, and besought him to put the tract in his pocket, and when he should be at leisure, to give it a careful reading. Impressed by the earnest manner and tearful eye of the speaker, he put it into his pocket.

While at sea, some time after, finding the tract, he read it. Its very title, "My Spirit shall not always strive," went like an arrow to his heart. During the remainder of the voyage he was in great agony lest the Holy Spirit might leave him before his peace was made with God. Nor did he find peace until he believed in Christ. After his conversion, his efforts were blessed to the hopeful conversion of several sailors before he abandoned the sea.

I have now in my possession that little tract—the indentical ink and paper; and when I think of the trains of blessing and salvation, never to end, which have been started by its feeble instrumentality, I thank God for tracts and tract distribution. None but God can measure the influence of one tract.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, September 9, 1852.

EDITORIAL ARRANGEMENTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES.—In answer to inquiries which are frequently made, it is deemed proper to state, that Thomas B. Brown is employed by the Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society to prepare for the Sabbath Recorder one article each week, which is always indicated by his initials T. B. B.; and to him, of course, are referred such communications as relate to his articles. For all other matter, both original and selected, Geo. B. Utter is responsible.

THE NEW EARTH.

Will Bro. Brown harmonize his view of the "Intercourse of Nations," from the words "There was no more sea," (Rev. 21 : 1,) with the first part of the verse, and the latter part of the 11th verse of the 20th chapter? Is the event literal or spiritual? and is the earth a "new earth," or is the old earth improved by man? J. C.

Remarks.

We suppose, that the new heaven and new earth of which John had a vision, are the same which Peter and his fellow believers looked for, 2 Pet. 3 : 13. Peter's expectation was based, not upon any new revelation made to him, but upon what had been already foretold—"according to his promise." The only place where such a promise is given, is Isa. 65 : 17. It follows, that if Isaiah spoke of a new earth literally, the writer of the Apocalypse did also. But if Isaiah intended nothing more than a moral or spiritual renovation of this earth, then the writer of the Apocalypse meant nothing more.

Our opinion is, that the prophet intended principally a moral renovation. Those who hold a different opinion, suppose that the reference is to that state of things which shall succeed the gospel dispensation. If their opinion is correct, the day of grace will then be over; the end will have come, and Christ will have delivered up the kingdom to God the Father. Of course, death the last enemy will have been destroyed; for Christ must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. 1 Cor. 15 : 24, 25. But, if we are not mistaken, the prophet's language, though it foretels a period of great longevity, implies, nevertheless, the continuance of death through all that state of things of which he is speaking. It also represents the people as engaged in occupations similar to those which now engage mankind. They build houses, plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them. The lamb, the lion, and the serpent, are also thrown into the scene.

Now, however suitable it may be for the inhabitants of this lower world to build houses for their accommodation, we understand that when the earthly house of our tabernacle is taken down, every believer enters into a house not made with hands. And however necessary it may be for us here to prepare food for our daily sustenance, such necessity pertains not to those who have attained the resurrection from the dead. Some, we know, dispute this, declaring that there is no proof that the inhabitants of the future world will not eat and drink, as they do here. Christ, they say, ate and drank with his disciples after he rose from the dead; and why should not his people do so too? But there is no evidence, that Christ ate and drank with his disciples for any other purpose but to give them the fullest possible proof that he was risen from the dead. Aside from this object, he needed not the food prepared by man. And however adapted meats are for the belly, and the belly for meats, we have positive declaration in the inspired volume, that the Lord shall destroy both it and them. 1 Cor. 6 : 13. Besides, the principle of life in the resurrection body is not blood, but the Spirit of God. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. Meats, however, are taken for the purpose of being converted into blood, and the whole digestive apparatus is only a contrivance for carrying out this object. If flesh and blood do not enter into the structure of the resurrection body, what necessity can there be for eating and drinking?

Our views may not be satisfactory to "J. C.," and we confess that they are not entirely so to ourselves; that is, so far as they constitute an exposition of the subject treated of in Rev. 21 : 1, &c. We are not particularly tenacious of them, and perhaps some of our readers may be able to present something better. We would simply remind our correspondent, however, that in our allusion to the expression, "there was no more sea," we did not intend any thing like an exegesis of the passage. In fact, we have never yet got hold of any exposition of it, which was entirely free from objection, in our mind. All we intended by the allusion was, that during the universal reign of Christ over the earth, there would be great facilities of intercourse between the most distant nations. Whether the sea will be literally displaced by dry ground, is a question which we do not care about resolving. Some scientific men maintain, that there are causes even now at work, which must eventually cause the sea to give place. But, be that as it may, we are persuaded that there will be great facilities for running to and fro, and knowledge shall be wonderfully increased. T. B. B.

CHRISTIANITY IN CHINA.—That Christianity was early introduced into China by the Nestorians, if not at a still more ancient period in the history of the church, (says the Missionary Magazine,) is an undoubted fact; and there is reason to believe that it gained a large body of at least nominal adherents. The following incident, from a letter of Mr. Goddard, at Ningpo, suggests the probability that some traces of these ancient churches may be discovered in the interior of the empire :—

"A few days since, a respectable looking stranger came into our chapel, and listened with much apparent attention to the discussion. After service he stopped to converse. He said that he and his ancestors had worshiped only one God, the Creator. He knew of Moses, and Jesus, and Mary, said he was not a Romanist nor Mohammedan, neither had he seen our books, but that the doctrine was handed down from his ancestors. He did not know where they obtained it, nor for how many generations they had followed it. He is from one of the western provinces of China, and says that in his native place there are some thirty families of the same religion. They have books, but do not propagate them. I have been anxious to find the man again, and converse more freely with him, but as yet have not been able. Some of his ancestors evidently received scriptural light from some source, which they endeavored in some degree to follow, and handed down to their posterity. Who can tell how many such instances there are, in which the seed sown may spring up and bear fruit without the knowledge of him who sowed it?"

OBERLIN AND OBERLINISTS.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder :—

We had the pleasure of being present at the commencement of Oberlin College, occurring, this year, on the 24th and 25th of August. The exercises were of a varied and highly interesting character. They consisted of essays and orations from the graduating classes of three Departments—Ladies, Collegiate, and Theological Departments—accompanied with addresses and a musical concert, occupying the evenings.

As several peculiarities for which this Institution is noted are attracting considerable attention in various quarters, and several individuals and societies are planning organizations similar in many respects, perhaps it would not be amiss to give a brief statement of its origin, object, and success.

The originator of the Oberlin Colony and College, was the Rev. Mr. Shipherd. He is said to have obtained the idea of such an institution from reading the life of Oberlin, the French philanthropist and educator. Mr. Shipherd traveled through some of the Eastern and Middle States, enlisting men and procuring means. It was proposed to form a colony of such as were willing to devote their time and means in building up an institution, that should be for the education of the poor, regardless of sex or color. Men of the right stamp were soon found to commence a colony. They purchased three miles square of unbroken wilderness. Setting apart five hundred acres for an institution farm, the remainder was sold, and the revenue arising therefrom devoted to the benefit of the College. The colonists entered inte the work with spirit. They labored and sacrificed for the good of the institution and the cause. Roads were cut, clearings made, log houses erected, and the school opened December, 1833. In its first stages, it had to undergo the difficulties attendant on the settlement of a new country, in addition to those of starting a new institution. These were cheerfully and successfully met by both teachers and students. In 1835, some forty students, not conforming to the requirements of slave-ocracy in Lane Theological Seminary, left that institution and came to Oberlin. This gave the latter a new start, and a higher anti-slavery and theological character. It soon attracted the attention of the leading anti-slavery men and philanthropists of the age. Benevolent individuals made large donations for the relief of its pecuniary necessities. Additions were made to its faculty, and the various departments were more fully arranged. It has lately been endowed on the scholarship system, which has given it a new impetus. It has at present a strong faculty, and some seven or eight hundred students.

The following are among the objects of this Institution :—

1. It endeavors to unite physical with mental labor. The attempt was made, at first, to furnish sufficient agricultural, mechanical, and domestic labor for every student, four hours per day, with shops, implements, &c., and individuals to oversee the whole. But it was soon found that the expenditure requisite for keeping up the system was more than the income from the labor of the students. Some of those who have had considerable experience in the matter affirm, that no institution can succeed in such an undertaking, unless they have a large sinking fund devoted to that object. The course now pursued is, to assist by furnishing facilities and appliances, as far as it can be done without any great expense, and by arranging the hours of study and recitation so as to give all who desire to labor a fair chance, and then to let each individual work on his own responsibility, paying him for what he actually earns. The Faculty work—and most of the more industrious, persevering students, work—many earning nearly or quite sufficient to pay their way. The yearly income to students for their labor during terms and vacations, amounts to about thirteen thousand dollars.

The influence of daily physical labor upon the student is found to be admirable. A student can reanimate exhausted nature, and give buoyancy to the spirits, as well by useful labor as by riding, or walking, or gymnastic exercises. The peculiarly satisfying consciousness of having been engaged in some useful employment, finely fits one for study. Although the tan may be upon the brow, and the hand may be hard and sinewy, yet there is an elasticity to the step, a sparkle to the eye, and a "Please, sir, give me a chance, and I will take care of myself, sir," sort of an air about such students, that is truly pleasing. They are evidently preparing for the bustle and strife of life.

2. This institution aims to give woman the same opportunities for education as man. This is felt to be a great desideratum by all desiring the progress of the race; but how this should be brought about is not quite as plain. Whether they should be educated in the same or different schools, is yet an open question. This institution was one of the first to try the experiment of opening college halls to woman—of permitting her to climb the steeps of learning with man. The result of the experiment thus far seems to be very satisfactory. Experience goes to show that the plan is not only feasible, but highly advantageous. It is much more economical, giving instruction to nearly twice as many students as could otherwise be taught with the same number of teachers. It is found, that order is more easily secured; the proprieties of life are more carefully observed; and a more natural, harmonious, and healthy development of character, is given by this system, than by any other—with as little or less liability to abuse.

3. This institution has, from the beginning, taken high and firm ground in regard to slavery. It has stood as a light to the oppressed and persecuted man of color. From the first, it has been a great depot for the underground railroad, where the weary and fearful fugitive could find rest, refreshment, and protection. Many interesting incidents are related of the manner in which the Southern hunter, in his pursuit after human game, has been here eluded by his prey. Individuals of color here enjoy all the privileges of human beings, and many of them are availing themselves of the advantages thus offered.

4. It is noted for its high religious character and influence. There is a spirit of ardent, practical piety, pervading all of its departments and operations. Everything is made to tend towards the religious; and although it has often been charged with both heresy and bigotry in its theology, yet no one can doubt that its religious influence is of a high and evangelical order.

With these and other characteristics, Oberlin has, from the first, been gardually gaining in usefulness and importance—always opposed, condemned, and vilified, yet always prosperous. It has done and is doing much for the education of the poor, much for the elevation of the proscribed, much also in sending forth teachers, ministers, and missionaries. It is emphatically a place of prayer and revival influence, where hundreds of awakened souls have found pardon and peace through Christ, and have gone forth to labor for the conversion of the world. BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Paris Fete—Popish Miracles—Maynooth College.

GLASGOW, August 20th, 1852.

Paris and its visitors—estimated to have numbered about a million of people—observed Sunday last in this fashion: In the church of the Madaleine, the Archbishop celebrated mass and blessed the standards. The President then reviewed the cavalry; after which there was a naval combat exhibition, and in the evening an unsuccessful attempt at an illumination. Not for work, but for play, is Sunday thus set apart. Somewhat in the same spirit, in England, the Great Western Railway announces now the issue of return tickets on Sundays at single fares for all stations on their line, "such tickets to be available on that day only."

We have formerly given the details of the miraculous appearance of the Virgin on the mountain of La Salette, and her threatenings of punishment on account of the prevailing Sunday desecration—of the miracle having been attested—of its being afterwards rejected, and of its having been finally confirmed, on reference to the Pope himself. We had almost lost sight of the wonder; but attention is again called to it. M. Similien, "Professor of Mathematics at the school of Anjer," has published a letter containing the details of three miraculous cures effected at this "holy mountain of La Salette," on the 1st of July, "the eve of the fete of the Visitation of the Virgin." One of these miraculous cases, so certified by this professor of one of the exact sciences, is that of the restoration of sight to a young woman who, he says, had been blind about three mouths. There is nothing said about Sunday desecration on this occasion, but as "a fete of the visitation" seems to have been established, the consideration of this subject may be resumed on some future occasion.

In Ireland, Dr. Dixon, one of the Professors of Maynooth College, has been elected to the office of Primate and Archbishop of the Romish Church, vacant by the translation of Dr. Cullen to the metropolitan chair. Two priests of that church, who some time ago professed to have left it and become Protestant, have returned to their former profession—promising now to reveal the doings of Protestantism. Richard Wall says in a published letter, that when professing Protestantism, he "well knew" that he acted against his "conscience and conviction"—that is, that he was still a Papist; and yet, that his Popery did not prevent his professing to renounce his religion! Jesuitism is, there is reason to fear, seeking thus to destroy faith in the professions of those who really leave the superstitions in which they have been reared.

Preparatory to the meeting of Parliament, it would seem that those who have been elected at the dictation of the priests in Ireland, to serve the Pope's cause in the House of Commons, are undergoing a preparatory training, how best to throw the whole weight of their votes always and only for the interests of their church. In this, we doubt not, they will show themselves sufficiently devoted.

ANTI-SLAVERY HOME MISSIONS.

A meeting of Presbyterians and Congregationalists, who can not conscientiously co-operate with the American Home Missionary Society on account of its connection with slavery, was held at Chicago, Ill., July 7th. After a thorough discussion of the whole subject, it was determined to organize a Society free from the leprosy of Slavery; which they did, christening the new organization as "The North-Western Home Missionary Society."

The opening address at this meeting was delivered by Pres. Blanchard, of Knox College, who brought to light some startling facts relative to the increase of what may properly be called a slave-holding religion. He maintained, that "the end of Christian doctrine and worship is Christian morality;" that "all truth, understood but not obeyed, is held in unrighteousness;" and that "a religion which stops short of establishing right practical relations and duties among men, stops short of its own end, and is no better than paganism under a Christian name. Lacking the 'fruits' of piety, it does not 'glorify God,' and failing to execute 'judgment,' it does not benefit men." He then went on to show that Christianity, as practiced in the slave States, does not establish relations of justice between master and slave, and that "for more than a century since the discussion was vigorously opened on this subject, slavery has steadily increased within the pale of the leading Christian denominations." The existing Mission Boards and Tract Societies, having come into life and activity on the avowed policy of letting slavery entirely alone, he considers as lending effectual protection and support to slavery. He says :—

"The silent operation of this state of things, without, perhaps, any premeditated design on the part of any one, has brought about what we at present behold in this country, viz., the great mass of evangelical Christians engaged, as they suppose, in setting up the kingdom of God by propagating a slave-holding religion! Mission Boards (Home and Foreign,) Bible, Tract, and Sunday-School operations, in which slaveholders co-operate, and which are not expected to interfere with the relation of master and slave. * * * *

"The churches planted by Foreign Missions, in the Cherokee and Choctaw nations, are openly and avowedly accessible to slaveholders, and many of their members hold slaves. All their members may hold slaves if they choose, and they are able to do so. The Home Mission churches, as to the great mass of them, are constructed upon the same principle. Their members violate no rule or principle of their organization, written or implied, by holding slaves. The Southern Bible agent is, of course, the slaveholder's friend, and goes no further than he permits him in distributing the Word of God. The colporteur entering a slaveholding neighborhood, goes first of course to the mansion of the owner, and afterward gives or sells such oral or written instruction to the slaves, and such only, as their owner permits him. If the American Tract Society should publish one tract against the injustice of slavery, that simple fact would exclude all its colporteurs from the slave states. The Tract Society, then, confessedly, purchases the privilege of going into the slave states, by suppressing in its publications, that part of God's truth which condemns human bondage."

Speaking of the plan of testifying against slavery by resolutions, while communion with slaveholders is justified, Mr. Blanchard sets forth the following very plausible "close communion" doctrine :—

"It is so nearly a practical absurdity, that nothing but the influence of great names and great organizations can keep it for one hour from becoming an object of general ridicule and contempt. To commune with slaveholders, without discrimination, in all the local churches, and yet once in a year or two vote in some puclic body, that slavery is an evil which ought to be done away; has been proved, if one hundred years' experience can prove anything, the way to build up slavery in the church—not to destroy it out of the church."

FACTS BEARING ON WAR.

The following stubborn and significant facts are given by a correspondent of The Delaware Republican :—

The mercantile shipping of the civilized world amounts to about 8,000,000 tuns, which is worth, new and old, $30 per tun, and nets, clear of interest, insurance, &c., ten per cent., or $24,000,000 per annum. The appropriation for the British Navy, for the current year, is $33,620,200! Is not this a sober fact? that the annual expenses of one nation's navy exceeds the net profit of all the mercantile shipping owned by the civilized world.

The war debts of the European nations amount to $100,000,000,000. It would require the labor of four millions of men, at $150 per annum, to pay the interest of this sum at 6 per cent. To pay the principal, it would be necessary to levy a tax of at least $10 on every inhabitant of the globe! Another fact rendering this more impressive, may be found in the "scraps of curious information," that no heathen nations are in arrears for the butcheries they have perpetrated on the human race. They pay cash down for all that is done for the devil under their hands. Christian nations alone "go on tick" for that kind of service.

From March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1844, our Government expended on the War Department $663,438,851. The interest of this sum, at 6 per cent., would build Whitney's great Railroad from the Lakes to the Pacific, of 2,500 miles in length, at $15,000 per mile, and thus erect a highway for the commerce and communication of the family of nations, which should be reckoned in all coming time one of the greatest enterprises that ever blessed the race.

In 1842, there were produced in the United States 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 140,000,000 bushels of Indian corn; which, at $1 per bushel for the former, and 25 cents for the latter, were worth $135,500,000. Fifteen per cent. clear of the interest of the capital invested in lands, implements, hired and personal labor, is a liberal estimate of the profit accruing to the wheat and corn grower. Then the profit of this amount of grain would be $20,325,000. The appropriation to the army and navy, during the same year, was $20,150,501. In other words, the army and navy ate up the whole harvest of wheat and corn throughout the union! Will not the hard-working farmers think on this fact?

The Government, though carrying on extensive armories of its own, has recently contracted with a private company in Connecticut for the supply of 30,000 pistols, at $6 50 each; or $195,000 worth of those weapons so much in vogue with duelists and assassins. The Amercian Bible Society congratulates itself on receiving, the past year, $166,652, the aggregate of all that has been given through the Union for the dissemination of the Word of Life at home and abroad. So it goes; Christendom expends more in one year on the means and instruments of human slaughter, than has been given to the promulgation of the Gospel since Jesus Christ died on the cross? E. B.

THE TREASURY OF THE BAPTIST MISSIONARY UNION.—It is known throughout the home field of our Missionary Union, (says the Macedonian,) that the Executive Committee are to expend $135,000 in the year ending with March, 1853. But while the sum of the yearly expenditure is an average of $11,250 a month, the donations and legacies of the four months ending with July have averaged little more than $3,000 a month. We believe it to be the purpose of the friends of the missions to place at the disposal of the treasury, within the year, all that may be needed to meet its expenditures. But they are earnestly requested to remember that the monthly drafts made upon the treasury by the ordinary operations of the missions require much larger monthly supplies, and that the reinforcements to be sent to the missions the present autumn will greatly increase the expenditures of the months of September, October, and November. It is expected that about twenty additional missionaries will sail for the African and Asiatic missions in the course of these months.

MUNIFICENT DONATION.—Hon. Daniel A. White, of Salem, Mass., has made a donation to the town of Lawrence, of six acres of land, worth at least $20,000. The land, which is near the center of the town, is conveyed in trust to three individuals, who have full power to dispose of it, and cause the proceeds to be invested, or suffer them to accumulate if need be until a sufficient amount be realized, to be appropriated to the following object :—

"The establishment and support of an annual course of lectures, designed more particularly for the young of both sexes, though free to all of the industrial classes. Secondly, for the establishment and increase of a public library, to be free to all citizens of the town. In case there should be any surplus of the annual income, the trustees are to allow it to accumulate, from time to time, add it to the trust fund, and appropriate it, as in their judgment they shall deem best, for the moral, intellectual and christian advancement and instruction of the inhabitants. The trustees, who are not allowed to expend the money on a building, are also authorized to appropriate a portion of the tract of land for the site of a public library, whenever the town or individual benefactors shall provide funds for the erection of a suitable building for the same."

NATIONAL LIBERTY CONVENTION.—This Convention met at Canastota on the 1st inst., and included delegates from several States. A Business Committee was appointed, who in the afternoon brought in a majority and a minority report. The majority reported, through Wm. Goodell, a series of resolutions, in substance, that the Liberty Party will not co-operate with the Free Democracy, because it recognizes the legality of Slavery. The report also recommended the nomination of candidates for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency. The Minority Report was read by Gerrit Smith, and recommended that no nominations for President and Vice President should be made, and that the party should co-operate with the Free Democrats, but still retain their present Liberty Party organization, hoping that the Free Democracy will purify their platform, and become right, after a season. A spirited debate grew out of these reports, and finally that of the majority was rejected by a vote of 17, while that of the minority was adopted. Thereupon the advocates of the majority report seceded, held a meeting, adopted the majority report, and nominated as a National Ticket, Wm. Goodell for President, and Chas. C. Foot for Vice-President.

QUESTION.—Has a church a right, in accordance with gospel rules, to give letters to any of its members, when the church is not in gospel travel; which letters would be a dismissal from the church without their uniting with any other church. INQUIRER.

We do not understand what "Inquirer" would be at. What does he mean by "a church not in gospel travel?" And does he mean, that a church so circumstanced is not competent to dismiss any of its members, for the purpose of being received into the fellowship of another church? Or does he mean, simply, that a church has no right to dismiss any of its members, except it be with direct reference to their being received into the fellowship of another? On which of these views is his question founded? If on the latter, why does he use the qualifying expression, "not in gospel travel?" Or does he mean to ask, whether a church has a right to dismiss any of its members to another church which is "not in gospel travel?" T. B. B.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The writers of several communications which have been on hand some time, will exercise a little patience with us. They were received during our absence from the city; and now that we are at our post again, the duties devolving on us, in view of our approaching Anniversaries, prevent us from giving them immediate attention. We shall examine them as soon as we have leisure. T. B. B.

ROYALTY BEFRIENDING MISSIONS.—Perhaps no sovereign among the heathen has shown so much favor to American missionaries, and given them such privileges in the prosecution of their benevolent labors, as the king of Siam. A letter of recent date furnishes the following illustration :—

"One of the missionaries—a physician—was recently called by his Majesty to attend one of his wives who was dangerously sick. He was the first male foreigner that had ever been allowed to enter into the female apartments of the palace. Seeing that his wife was saved from impending death, he sent the physician a thank offering of $120, accompanied by a very pleasant note in English. Learning that the mission wished to get a large place for its location, he sent them word that he would purchase a place which they had made strenuous efforts to obtain, but in vain, which they should have for a very moderate rent, 'in consideration of its being in their hearts to establish a boarding-school for Siamese boys and girls.' He is anxious to have a boarding-school where the children can be kept alone under the missionaries' training."

SCARCITY OF MINISTERS.—Rev. T. F. Caldicott, in an appeal to the Baptists of New England in behalf of ministerial education, makes the following statements :—

1. There are now four thousand more Baptist churches than there are Baptist ministers.
2. The number of newly organized Baptist churches has for some two years exceeded the number of men ordained as Baptist ministers.
3. There never was a time in our denomination when there was such a demand for educated ministers as at present; but unless the number of students for the ministry be vastly increased, this demand cannot possibly be met.

The Baptist denomination in Massachusetts numbers 348 churches; 251 ordained ministers, 35 of whom were without charge about a year ago; and 31,414 members. The denomination is second to no other in the State except the Congregationalists, who number 36,000; the Methodists numbering 16,733. During the twenty years from 1830 to 1850, the Congregationalists increased 76 per cent., the Baptists about 98 per cent., and the Methodists about the same as the latter.

RETURN OF MISSIONARIES.—We learn from the Christian Intelligencer, that Mrs. Benjamin Schneider of the Armenian mission, with four of her children, and Rev. Dwight W. Marsh of the Assyrian mission, arrived in New York, on Sabbath afternoon, Aug. 9th in the bark Martha Clarke, seventy-six days from Smyrna. Mrs. Schneider has been in the field eighteen years. It is an interesting circumstance, that the two mates of the Martha Clarke, and one of the sons of Mrs. Schneider, were hopefully converted on the passage to this country. "The friends of Rev. Mr. Marsh will sympathize deeply with him in the death of his father and brother, which took place recently in Michigan."

COLPORTAGE IN PENNSYLVANIA.—During the year ending March 1, the American Tract Society received the sum of $4,103 50, donations from Pennsylvania; and performed in that State thirty-one years of colporteur labor, visiting 69,978 families, selling 80,829 volumes, distributing gratuitously 3,678,000 pages of books and tracts, and supplying 1,372 families found destitute of the Bible. The value of the publications granted, reckoning 1,500 pages to the dollar, was $2,452. For every $132 37 contributed in Pennsylvania, the Society returned a full year of colporteur service, and more than $79 worth of books and tracts gratuitously circulated.

PAYMENT OF NEWSPAPER DUES.—Our contemporary of Zion's Advocate, in an article addressed to subscribers, has the following :—

"Several persons have written to us, by way of apology for not having paid more promptly, that they could as well have paid before, but had waited to see an agent. This, we think, is hardly fair, for it not only often keeps the money out of our hands an unreasonable length of time, but also obliges us to lose, by way of commissions to the agent for collecting, one-tenth of all the money thus paid."

HOW SOME PEOPLE MANAGE.—A correspondent of the Western Watchman, St. Louis, in writing to the editor from an interior county of Missouri, speaks thus: "I have become vexed with our Baptist brethren. Some of them take one or two political papers, but cannot be prevailed on to take a religious paper. Others chew so much tobacco that it takes all their spare change. Others plead poverty when they are worth thousands."

THE NEW POSTAGE LAW.—On our last page to-day will be found the Act adopted by Congress near the close of its session, materially reducing the rates of postage on newspapers. After the 30th inst., newspapers and periodicals, weighing not more than three ounces, may be sent to any part of the United States for one cent each; while those weighing less than an ounce and a half may be sent to any part of the State in which they are published for half a cent each. And even these rates may be reduced one half by advance payments. The Recorder weighs less than an ounce and a half, and will of course go to any part of the State of New York for half a cent a number when not prepaid, or a quarter of a cent when prepaid. The Memorial will go to any part of the United States for one cent a number. Now is the time to add a few hundred subscribers for each.

☞ The law, as we copied it from the Washington papers, says that in order to secure the reduction of one half, newspapers must be prepaid at the office where mailed. This is a mistake; they may be prepaid at the office where received as well as where mailed.

☞ In another column will be found the prospectus of Dyer and Willis' "Musical World and Times,"—a work which has long been needed, and which has already attained an enviable popularity.

Proceedings in Congress Adjournment.

SECOND-DAY, AUG. 30.

In SENATE, the Naval Appropriation bill was taken up, and the appropriation for the Brooklyn Navy Yard was increased from $126,000 to $240,000; that for the Charlestown, Mass., Yard from $28,000 to $74,000, and a like increase was made for all the Navy Yards. Among the amendments adopted was one to complete Steven's Steamship for Harbor Defense. An amendment to purchase a site and construct a Navy Yard at San Francisco, and appropriating half a million for that purpose, was agreed to, but the appropriation for a railroad and basin was rejected. Another amendment, comprehending the provisions of Mr. Seward's bill, for the exploration of the Northern Pacific and China seas, was also adopted. The bill passed as amended. The Light House bill also passed. A long discussion followed on the bill granting land to the States for the benefit of the Insane, which was finally laid on the table.

In the HOUSE, it was agreed to print 100,000 copies of the Agricultural part of the Patent Office Report, and 50,000 of the Machanical part. Mr. Houston, from the Committee of Conference upon Amendments to the General Appropriation bill, made a report. There were more than a hundred amendments, which were read, and, by the Speaker's casting vote, the entire report was concurred in. Some other unimportant business was transacted, amid much confusion.

THIRD-DAY, AUG. 31.

In SENATE, reports from the various Committees of Conference upon the non-concurred amendments to the appropriation bills were made and concurred in, and the bills passed. Mr. James's resolution for the appointment of a select committee to sit during the recess and examine witnesses on oath, in relation to alledged frauds upon the Custom-House, gave rise to some debate, but was passed. The remainder of the proceedings were uninteresting. Just on the point of twelve, Mr. Mangum offered a resolution complimentary to the acting Vice-President, which was unanimously adopted. Mr. King returned thanks, and declared the Senate adjourned, sine die.

In the HOUSE, also, reports were made from the Committees of Conference, which were accepted, and the several Appropriation bills passed. At precisely 12 o'clock the Speaker rose in his place and announced the adjournment of the House, sine die.

European News.

One week later news from Europe has come to hand, of which we give a summary.

The Ministerial journals announce with perfect confidence the satisfactory termination of the dispute as to the North American fisheries, which is likely, indeed certain, to be adjusted on terms of absolute reciprocity, so far as the right of fishing is concerned; the Americans to be at liberty to fish in all British waters, and the British in all American waters, subject to the restriction on both sides to three miles from the shore of the country to which they do not belong. The three miles to be measured to the nearest land, without distinction of bay or open sea.

The ship Prince of Wales, from Australia, had reached England with 35,000 ounces of gold, and reported that 13,700 ounces were on the way. The Sydney Herald makes the amount of gold produced in the Colonies, since its first discovery, reach 1,124,415 ounces, worth over $20,000,000.

The steamship Great Britain, Captain Matthews, sailed from Liverpool on the 18th for Australia, with a full complement of passengers, and goods and treasure to the value of nearly one million sterling.

The Queen and her retinue had got back safely from Belgium, accompanied by the King of that country and suite.

The Duke of Hamilton, premier Peer of Scotland, died at the age of 85. He is succeeded by his son, the Marquis of Douglas.

The Sun mentions the appointment of G. P. R. James as British Consul at Norfolk, Va.

Madame Otto Goldschmidt and husband have gone to Vienna for retirement.

In Poland great damage has been done by rain storms.

The Copenhagen Crystal Palace opened on the 6th August.

A French war steamer has seized three English schooners for fishing within three miles of France.

Cholera is raging malignantly in Russia.

The overland East India and China mail reached London on the 15th inst., with dates from Hong Kong to June 22; Bombay, July 4; Calcutta, July 3; Madras, July 9. This arrival brought no news of the missing steamer with the Bombay mail of 25th June. The repulse of the Burmese in their second attempt to recapture Martaban, and the storm and capture of Pegu by the British force, are confirmed. It seems pretty certain that the Empire of Burmah after its conquest will be annexed to the Anglo Indian possessions in the East.

The Friend of China, speaking of the Rebellion, remarks that, on the whole, affairs bear an alarming aspect, and it is impossible to tell what may come next. It is now too evident that this insurrection is different from the various risings that occurred during the reign of the last Emperor. TIEN-TEH may or may not be the man he is by some represented to be, viz: a descendant of the displaced dynasty of MING. But, apart from the man himself, we have the knowledge that secret societies exist throughout the Empire, the chief of which, the Triads, are waiting patiently for the signal that heaven, earth, and man combine, to favor them in their determination to drive the Tartar out of the country. We have been told by those who have been long in the interior, that silent though the lower order of the people appear to be, the occurrence of insurrection in any province is carefully noted. In one province, during the war between England and China, a report ran that when the British went to Nankin, their object was to place an Emperor of the old family on the throne, and joy at the thought of such a consummation was quite openly displayed.

Four days Later.

The steamer Arctic, with Liverpool dates to Aug. 25, arrived at New York on Sunday evening, Sept. 5, with four days later news, and a long list of passengers, among whom was Madam Sontag, "the mistress of song." Rev. F. C. Woodworth, editor of the Youth's Cabinet, was also a passenger.

During the week to Aug. 22d, ten ships, including the Great Britain steamship, of the aggregate register of 9,690 tuns, sailed from the port of Liverpool for Australia, with 3,000 emigrants.

Three arrivals from Australia have brought 30,278 ounces of gold, and report another ship due with 15,465 ounces. Great difficulty was found in procuring sailors, and from £45 to £50 per man was asked and obtained for the run to England. At Malbourne, middle of April, provisions were dear.

Three English gentlemen—Mansfield, Compred, and Thompson—have undertaken to sail from London to Constantinople in an open skiff 25 feet long by 3 wide. They have arrived at Rendsburg.

A snake ten or twelve feet long, and of a venomous description, recently made its appearance in the cabin of the ship Radient, when near the English coast, on the way from Moulmein, East Indies. After a running fight the reptile was killed.

A boiler explosion occurred at Finsley Works, Burnley, on the 20th, scalding eleven and killing four persons.

A letter from Florenee states that a Madame Madial has been sentenced to 45 months hard labor at the galleys, and her husband to 56 months, for leaving the communion of the Roman Church. The Court of Cassation, in session on the 7th, rejected their appeal for a revision of the sentence.

California News.

The steamer Prometheus, from San Juan, with two weeks later news from California, has arrived at New York since our last.

The advices by the Prometheus are favorable. The shipments of gold from San Francisco, by the Oregon, on freight, and in the hands of passengers, is probably $2,600,000, a larger amount than ever before shipped at one time, and private letters say that these large shipments will continue. The mining news is favorable, and the production, it is thought, will be 30 per cent. larger during the next four months, than during the same period of last year.

The mail made up at the Post Office for the steamer Oregon, is said to be one of the largest, if not the largest mail, that has yet left San Francisco. The number of letters reach 60,000, and 30,000 newspapers—giving two letters and one newspaper to every man, woman and child in the city. The newspaper figure falls about 10,000 short of the usual number dispatched by the steamers, which is accounted for in the short supply of printing paper, which compels the temporary discontinuance of the Steamer Papers. Notwithstanding this large amount of business and limited number of clerks, the mails are sorted and dispatched with as much rapidity and correctness as in either New York, Philadelphia, or Boston.

Within a short time three attempts have been made to fire the City of Marysville. In each of these cases the city narrowly escaped a general conflagration. In consequence of these attempts, the Vigilance Committee has reorganized, and are making every possible endeavor to ferret out the guilty ones.

The Journal states, on the authority of Lieut. Couts, that not less than 50,000 head of fat cattle are now on their way from the southern portion of the State to the mines.

Sheep, to the number of 2,200, had recently arrived from Salt Lake, at Wolfskill Ranch, twenty miles from Sacramento. They were brought by Messrs. McMahan and Peters, and left St. Josephs in June, 1851, wintering in the Mormon country.

It is reported that the Indians, to the number of two thousand, are to hold a grand council shortly, at the head waters of the San Joaquin, with a view, it is feared, to unite against the white settlers.

Two Weeks Later.

The steamship Daniel Webster arrived at New Orleans, Sept. 4th, from San Juan Nicaragua, with dates from San Francisco to the 14th of August, being only twenty days and twelve hours from the latter city—performing the quickest trip ever made between the two places, and bringing a fortnight's later intelligence from San Francisco, and Panama dates to the 29th of August.

The passengers crossed from ocean to ocean in about forty-three hours, and speak highly of the route. The Daniel Webster reports the Isthmus as being in a perfectly healthy condition, and the navigation of the river St. John without impediment.

The California news possesses several features of interest—the most cheering of which is the announcement of the safety of the clipper ship Staffordshire, which arrived out at San Francisco in a passage of one hundred and one days from Boston.

The grand funeral procession in memory of Henry Clay, for which the most extensive preparations had been made, came off on the 10th of August. A number of societies participated in it, and it is said to have been the largest ever seen in that city. Some 500 Chinese merchants and traders appeared in the procession, and conducted themselves with the utmost propriety.

At Sacramento an angry political discussion occurred between Hon. Edward Gilbert, senior Editor of The Alta California, and Member of Congress, and Gen. Deuree. A challenge passage between them, and a hostile meeting took place. Mutual friends endeavored to effect a reconciliation, but without effect. They fought, and Edward Gilbert was killed.

Several cases of lynching had occurred at Marysville, but no executions were reported. A man named Henderson, belonging to New York, was so severely whipped that his life was despaired of. Two or three fires had occured, but no serious damage was done.

There are frightful reports of the ravages of the cholera among the seven hundred troops on board the steamer Golden Gate (before reported from Panama for San Francisco.)

The mining intelligence, owing to the dryness of the season, is less favorable; but rich discoveries of gold have been made on Klamerte, Salmon, and Rogue Rivers.

Another Wholesale Murder.

Last Sabbath (Saturday) the Hudson River was the scene of another awful calamity, resulting in the loss of from twenty-five to fifty lives. It seems that the steamer Reindeer, Capt. C. W. Farnham, started from New York at 8 o'clock for Albany, with some three hundred passengers on board. She ran as far as Bristol, or above one hundred miles, stopping at various places to land and take in passengers, without once letting off steam. She stopped at Saugerties, as elsewhere, the engineer sedulously keeping the valves closed. The bell rang for the wheels to be put in motion again; but no sooner was this signal obeyed, than one of the pipes exploded, and the scalding vapor rushed forth, enveloping the crowd assembled unsuspectingly at dinner, killing ten or twelve on the spot, and inflicting such injury on others that they must die in torture more or less prolonged. The scene of devastation, of suffering, and of terror, is spoken of by those who beheld it as something awful and heart-rending.

The pipe which burst connects the flues, called the connection of the return flues. The steam forced its way through a partition between decks, and thence through a pantry into the lower cabin, where a large number of passengers were dining. It is said that nearly every person in that cabin was killed or seriously injured—a majority of whom are believed to be waiters at the table. The force of the steam also carried away the smoke pipe, which fell across the hurricane deck, breaking it down. Above the deck no one was injured except the engineers and cooks. The explosion occurred shortly after 1 o'clock P. M. on Saturday. Up to Sunday evening at 7 o'clock, twenty-seven deaths had occurred, and it is quite likely that others of the scalded can not live.

The Reindeer was considered to be in an excellent condition—this being the second season that she has been upon the line. The cost of her was about $100,000. She was 322 feet long, 34 feet wide, and 9 deep. Her burden, 850 tons. Mr. Thomas Collyer built her for Captain De Groot. She was launched March 2, 1850.

THE LAKE ERIE ACCIDENT.—The Coroner of Erie summoned a jury to hold an inquest on the body of an unknown girl, about ten years of age, which was brought in by the propeller Ogdensburg, and after the examination of a number of witnesses, the following verdict was rendered:—

"The jurors find that DeGrass McNett, the first mate of the propeller Ogdensburg, was then on duty, and was on deck. That the night was calm and clear. That, from his own evidence, he saw the lights of the Atlantic when she was from three to four miles off, and until the collision; that he saw the two boats approach each other, yet gave no order to the wheelsman until within three or four rods of the Atlantic. That, by his own evidence, if he had directed the wheelsman a short time sooner, the collision would have been avoided, but he did not, because he believed the Ogdensburg was in her proper course, and the Atlantic was not. Without determining whether there was carelessness or not on the part of those on duty on the Atlantic, the jury would not faithfully discharge their duty, did they not find DeGrass McNett, the first mate of the Ogdensburg, guilty of gross carelessness, and a wicked disregard of human life. The jurors aforesaid, find that the deceased came to her death by means of such carelessness."

SUMMARY.

The Savannah Republican says the most distressing accounts have been received from Augusta of the destruction of life and property in that city by the late storm. Both bridges across the Savannah River were carried away, with all the bridges across the Canal. The water rose four feet, in the streets. One or two houses were washed away and several lives lost. The cars on the Railroad could not approach within a mile of the city, and the mails were taken to the Post-Office in canal boats. The damage to property in the city is estimated at $1,000,000.

The Boston Traveler learns from Bennington, Vt., that about 3 o'clock on Saturday morning, the Powder Mills in that place, belonging to J. Larkin, Esq., exploded with a terrible crash, tearing them entirely to pieces, and occasioning a loss of from $2,500 to $3,000. The buildings that were destroyed consisted of the Kerneling and Pulverizing Mills. This is the fifth time these mills have been destroyed, within a few years. The cause, it is supposed, was friction of the machinery, as the mills run during the night. No one hurt.

Notice is given by the Secretary of the New York State Temperance Alliance, that, owing to the cholera at Rochester, the meeting called at that place for the 15th inst. will be held at Utica instead. It is earnestly hoped that every County Alliance will be represented by its appropriate number of Delegates, and that at the mass meetings of the afternoon and evening, Delegates from all Temperance organizations and Local Alliances will be present.

The freshets in Georgia and Alabama have proved most disastrous. At Mobile a house was blown down and five persons killed. All the vessels in the port were injured, and some of them were blown into the woods. Three steamers were lost. The light-house was carried off with a whole family aboard of it. The wharves were all destroyed, and the surrounding country inundated. At Hamburg, Ga., water was six feet deep in the streets, and a Mr. Rossiter was drowned.

Mr. Leon Lewenburg, an Astronomer of our City, proposes to give an eligible site for an Observatory, 350 feet above the Hudson, on the Palisades, one mile above Fort Lee, and to include in the donation a Telescope worth $2,000, provided $10,000 will be subscribed by others toward building an Observatory there. He suggests 400 shares of $25 each as the proper mode of obtaining the desired result.

Two boys went into a cow-field at Kendall, Ill., for the purpose of having some sport with the cattle. They tied ends of a long rope round their waists, with slipped knots, and driving the cattle over it, tripped them down by suddenly raising it. One of the cattle caught the rope on its horns and ran away, dragging the boys for some distance. When rescued they were both insensible, and their waists compressed to four and six inches in circumference. Both died.

A company has been formed at Mansfield, Mass., for the purpose of emigrating to Oregon. At the head of this company is Capt. Baird. F. H. Ames, is Clerk, to whom any communication relating to this object should be addressed. The Company intend to embark in a ship for Oregon, before many months, in time to reach that country so as to become inheritors of the bounty lands offered new settlers by Congress. To realize this, they must enter on their occupancy before the expiration of 1853.

The only surviving member of a company of eighty soldiers, engaged in the Mexican war, was baptized in Buffalo two weeks ago. He was in the battles of Monterey, Cerro Gordo, Contreras, and Cherubusco, and before the close of the war, more than nine-tenths of his comrades had fallen, either by the hand of the enemy or the cholera. His last associate died a few weeks ago.

At the last accounts, says the Journal of Commerce, Kossuth was in London, living in great privacy, and without attracting observation. He is said, with what degree of truth we know not, to regard the Derby administration with distrust, and to fancy that it would, if possible, betray him to the Austrian Government.

A Letter from Rockport, Cape Ann, states that on the 24th, the harbor from Halibut Point to Straitsmouth Island was literally full of mackerel. There were between three and four hundred barrels taken by seine in the town, which, together with what were caught with the hook, will not fall far short of a thousand barrels.

"The New York Teacher," devoted to Popular Education, is to be published monthly at Albany, commencing with next month. It is to be the special organ of the New York State Teachers' Association. $1 per annum, 32 pages monthly. T. W. Valentine, local Editor.

The Barre Patriot states that Mr. William Cowee, of West Brookfield, has now growing in his garden a cucumber four feet in length, minus one inch. He has another of the same species which is about three feet long. This statement is made upon the authority of a gentleman who has measured those vegetable monsters.

A horrible affair has occurred on the mountains above Cumberland, Maryland. A man named James Mals was abusing his children, when his wife interfered. He then commenced loading his gun, avowing his intention to shoot her, when she seized an axe and killed him. She was arrested, but subsequently discharged from custody.

A dispatch dated Jonesville, Mich., Sept. 1, 1852, says: Two boys named Fisher and Van Horn, while playing in a bin of wheat belonging to the Railroad Company, when the men were loading the cars with it, were drawn under the wheat and smothered before they could be rescued.

The brig Sarah, of Prospect, Me., L. S. Griffin, master, arrived at Surinam on the 28th ult., from Demarara, the Captain, both mates, and one man sick with the yellow fever, having been attacked on the passage up, and on the 30th the whole four died, within a short time of each other, and were buried at the quarantine ground.

A tremendous storm occurred at Mobile on Wednesday and Thursday, Aug. 26 and 27, doing damage, it is estimated, to the extent of $1,000,000. The water extended up Dauphin-st., as far as the Advertiser office. Many steamers were injured, houses were unroofed, and some blown completely down.

Mr. Henry Wells, agent for the American Express Company, reports finding the wreck of the Atlantic. It is about 5 miles from Long Point Light, 3 miles from land, and in 160 feet of water. No bodies have been found. The safe and money of the Express Company will be recovered.

A German, named Jacob Clink, of Syracuse, N. Y., while carrying a keg of powder, with a lighted pipe in his mouth, was blown up and killed by the accidental communication of a spark from the pipe to the explosive material.

A correspondent of the Journal of Commerce says that Washington suffers very much from the prevalence of fever and ague. The atmosphere of some parts of Washington is impregnated with moisture, and many of the roofs are thickly covered with moss.

Mr. Bunch, the British Vice-Consul at New York, has lately returned from England, where he made a visit for the purpose of raising funds by subscription, for a church and hospital at New York, in which mission he seems to have been eminently successful.

A correspondent of the Boston Atlas says there are at least 400 dwelling-houses in Boston which are appraised at above $20,000. There are several at $50,000 and upward, and one house, with the land connected with it, is taxed for upward of $100,000.

In Williamsburgh, the other day, a lad aged 15 years was brought before Justice King for the fourth time, on the charge of being an habitual drunkard, and a burden to his parents. He was sentenced to the Penitentiary for the term of 60 days.

It is stated that Mrs. Stowe, the authoress of Uncle Tom's Cabin, has engaged to write a popular tale upon the effect of the Maine Liquor Law, intended for wide circulation by the friends of the Law.

The Directors of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company have provided medicine chests for each train of cars, so that in case of sickness or an accident, the proper remedies will be accessible at the shortest notice.

A dispatch dated Rochester, Friday, Sept. 3, 1852, says: The Board of Health report seven deaths from cholera during the last forty-eight hours, an abatement of 50 per cent. since the last report.

There are in the United States eighty-one women holding the office of postmaster, thirty-one of whom are in Pennsylvania. Some of these are important offices.

The death of Prof. Kingsley, a distinguished member of the Faculty of Yale College, took place on Tuesday, the 31st ult., at his residence in New Haven.

The Washington (Texas) Lone Star reports that President Fillmore has authorized Governor Bell to call out five hundred rangers to serve on the frontier.

Mr. Amos Raymond, a Revolutionary pensioner, died recently at Allegany Township, Petter Co., Pa., aged 95 years and 5 months.

The storm on Sabbath night, Aug. 28, was very severe in some parts of New Jersey. In Monmouth County the roads were guilled and cut up; at least three-fourths of all the bridges were torn up; more than half the great corn crop of the County was partially or wholly prostrated; many Potatoes were washed out of the ground; and an immense amount of Fruit was beaten from the trees, which were seriously injured. Probaby $100,000 worth of damage was sustained in the mere washing away of fertile soil in that County.

The editor of the New England Farmer has seen a stool of California barley, the product of a single seed, which measures near the roots thirteen inches in circumference. From this one root there sprung one hundred and twelve vigorous straws or stems, one hundred and thirty-one heads, and fourteen thousand one hundred and forty-eight kernels of barley! The stool grew near a spring, where it found plenty of water, and threw up stalks about six feet high. Each head has six rows of kernels.

The plan adopted for the New York World's Fair building is a Greek cross, with a dome over the intersection. Each diameter of the cross is 365 feet long and 149 feet broad, and the dome is 130 feet high. There will be in this building 111,000 square feet of space on the ground floor, and 62,000 square feet in the galleries. It is estimated to cost $195,000. The building is to be entirely of iron and glass, and is already advertised to be open on the 2d day of May, 1853.

The St Louis Intelligencer states that several steamboats running from that city have banished the bar usually kept for the accommodation of passengers. This is a great, necessary, and important movement, and will perhaps contribute as much toward preserving the safety of the boats on the Western waters as the measure of river improvements itself, while its moral influence will prove incomparable.

Mr. Edward Clarke, of Pittsburgh, publishes a statement describing a new nose made for him by Dr. Pancoast, of that city, to supply the one he had lost some sixteen years ago. A piece of flesh from the forehead was sewed into the cheeks; a gutta percha mould of his father's nose was placed over it to give it the proper shape, and gold tubes were inserted for the nostrils. He says he has now a new nose, sound and well formed, with the senses of feeling and smell as fine as they ever were.

The Newburyport Herald says a farmer of Newbury has brought to that market this season superior ripe potatoes raised from sprouts alone. His course has been to start the potatoes early in a hot-bed, and when the sprouts were several inches in length, to remove them from the potato into rows in good soil, about eight inches apart. He is thus enabled to obtain ripe potatoes several weeks earlier than by the common practice.

Two captains were recently tried on a charge of "habitual drunkenness," before the Liverpool Local Marine Board. The charge was proved, and the sentence was, "that neither of the captains can again proceed to sea as master, mate, or second mate of any foreign-going British ship."

At Memphis, recent rain storms destroyed property to the amount of $20,000. The corn and cotten fields of adjacent counties were entirely washed down.

MARRIED,

In Alfred, N. Y., Sept. 2d, Mr. EPHRAIM MAXSON, of West Edmeston, to Miss ZEURIAH VINCENT, of Alfred.

On the 1st inst., by Eld. L. B. Starr, WILLIAM F. STILLMAN to Miss SUSAN BRAND, both of Leonardsville.

DIED,

In Brookfield, N. Y., Aug. 21st, Mrs. LOUISA CLARKE, widow of the late Charles Clarke, aged 71 years.

At Shiloh, N. J., Aug. 30th, of bilious dysentery, ELIAS B., youngest child of Jeremy B. and Anna S. Keen, aged 3 years, 6 months, and 7 days. D. C.

In Camden, N. J., at the residence of his son-in-law, Mr. Robert Sutton, August 19th, Mr. CHARLES F. RANDOLPH, in the 54th year of his age. He was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Shiloh, N. J., for which, in his last days, he expressed great interest and love. His friends have confidence that death, which he received as a welcomed messenger, to him was inestimable gain. He has left behind a large circle of mourning friends, to whom he had endeared himself as an affectionate parent, kind neighbor, conscientious Christian, and valuable citizen. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

At Carltown, N. J., on the 31st ult., of imbecility, which for more than a year had confined him to the house, and most of the time to the bed, Dr. THOS. W. PECK, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. Funeral on the 2d of Sept., at the Presbyterian meeting-house at Greenwich; sermon by the writer, from Dan. 12: 13.

A Year of Music for Nothing!—almost.

THE MUSICAL WORLD AND TIMES IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY, AT 257 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, BY OLIVER DYER AND RICHARD STORRS WILLIS.

THE object of this work is to furnish, 1.—A weekly supply of new and choice music. 2.—A complete and anusual Course of Musical Instruction. 3—Fearless and trustworthy Criticisms of Musical Pieces, Works, and Performances, and 4—Entertaining Musical Reading, together with a comprehensive Synopsis of events and things Musical, as they shall transpire; all to be furnished in a style of taste and elegance in harmony with the subjects treated of, and the refined minds of those to whom such topics are addressed.

THE SIZE of The Musical World and Times is that which is most conducive to convenience and beauty; being a Royal Quarto of sixteen pages, ten by fourteen inches in size, or more than double the size of the pages of magazines. It is printed on handsome paper and clear type; and its appearance is such as to render it an appropriate ornament of the Pianoforte, or Parlor table.

MUSIC.—Each number of the Musical World and Times will contain at least FOUR PAGES of superior and popular music, making over TWO HUNDRED PAGES OF MUSIC YEARLY; which, bought at Music Stores would cost, at least, $25.

SACRED MUSIC.—Particular attention will be paid to this department, and the wants of country choirs and families will be carefully studied and met.

SECULAR MUSIC.—The best possible variety of Secular Music, Vocal and Instrumental, will be regularly given, to supply which, the most eminent composers will render service.

MUSIC FOR LITTLE FINGERS.—Young children and learners will also be cared for. The world and the interests of Art will hardly progress without them; therefore, in our selection of music, we shall always bear them in mind, and often furnish a page for their especial benefit.

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION.—A complete course of Musical Instruction will be given; including Elementary Instruction, Harmony, Thorough Bass and Composition, Musical Form, or the Architecture of Music, and Instrumentation. Musical exercises will accompany this instruction, and the student will be able to correct his own examples by the rules afforded. In short, the student may become, by this course, master of the whole subject of music.

CRITICISMS.—These will be impartial, truthful, and perfectly independent—just what is needed in this age of indiscriminate and unlimited puffery.

MUSICAL NEWS.—Our facilities for obtaining both foreign and domestic musical news of interest are unequalled; and all events of importance will be recorded.

MUSICAL READING.—Musical literature—a class of reading as interesting as it in difficult to furnish—will always be found in our columns. We are enabled to do this by our facilities of translation, and by the access, which we have lately gained, to unusually rich artistic materials

IMPORTANT.—The subscribers announce with pleasure, that they have the active co-operation and practical assistance of Lowell Mason, Wm. Vincent Wallace, Thos. Hastings, Wm. B. Bradbury, Geo. J. Webb, Jonas Chickering, Oliver Ditson, Geo. F. Root, Firth, Pond & Co., Wm. Hall & Son, Mason & Law, Newman & Ivison, and other parties long and favorably known to the musical public.

The New Postage Act.

Approved August 30, 1852.

AN ACT to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3d, 1851.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the thirtieth day of September, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, the postage upon all printed matter passing through the mail of the United States, instead of the rates now charged, shall be as follows, to wit: Each newspaper, periodical, unsealed circular, or other article of printed matter, not exceeding three ounces in weight, shall be sent to any part of the United States for one cent; and for every additional ounce, or fraction of an ounce, one cent additional shall be charged; and when the postage upon any newspaper or periodical is paid yearly or quarterly in advance at the office where the same is mailed, and evidence of such payment is furnished to the office of delivery in such manner as the Post-Office Department shall by general regulation prescribe, one-half of said rate only shall be charged. Newspapers and periodicals, not weighing over one ounce and a half, when circulated in the State where published, shall be charged one-half of the rates before mentioned: Provided, That small newspapers and periodicals, published monthly or oftener, and pamphlets, not containing more than sixteen octavo pages each, when sent in single packages, weighing at least eight ounces, to one address, and prepaid by affixing postage stamps thereto, shall be charged only half of a cent for each ounce, or fraction of an ounce, notwithstanding the postage calculated on each separate article of such package would exceed that amount. The postage on all transient matter shall be prepaid by stamps or otherwise, or shall be charged double the rates first above mentioned.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That books, bound or unbound, not weighing over four pounds, shall be deemed mailable matter, and shall be chargeable with postage at one cent an ounce for all distances under three thousand miles, and two cents an ounce for all distances over three thousand miles, to which fifty per cent. shall be added in all cases where the same may be sent without being prepaid, and all printed matter chargeable by weight shall be weighed when dry. The publishers of newspapers and periodicals may send to each other from their respective offices of publication, free of postage, one copy of each publication; and may also send to each actual subscriber, inclosed in their publications, bills and receipts for the same free of postage. The publishers of weekly newspapers may send to each actual subscriber within the county where their papers are printed and published, one copy thereof free of postage.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no newspaper, periodical, magazine, or other printed paper or matter, shall be entitled to be sent at the rates of postage in this act specified, unless the following conditions be observed: First. It shall be sent without any cover or wrapper; or in a cover or wrapper open at the ends or sides, so that the character of the matter contained therein may be determineed without removing such wrapper. Second. There shall be no word or communication printed on the same after its publication, or upon the cover or wrapper thereof, except the name and address of the person to whom it is to be sent. Third. There shall be no paper or other thing inclosed in or with such printed paper; and if these conditions are not complied with, such printed matter shall be subject to letter postage; and all matter sent by mail from one part of the United States to another, the postage of which is not fixed by the provisions of this act, shall, unless the same be entitled to be sent free of postage, be charged with letter postage.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if the publisher of any periodical, after being three months previously notified that his publication is not taken out of the office to which it is sent for delivery, continue to forward such publication in the mail, the postmaster to whose office such publication is sent may dispose of the same for the postage, unless the publisher shall pay it; and whenever any printed matter, of any description, received during one qaarter of the fiscal year, shall have remained in the office without being called for during the whole of any succeeding quarter, the postmaster at such office shall sell the same, and credit the proceeds of such sale in his quarterly accounts, under such regulations and after such notice as the Post-Office Department shall prescribe.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act entitled "An act to modify and reduce the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," approved March third, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, as relates to the postage or free circulation or transmission of newspapers, periodicals, and other printed matter, and all other provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That when a list of uncalled-for letters shall be published in any newspaper printed in any foreign language, said list shall be published in such newspaper having the largest circulation within the range of delivery of said office.

A "Haunted House" in Cincinnati.

On that great shopping thoroughfare—Fifth street—in the heart of the city, between Western-row and John, there is a fine modern-built brick house of three stories, containing a store-room and eight or ten other large rooms. Investigation has developed nothing remarkable in the construction or appearance of any portion of the house, which is altogether a desirable residence. The property is owned by a widow lady, Mrs. Warfield, who some time since leased it for a term of years to a Mr. Wales; Mr. W. soon after transferred his lease to Mr. James, and Mr. James recently sold it to Mr. Carter. The latter gentleman occupies the store-room, and a few days since rented the other part of the building to a Mr. Edwards, as a boarding-house. Mr. E. had been in the house but a few days—just long enough to get comfortably fixed—when, on last Wednesday evening, about ten o'clock, a noise similar to the discharge of a pistol was heard in an upper front room, but on examination no cause for the report could be ascertained. Several hours afterward, and when the family and boarders had retired, a succession of reports were heard by all the inmates of the house, accompanied by loud screams from a room where were several young lady boarders and a daughter of Mr. Edwards. The whole house was aroused, and rushing in the direction of the sound, found the young ladies in the utmost trepidation from terror. They declared that the "pistol shots" were made at their bed-side, repeated as from a revolver, and that they distinctly saw flashes of red light following each report. One of the girls, pale and almost senseless from fright, affirmed that just at the moment of the sounds, a tall, dark figure twice stooped over her pillow. Such was the excited condition of the whole family, that cots were prepared for all in one room, and the remainder of the night was passed in company, but no further disturbance was experienced.

On Thursday, at about noon, another sharp report was made in the kitchen, and for several hours during the day a noise was heard in the dining-room resembling the pawing of a horse, or the morticing of a carpenter in heavy timber.

The occupant, not inclined to pass another night in a manner so disagreeable, and unable to retain his boarders there, rented another house and moved out on Thursday. A party of persons, curious in such matters, spent the night there, but no noises were heard.

The owner of the property threatens to sue the tenant for damages, in giving the house the character of being "haunted," by circulating tales, and leaving the place; while Mr. E. thinks that damages should be given him, inasmuch as he was not informed of the reports previous to his renting it, which he understands were currently believed in the neighborhood regarding its "ghosts." Not only has the matter taken this phase, but the present lessee, upon the same grounds, demands the annulling of his contract, and so all that have been concerned in the building are asking reparation for their losses.

Taking this affair altogether, it is most curious. The residents in the vicinity say that the building has borne the character of a "haunted house" for several years, and that no family has been willing, of late, to remain any great length of time; the noises frighten them away. As there is always a solution to such mystery, we inquired after it, and were informed by one person that a carpenter, whose shop had occupied the ground, had been murdered there, that he could not rest until he had been revenged, and that he would reveal all to a "writing medium!" Another report was that the celebrated clairvoyant, Mrs. Bushnel, had reported a conversation which she had with the restless spirit, which revealed that it was a man whose last will had been destroyed with the design of defrauding an orphan girl, and that when reparation was made, he would cease to trouble the house! It was also reported that parties residing in the city were implicated in the unholy transaction, and that efforts were silently making to bring them to justice, and restore to the orphan what she long since should have possessed—a goodly fortune!

All this gossip we relate as it is current in the neighborhood of the "haunted house," and say nothing in regard to the correctness of any portion, save that the noises are heard—of that there is no question, and the solution of the matter would make an interesting page alongside the story of the "Cock Lane Ghost." Cultivation of the Willow.

On Saturday last we had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of Mr. Wilson G. Haynes, of Putnam County, New York, who visited our city as a Delegate to the Free Soil National Convention.

Mr. Haynes is, we believe, the only person in the United States who has paid much attention to the cultivation of the Ozier, or Basket Willow, and until our interview with him we were not aware of its importance, and of the facilities for its cultivation.

It is estimated that there are some $5,000,000 worth of willow annually imported into this country, and the amount is rapidly increasing, as the necessities of the country for the articles in which it is used increase. All this willow could be grown here to advantage. The price ranges from $100 to $150 per tun. The chief importation is from France and Germany.

It is generally supposed that willow must be grown on wet or marshy lands, or near ponds or running water. This, Mr. Haynes tells us, is a mistake. He says the best basket willow can be grown on uplands of a clayey soil. The soil should be rich, and about as much attention should be given to the plant as to Indian corn. It should be cultivated and kept free from weeds. The first year the produce will be but little, unless the cuttings are large, but every year afterward the produce will afford ample profit. By the fourth year the plant arrives at perfection, and will annually thereafter yield its crop, provided it is properly cultivated. Plants in this State will throw up shoots twelve feet high in a season, of an inch in diameter, and without a knot.

This is the most valuable willow for manufacturing purposes, as it can be easily split.

Mr. Haynes, who is engaged in the growing and manufacturing of willow, says he grows as good willow as can be imported from any part of the world, and makes a profit in the growth, over all expenses, of about $150 per acre. He says that willow can be grown profitably in this country at $50 per tun, and he shows his own confidence by investing all the means he can command in the growth of the plant. He is importing great numbers of the cuttings, from different parts of Europe, and will soon have considerable ground under cultivation.

But it is principally for fencing purposes that Mr. Haynes thinks the willow can be made most useful in this country. This question of fencing is soon to become one of immense moment to farmers. It is certain some substitute must be found for timber, as the supply will soon be exhausted. Mr. Haynes, who has traveled extensively in Europe, to investigate this subject, says that fences which the most powerful animals could not force are made by the willow plant in two or three years. The manner of planting for fencing is to place the ends of strong cuttings in the ground, and then work them into a sort of trellis-work, passing a willow withe around the tops or ends, to keep them in shape for the first year or two. The tops are cut off yearly and sold to the basket-makers, thus affording a handsome profit on the fence.

There are great varieties of willow. The Salix Viminalis is the best for basket-makers, and experiments have tested that it will thrive and propagate in this country. An acre of this, properly planted on a suitable soil, and properly cultivated, will yield about two tuns weight per annum, costing about $35 per tun for cultivating and preparing it for market.

The Salix Capua is also good for baskets, and is used extensively for hoop poles and fencing, in England.

The Salix Alba, white willow, is a favorite in England, for shade trees. I grows more rapidly than any other tree, and makes a rich and beautiful shade. It is planted along avenues, water-courses, and on the margin of fish-ponds and mill-dams. It gives a fine shade in two or three years. The bark is held in high estimation for tanning; the wood for shoe-maker's lasts, boot-trees, gun and pistol stocks, house timber, and is extensively used in the manufacture of gunpowder. It is fine grained, and susceptible of a high polish.

English Gardening, Etc.

Garden stuff comes to market early in the mother country. Peas are sown in November, and cabbages are planted at the same time, and will head in the following May. It is usual to sow radishes on new-year's day, upon a warm border in the open ground, and by covering them over with short straw or litter, they are sufficiently protected, and brought into early market.

An English gentleman prides himself in the beauty and productions of his garden. The even gravel walks, the ever verdant box edging, the closely-mown lawn, the weeping fountain, ornamental trees of almost every variety, and a profusion of flowers, are among the first sources of rational pleasure with which he loves to regale himself in his leisure hours, and to entertain his friends in the style of English hospitality.

Gardening in the mother country is a distinct business, practiced by a certain class of laborers, who have been trained to it; and they receive higher wages than workmen upon a farm. There are but few farmers or householders who do not employ an individual of this class long enough to keep their gardens in good condition.

The grape does not appear to beindigenous in England, but several imported varieties of the vine, both the white and the purple, bear very well, and the fruit comes to perfection, unless the season should prove to be very late. The Queen has, at one of her palaces, the largest vine in the country, yielding, I believe, some thousand of bunches every season. The white sweet water grape appears to be most extensively cultivated, as it comes to muturity early, and is adapted to the climate.

The cherry is found wild, but the fruit is smaller and more bitter than with us. The large black heart, the white heart, and the early duke, are excellent, both in size and flavor. The last mentioned is a red fruit, and is fit for eating in the month of May. The common red cherry, used here for culinary purposes, is there trained upon walls, and is greatly appreciated for domestic cooking. There is a late sort of half-wild cherry, called the mazzard, which matures later than any other, and is something like what grows so generally among us; and is valued, principally, on account of its being in season when all others have passed away.

The gooseberry, in England, is free from those diseases which attack it so often here. It grows very large. I have seen none here that begin to compare with it. The red currant here, I think, is fully equal to any elsewhere; but the white and the black with us are both inferior in size and flavor. These bushes, in this country, owing to the quickness of vegetation, are more liable to throw out suckers, and produce too much wood, which requires pruning off, to prevent the fruit from deteriorating.

Creeping vines, which produce the melon, cucumber, squash, and pumpkin, are more uncertain. The melon can be raised only under a frame. The squash I never saw until in this country; nor is the pumpkin raised there for cattle. It is sometimes produced in gardens, like the Indian corn, as a rarity. To sell an old countryman pumpkin-pies, a dish of squash, a plate of tomatoes, or of buckwheat cakes, would indeed raise his wonder, and cause him again to think the Yankees truly a queer people.

A foreigner riding through the mother country has his attention frequently arrested by the mansions of noblemen and country squires, and the remains of abbeys and ancient castles. These are generally surrounded by parks of great extent. In these beautiful, Eden-like inclosures, deer are preserved; while, upon the surrounding farms, game, including the partridge and pheasant, are looked after by a person called the game-keeper, who is always an appendage to these domains of land. The park itself is generally studded with horned cattle, grazing at their leisure, while large flocks of sheep are pastured upon the same. The woods of old English oak are the pride of the land-owners; and an old countryman always regards them with stirred feelings, they are so connected with the national glory of his native soil. These have been the material which have formed the wooden walls of his fatherland. Most of the parks are beautified with clusters and rows of these kings of the forest, which not only add to the grandeur of the scenery, but also to the value of the estate.

The State Prison Convict.

The following account of the reformation of a convict, gives a very forcible illustration of the power of love to reform even the most hardened of our race:—

"Many years ago there was brought to the State prison in Connecticut, a man of giant stature and of desperate character, one whose crimes had for seventeen years been the terror of the country. The Warden was a Christian—a Christian not in name only, but in deed and in truth—one who had more than usual faith in the power of kindness. When the prisoner came, he took off his irons and addressed him thus—'Friend, you are now placed in my care; it will be best for us to treat each other as well as we can. I shall try to make you as comfortable as possible, and shall be anxious to be your friend, and I hope you will get me into no difficulty on your account. There is a cell here for solitary confinement, but I have never used it, and I should be very sorry to turn the key upon any human being in it. You may range the place as freely as I do—only trust me, and I will you.'

"The desperado, though evidently surprised, seemed but little affected by this kindness, and for weeks to soften very slowly. True, he was not violent, but sulky; at length word came that he had attempted to break prison! The warden called him and charged him with it, but he gave no reply; his face was darkened by a ferocious scowl, and his lips sealed with sulky silence. He was told it would now be necessary to put him in the solitary cell. He was desired to follow the warden, who went before him carrying a lamp in one hand and the key in the other. In the narrowest part of the passage, the warden, a little, light-built man, turned short around, and with an eye beaming with kindness, looked up full into the face of the stout criminal, and said,

'I want to know if you have treated me as I deserve? I have done every thing to make you happy. I have trusted you, but you have never given me the least confidence in return. And you have even planned to get me into difficulty. Is this kind? And yet I cannot bear to lock you up. If I had the least sign that you cared for me'—

He had no need to say more—it was a dead shot! it had gone through the tough rind of his depravity, and had reached his very heart. The strong man was subdued, and bursting into tears, wept like a child.

'Sir,' said he, 'I have been a very devil these seventeen years, but you treat me like a man, and I can't resist it.'

'Come,' said the victorious warden, 'let's go back.'

The free range of the prison was again given him, and from that hour he became a new man—opening his heart to the kind warden, and fulfilling the whole term of his imprisonment in cheerfulness and content.

The world is just beginning to understand the meaning of the passage, 'We love him because he first loved us.'" [Ch. Ambass.

Inquiries about Manures.

We often have inquiries (says the editor of the Cultivator) whether long or short manure is best; whether straw plowed in is beneficial; whether chip-dirt is hurtful or advantageous, &c. General inquirers cannot always receive a general answer. For instance, we have known long manure, or that which was composed of much straw mixed with strongly fertilizing materials, prove actually injurious on light soils, and in dry seasons. On the contrary, we have known straw alone to prove highly beneficial on heavy and rather wet soils, by increasing the lightness and porosity, and facilitating drainage.

To prevent bad results on light land, all manure, but more especially that which is unfermented and mixed with straw, should be as much pulverized and mingled with the soil as possible. It should be first spread, and allowed to dry a few hours, the loss by evaporation being far less than the loss by want of pulverization. It can then be thoroughly torn to pieces by repeated harrowings, which will mix it thoroughly at the same time with the surface soil. When turned under by the plow, none of it will remain in lumps, and by being well intermixed, it will serve rather to preserve than to dissipate the moisture. The same treatment on heavy soils, will also have a beneficial result, by increasing the friability of the parts. In soils not over-supplied with vegetable matter, straw and chip dirt become useful as soon as they decay; and in adhesive soils they are useful by lessening the tenacity and promoting drainage. But on light soils they often prove hurtful, and most so in dry seasons.

Facts about Milk.

Cream cannot rise through a great depth of milk. If milk is, therefore, desired to retain its cream for a time, it should be put into a deep, narrow dish; and if it be desired to free it most completely of cream, it should be poured into a broad, flat dish, not exceeding one inch in depth. The evolution of cream is facilitated by a rise, and retarded by a depression of temperature. At the usual temperature of the dairy, 50 deg. Fahrenheit, all the cream will probably rise in twenty-six hours, but at 75 deg. it will probably all rise in less than half that time, and when the milk is kept near the freezing point, the cream will rise very slowly, because it becomes partially soldified.

In wet and cold weather, the milk is less rich than in dry and warm; and on that account more cheese is obtained in cold than in warm, though not in thundery weather. The season has its effects—the milk in the spring is supposed to be the best for calves, in the summer it is best suited for cheese, and in autumn the butter keeping better than that of summer. Cows less frequently milked than others give richer milk, and consequently much better. The morning's milk is richer than the evening's. The last drawn milk of each milking, at times and seasons, is richer than the first drawn, which is the poorest.

Animal Chemistry.

How seldom do we give a thought to the organization of the "house we live in," or the manner in which it is strengthened or undermined! We seem to think that it can take care of itself exactly as well without our aid as with it, and better too, perhaps. We don't reflect that, after all, we are mere animal, chemical machines, and that various substances combined in the human stomach present the same phenomena that they would in the receivers of a chemist's laboratory. For example, we see it stated that without lime the secretion of milk fails; "the bones and teeth become soft or are arrested in their delevopment; without soda, no bile can be formed; without phosphorus and magnesia, the nervous tissues lose their energy and the impaired condition of the brain is evinced by loss of memory, frightful headaches and impending paralysis.

"Ghastly paleness, prostration, faintness, and coldness attend the lack of carbon; deprived of sulphur, the hair would rapidly cease to grow, and the absence of iron is marked by lividity, disordered digestion, passive dropsy, and other symptoms of an anæmic or chlorotic character. The food we receive daily furnishes the natural source of these elementary substances, and serves during health to repair the waste of these matters through the skin, kidneys, and other excretories, consequent upon the voluntary and vegetable functions of the economy. Hence the equilibrium is preserved. Inordinate use of particular organs induces a disproportionate consumption of their substance, and hence of the elements from which this substance is formed. Excesses in watching, thought and muscular effort, for example, by overtaxing the brain and muscular fibre, render these tissues rapidly effete, and therefore cause an exaggerated demand for their peculiar pabulum, as phosphorus and iron." [St. Louis Times.

At the bombardment of Rangoon, Lieut. Campbell, of the Sesostris, worked so hard that he fell down exhausted, and slept alongside of a gun for an hour and a half, while it was discharging ten pounds of powder at every fire.

CHINESE CELEBRATION OF JULY 4TH.—The participation by the Chinese in the celebration of our National Anniversary at San Francisco, is described as follows:—

The great and principal feature of the procession was the Celestials, who turned out in astonishing numbers. There were no less than three or four hundred of these singular beings, who took an active part in commemorating this glorious day. Their procession was headed by four of their number, bearing a large flag made of silk, on which was the figure of a dragon having eyes made of looking glass. It was one of the richest specimens of art we have seen, and the cost of it alone was $2,000. Another banner in the procession, borne by some of their numbers, bore the emblematic words of "A rush for Republicanism," and "The 4th of July hereafter and forever a festival day for the Chinese." A carriage drawn by four grey horses contained a band of their native musicians, who, with their unwieldly and strange looking musical instruments, discoursed horrible harmony in an extravagant style. A large number of mandarins, in carriages and on horseback, were in attendance, while many followed on foot. The whole was under the command of Norman Assing, Esq., together with Sam Wo and several other of the prominent Chinese citizens.

BOYHOOD OF CAPTAIN COOK.—The discoveries of the English circumnavigator were owing to a particularly marked shilling. Young Cook was a native of Yorkshire, and served as apprentice to a merchant and shopkeeper, in a large fishing-town in that country. Some money had been missed from the till, and to detect the delinquent, a very curiously marked shilling was mixed with the silver, which was accurately counted. On examining the till shortly after, this peculiar shilling was missing, and Cook was taxed with having taken it out; this he instantly acknowledged, stating that its peculiarity had caught his eye, but affirming at the same time, that he had put another of his own in its place. The money was accordingly counted over again, and found to agree exactly with his statement. Although the family was highly respectable, and therefore capable of advancing him in his future prospects, and also much attached to him, and very kind, yet the high spirit of the boy could not brook remaining in a situation where he had been suspected; he therefore ran away, and, having no other resource, entered as cabin boy in a collier.

A CONJUGAL DIFFERENCE.—A fisherman on the Banks of the Rhine had been tormented by his pretty wife to go to the grand féte at Stratsburg, but he objected on account of the expense. Violent quarrels and even blows were the consequence, and discord reigned so much between them that it was decided they should go to the notary and be formally separated. They did so, and the notary, after vainly exerting all his eloquence to restore peace between the couple, promised to draw out the necessary documents. The parties then left, but on returning home a storm arose, and their boat foundered. The husband reached the shore by swimming, but the moment he landed he turned round and saw his wife struggling with the current. All their quarrels were in a moment forgotten, and he sprang into the river and saved her. On the following day they went together to the féte. [Assembalée Nationale.

THE STARS AND STRIPES.—A few weeks since a paragraph was going the rounds, inquiring when the present U. S. Flag was adopted. The Cincinnati Gazette replied thus:—

"The following is the original resolution adopting the Stars and Stripes:

"'In Congress, June 16, 1777—

"'Resolved, That the Flag of the thirteen United States be thirteen stripes, alternately red and white; that the Union be thirteen stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation.'

"As new States were added to the Union, from time to time, new stripes were added to the flag, till the number had increased to fifteen or twenty. At length, about thirty years ago, the stripes were reduced by act of Congress to the original number of thirteen."

THE SOAP PLANT.—It appears that the soap plant grows all over California. The leaves make their appearance about the middle of November, or about six weeks after the rainy season has fully set in; the plants never grow more than a foot high; and the leaves and stock drop entirely off in May, though the bulbs remain in the ground all summer without decaying. It is used to wash with in all parts of the country, and, by those who know its virtues, it is preferred to the best of soap. The method of using it is merely to strip off the husk, dip the clothes into water, and rub the bulb on them. It makes a thick lather, and smells not unlike brown soap. The botanical name of the plant is "Phalangium pomaridianum."

RAILROADS.—It is estimated that by the year 1860 there will have been finished, in the United States, 30,000 miles of railroad. The cost of the roads already in use is stated to be $350,000,000, and those now in progress, about 11,000 miles, may be completed for $165,500,000. The new railroads in the South and West are built at $15,000 a mile, while those in the older States cost $32,000 per mile. This results from the increased experience and skill applied to the new works, and the smaller rate of land damages in the new States.

In very dry seasons, it is very important to water trees that have been newly transplanted; but the common mode is very objectionable. When the water is poured on the surface, the soil is apt to crack and let the moisture below escape. Dig a hole near the tree and pour in a pailful; then draw the loose earth in till the hole is filled. Do not water oftener than once a week.

The first census taken in Winconsin was in 1841, and exhibited a population of 80,000 inhabitants; in 1850 they had swelled to 300,000—a ten fold increase in ten years. Now they do not fall short of 400,000, and are increasing at the rate of at least 50,000 per annum. No other State in the Union has grown with equal rapidity.

Man has 246 bones; the head and face 63, the trunk 59, the arms 64, and the lower extremities 60. There are in man 201 muscles, or pairs of muscles.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses, Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS:

Historical Sketch.

The Seventh-day Baptists are distinguished from the Regular Baptists mainly by the views which they hold on the subject of the Sabbath. In respect to this they believe—1st. That the Seventh Day of the Week was sanctified and blessed for the Sabbath in Paradise, and was designed for all mankind; 2d. That it forms a necessary part of the Ten Commandments, which are immutable in their nature, and universally binding; 3d. That no change as to the day of the Sabbath was made by Divine Authority at the introduction of Christianity; 4th. That those passages in the Old Testament which speak of the First Day of the Week, do not imply, either the substitution of that day for the Seventh as the Sabbath, or its appointment as a day of religious worship; 5th. That whatever respect the early Christians paid to the First Day of the Week, on the supposition of its being the day of Christ's resurrection, yet they never regarded it as the Sabbath, but continued to observe the Seventh Day in that character, until, by the edicts of Emperors and the decrees of Councils, the First Day was made gradually to supersede it; 6th. That, finally, the Seventh Day of the Week, and not the First, ought now to be observed as the Sabbath of the Lord our God.

Notices of people holding these sentiments are frequent in the history of the first six centuries of the Christian Church; and even during that dark period which intervened between the establishment of Papal dominion and the dawning of the Reformation, occasional traces of them appear. In the seventh century, while Pope Gregory I. was in authority, the subject of the Sabbath was much discussed; and among the disputants there was a class of persons who declared, "that it was not lawful to do any manner of work on the Saturday, or the old Sabbath." In the eleventh century, while Gregory VII. occupied the papal chair, the same doctrine was preached. In the twelfth century, also, there was a large and influential community of Christians in Lombardy who kept the Seventh Day as the Sabbath.

The Reformation seems to have introduced a new era in the history of Sabbath-keepers. In Germany, in the early part of the sixteenth century, Baptists who kept the Seventh Day were quite common. In England, they made their appearance in the beginning of the seventeenth century, although, in cousequence of the unsettled state of the country, they did not begin to organize churches until about 1650. Within fifty years of that period, however, there were eleven Sabbatarian Churches in England, besides many scattered Sabbath-keepers in different parts of the kingdom. These Churches were located at the following places:—Braintree, in Essex; Salisbury, in Wiltshire; Sherbourne, in Buckinghamshire; Tewkesbury, or Natton, in Gloucester; Wallingford, in Berkshire; Woodbridge, in Suffolk; and three in London, viz. the Mill-Yard Church, the Cripplegate Church, and the Prinner's Hall Church. Eight of the eleven have now become extinct. Of the three which remain, two are in London, and one is at Natton, near Tewkesbury. The Sabbatarians of England enjoyed the ministrations of some of the most distinguished Dissenters of their time—among whom mention should be made of Francis Bampfield, the founder of the Cripplegate Church in London; Edward Stennett, the ancestor of the famous Stennett family; Joseph Stennett, the author of that unanswerable reply to Russen's "Fundamentals without a Foundation, or a true picture of the Anabaptists;" Joseph Stennett, D. D., and Samuel Stennett, D. D., of the Little Wild Street Baptist Church, London.

In America, Seventh-day Baptists made their appearance in the latter part of the seventeenth century. Their first church was organized at Newport, R. I., in 1671, "while as yet there were but six societies of Regular Baptists on the Western Continent." For several years this church included in its membership nearly all observers of the Seventh-day Sabbath residing in the States of Rhode Island and Connecticut; and for the accommodation of the widely-scattered members, the pastors were accustomed to hold stated meetings at several distant places. A church was organized at Hopkinton, R. I., in 1708, and one at Waterford, Ct., in 1784. There are now eight churches in Rhode Island and two in Connecticut.

In New Jersey, the first Seventh-day Baptist Church was organized at Piscataway, about thirty miles from New York City, in 1705. From this Church sprang one at Shiloh, N. J., about forty miles south-west of Philadelphia, which was organized in 1737. At present there are four Seventh-day Baptist Churches in New Jersey, located at Piscataway, in Middlesex Co., Plainfield, in Essex Co., Shiloh, in Cumberland Co., and Marlboro, in Salem Co.

In the State of New York there are thirty-six Seventh-day Baptist Churches; the following sketch of which is arranged according to their geographical position. A church was organized at Berlin, Rensselaer Co., about twenty-five miles from Albany, in 1780, which has gradually increased in numbers, and has established a branch at Stephentown. It has also led to the formation of a church several miles north, in the town of Petersburg. From this neighborhood, several families removed to Adams, Jefferson Co., and organized a church; from which another has sprung up in the adjoining town of Hounsfield. A church was organized at Brookfield, Madison Co., in 1797. As it increased in numbers, and gradually extended over a larger territory, two other churches were formed in the same town. Grouped around these churches, in Central New York, are the churches at Newport, in Herkimer Co., at Richland, in Oswego Co., at Verona, in Oneida Co., at Preston, Otselic, and Lincklaen, in Chenango Co., at DeRuyter, in Madison Co., and at Truxton and Scott, in Cortland Co. Proceeding westward, there will be found eleven churches in Allegany Co., two in Erie Co., one in Niaraga Co., and one in Cattaraugus Co.

Other churches there are, many of them of recent origin, scattered over the South and West. There are four in Pennsylvania, four in Virginia, five in Ohio, five in Wisconsin, one in Illinois, one in Indiana, and one in Iowa. Besides these, there are numerous small societies of Sabbath-keepers, who are accustomed to meet weekly for prayer and conference, but who have not yet been organized into regular churches.

A YEARLY MEETING of the Seventh-day Baptists in America, was established at a very early period, and from it originated the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference—a body which held its meetings annually from 1805 to 1846, when it was agreed that the meeting should henceforth be held triennially. The last meeting of the Conference was held at Plainfield, N. J., commencing September 9, 1852.

The Seventh-day Baptist Denomination was divided into ASSOCIATIONS in 1835. There are now six Associations, each holding an annual meeting. The Eastern Association embraces the churches in Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, and that part of New York lying east of the Hudson river; its next meeting will be held at Piscataway, N. J., commencing on the fifth day of the week before the last Sabbath in May, 1853. The Central Association embraces those churches in New York lying between the Hudson river and the small lakes; its next meeting will be held at Scott, Cortland Co., N. Y., commencing on Fifth-day before the second Sabbath in June, 1853. The Western Association includes the churches in Western New York and Pennsylvania; its next meeting will be held at Independence, Allegany Co., N. Y., commencing on Fifth-day preceding the fourth Sabbath in June, 1853. The South-Western Association embraces the churches in Virginia, and met Sept. 2, 1852, at Lost Creek, Harrison Co., Va. The Ohio Association includes all the churches in Ohio, and meets at Jackson, Shelby Co., O., Oct. 7, 1852. The North-Western Association is composed of the churches in Illinois and Wisconsin, and meets at Albion, Dane Co., Wisconsin, Sept. 29, 1852.

The Seventh-day Baptists, as a denomination, have always been forward to engage in the BENEVOLENT ENTERPRISES of the day. They have repeatedly taken action, in their ecclesiastical bodies, against slavery, and in favor of temperance and other moral reforms. They have also had among them for a long time Societies for missionary purposes, and to promote the circulation of religious tracts and books.

THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY was organized in 1842; its object being to disseminate the Gospel at home and abroad. In carrying out this object, it has employed men from time to time to labor with the feeble churches in this country, and to preach to the destitute wherever an opportunity should offer. It has also sent two missionaries with their wives to preach Christ among the heathen. They are stationed at Shanghae, China, where they have built a chapel and a dwelling-house, and organized a church.

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY was organized in 1843. Its object is "to promote the scriptural observance of the Sabbath, in connection with the interests of vital godliness and sound morality, by the circulation of religious tracts, and the employment of colporteurs and lecturers." It has now a series of fifteen stereotyped tracts, of which editions are published according to the means and demands of the Society. Besides these, it has several publications not connected with the series, but all relating to the subject of the Sabbath. Its Depository is kept at No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST PUBLISHING SOCIETY was organized in 1849, for the purpose of giving permanence to the periodical publications of the denomination. It now issues a weekly paper called The Sabbath Recorder, a monthly called The Sabbath-School Visitor, and a quarterly magazine of history, biography, and statistics, called The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial. The office of the Society is at No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

The Seventh-day Baptists have two LITERARY INSTITUTIONS, designed to furnish the means of securing a thorough education. One of them, called the DeRuyter Institute, is located at DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y., and was founded in 1837, at an expense of between twenty and thirty thousand dollars. The other is located at Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y., and called the Alfred Academy and Teachers' Seminary. They have also several smaller academies, one of which is located at Shiloh, Cumberland Co., N. J., and another at Milton, Rock Co., Wisconsin. G. B. U.

THE LIFE OF THE BLESSED.

BY WM. C. BRYANT.

(From the Spanish of Louis Ponce de Leon.)

Religion of life and light!
  Land of the good, whose earthly toils are o'er,
Nor frost nor heat may blight
  Thy vernal beauty; fertile shore,
  Yielding the blessed fruits for evermore.

There, without crook or sling,
  Walks the good Shepherd; blossoms white and red
Round his meek temple cling,
  And to sweet pastures led,
  His own loved flock beneath his eyes are fed.

He guides, and near him they
  Follow delighted; for he makes them go
Where dwells eternal May,
  And heavenly roses blow,
  Deathless, and gathered but again to grow.

He leads them to the height
  Named of the infinite and long-sought good,
And fountains of delight;
  And where his feet have stood,
  Springs up, along the way, their tender food.

And when, in the mid skies,
  The climbing sun has reached its highest bound,
Reposing as he lies,
  With all his flock around,
  He witches the still air with undulated sounds.

From his sweet lute grow forth
  Immortal harmonies of power to still
All passions born of earth,
  And draw the ardent will
  Its destiny of goodness to fulfill.

Might but a little part,
  A wandering breath of that high melody,
Descend into my heart,
  And change it still to be Transformed and swallowed up, O love, in thee.

Ah, then my soul would know,
  Beloved, where thou liest at noon of day,
And, from this place of woe
  Released, should take its way
  To mingle with thy flock, and never stray.

A DEVOUT MINISTRY.

A logical discipline of the intellect, profound scholarship, and general intelligence, are important. A knowledge of profane and ecclesiastical history and extensive as well as thorough theological attainments, are important. Elegant manners, a good address and general tact, are important. But one thing is more important than any one of these qualifications, or than all of them put together; it is a devout heart. A devout heart, indeed, does not of itself constitute fitness for the ministry of reconciliation, in the absence of other essential qualifications. Yet it is the condition of complete biblical scholarship. When other necessary attainments are not wanting, it discovers, and places the student of the Scriptures in possession, not only theoretically, but really, of the true principle of biblical interpretation. "In thy light shall we see light." A devout heart becomes thus a necessary condition of success and joy in the great work of turning "many to righteousness." Knowledge is, indeed, called power; and such it is; but knowledge, apart from Christ, who alone is "the resurrection and the life," is not able to break the fetters of spiritual death. Eloquence may agitate the minds of men until they cast forth mire and dirt, but it can as little purify them as can the sound of the cymbal. Good conversational powers, polite manners, and general sociability, may win the affections of the people and secure for a minister of the Gospel a certain sort of popularity, but these accomplishments cannot turn a soul from sin or the world to Christ. A devout heart holds all natural abilities, all scientific and theological attainments, all external accomplishments, in conscious connection with the human-divine life of our blessed Lord. Held in this relation, every faculty and acquisition contributes to the extension and honor of the church. Engrafted into him by a living faith, the sap of Christ's life circulates through all the branches of a man's being, and, although they expand on earth where the climate of sin hinders their growth and mars their beauty, yet it clothes them with the evergreen foliage and blushing fruit of the heavenly Canaan. WEBSTER ON CHRISTIANITY.

A few evenings since, sitting by his own fireside, after a day of severe labor in the Supreme Court, Mr. Webster introduced the last Sunday's sermon, and discoursed in animated and glowing eloquence for an hour on the great truths of the Gospel. I cannot but regard the opinions of such a man, in some sense, as public property. This is my apology for attempting to recall some of those remarks which were uttered in the privacy of the domestic circle.

Said Mr. Webster: "Last Sunday I listened to an able and learned discourse upon the evidences of Christianity. The arguments were drawn from prophecy, and history, with internal evidence. They were stated with logical accuracy and force; but, as it seemed to me, the clergyman failed to draw from them the right conclusion. He came so near the truth that I was astonished that he missed it. In summing up his arguments, he said the only alternative presented by these evidences is this: Either Christianity is true, or it is a delusion produced by an excited imagination. Such is not the alternative, said the critic; but it is this: The Gospel is either true history, or it is a consummate fraud; it is either a reality, or an imposition. Christ was what he professed to be, or he was an impostor. There is no other alternative. His spotless life, in his earnest enforcement of the truth, his suffering in its defense, forbids us to suppose that he was following an illusion of a heated brain.

"Every act of his pure and holy life shows that he was the author of truth, the advocate of truth, the earnest defender of truth, and the uncomplaining sufferer for truth. Now, considering the purity of his doctrines, the simplicity of his life, and the sublimity of his death, is it possible that he would have died for an illusion? In all his preaching, the Saviour made no popular appeals. His discourses were all directed to the individual. Christ and his Apostles sought to impress upon every man the conviction that he must stand or fall alone—he must live for himself and die for himself, and give up his account to the omniscient God, as though he were the only dependent creature in the Universe. The Gospel leaves the individual sinner alone with himself and his God. To his own master he stands or falls. He has nothing to hope from the aid and sympathy of associates. The deluded advocates of new doctrines do not so preach. Christ and his Apostles, had they been deceivers, would not have so preached.

"If clergymen in our day would return to the simplicity of the Gospel, and preach more to individuals and less to the crowd, there would not be so much complaint of the decline of true religion. Many of the ministers of the present day take their text from St. Paul, and preach from the newspapers. When they do so, I prefer to enjoy my own thoughts rather than to listen. I want my pastor to come to me in the spirit of the Gospel, saying, 'You are mortal; your probation is brief; your work must be done speedily. You are immortal too. You are hastening to the bar of God; the Judge standeth before the door.' When I am thus admonished, I have no disposition to muse or to sleep. These topics," said Mr. Webster, "have often occupied my thoughts; and if I had time, I would write upon them myself."

The above remarks are but a meagre and imperfect abstract, from memory, of one of the most eloquent sermons to which I ever listened. [Congregational Journal.

ISAIAH'S SATIRE ON IDOLATRY.

A few years ago, a young African addressed Mr. Johnson, a missionary, in language like this:—

"Massa, them words you talk last night strike very much. When you preach you read the 15th and the 16th verses of the 44th chapter of Isaiah, and explain them; you show me how our country people stand. Me say, Ah! who tell massa all this? He never been in my country. You say, Do not your country people live in that fashion? I say, yes, that true; God knows all things; he put them things in the Bible. Massa, I so sure that the Bible is God's Word, for man cannot put the things in there, because he no see it. That time I live with a man that make greegree. He take me in the bush, and teach me to make greegree too. He show me a tree; he say that greegree; he take country axe, and cut some of that tree; he make a god; and he take the leaves, and that which was left, and give me to carry home. When he come home he made a fire, and all the people come and sit round the fire. Then they cool and eat. When they done eat, the man take the leaves of the greegree tree and burn them in the fire, and then all the people stand around the fire, and clap their hands and cry, Aha! Aha! Massa, when you read this verse (44:16) I can't tell you what I feel. You then begin to talk about the text—verse 20—'he feedeth on ashes,' and I was struck again; for when they done cry Aha! Aha! they take the ashes and make medicine, they give to the people when they be sick. You been see some greegree which look like dirt, that is the the same ashes; they carry that round them neck, and they eat it sometimes. You see, massa, our countrymen feed upon ashes. For true the Bible God's Word." [Lon. Mag.

THE FIRST BABY.

My old school fellow, Mary Thornly, had been married nearly two years, when I made my first call on her in her capacity of mother.

"Did you ever see such a darling," she exclaimed, tossing the infant up and down in her arms. "There, baby, that's ma's old friend, Jane. He knows you already, I declare," said the delighted parent, as it smiled at a bright ring which I held up to it. "You never saw such a quick child. Notice what pretty little feet he has, the darling footsy-tootsies," and taking both feet in one hand, the mother fondly kissed them.

"It certainly is very pretty," said I, trying to be polite, though I could not perceive that the infant was more beautiful than a dozen others I had seen. "It has your eyes exactly, Mary."

"Yes, and da-da's mouth and chin," said my friend, apostrophising the child; "hasn't it, precious?" And she almost smothered it with kisses.

As I walked slowly homeward, I said to myself, "I wonder if, when I marry, I shall ever be so foolish. Mary used to be a sensible girl." In a fortnight afterwards, I called on my friend again.

"How baby grows," she said; "don't you see it? I never knew a child to grow so fast. Grandma says it's the healthiest child she ever knew."

To me it seemed that the baby had not grown an inch; and to avoid the contradiction, I changed the theme. But, in a moment, the doting mother was back to her infant again.

"I do believe it's beginning to cut its teeth," she said, putting her finger into the little one's mouth. "Just feel how hard the gums are there. Surely that's a tooth coming through. Grandmother will be here to-day, and I'll ask her if it isn't so."

I laughed, as I replied: "I am entirely ignorant of such matters, but your child really seems a very fine one."

"Oh, yes; every body says that. Pretty, pretty dear!" And she tossed it up and down, until I thought the child would have been shaken to pieces; but the little creature seemed to like the process very much. "Is it crowing at its mother? It's laughing, is it? Tinny ninny little dear. What a sweet precious it is!" And she finished by almost devouring it with kisses.

When I next called, baby was still further advanced.

"Only think," said my friend, when I had made my way to the nursery, where she now kept herself from morning till night, "baby begins to eat. I gave it a piece of meat to-day—a bit of real broiled beef-steak."

"What!" said I, in my ignorance, for this did look wonderfully; "the child eating beef-steak already?"

"Oh!" laughed my friend, seeing my mistake, "what a dunce you are, Jane! But wait until you have babies of your own. She says you eat beef-steak, darlin'," added the proud mother, addressing the infant, "when you only suck the juice. You don't want to choke yourself, do you, baby? Eat a beef-steak! It's funny, baby, isn't it?" And again she laughed—laughing all the more, because the child, sympathetically, crowed in return.

It was not many weeks before the long expected teeth appeared.

"Jane, Jane, baby has got three teeth!" triumphantly cried the mother, as I entered the nursery. "Three teeth, and he's only nine months old! Did you ever hear the like?"

I confessed that I had not. The whole thing, in fact, was out of my range of knowledge. I knew all about Dante, in the original, and a dozen other fine lady accomplishments, but nothing about babies teething.

"Just look at the little pearls!" exclaimed my friend, as she opened the child's mouth. "Are they not beautiful? You never saw any thing so pretty—confess that you never did. Precious darling," continued the mother, rapturously hugging and kissing the child, "it is worth its weight in gold."

But the crowning miracle of all was when "baby" began to walk. Its learning to creep had been duly heralded to me. So also had its being able to stand alone, though this meant, I found, standing with the support of a chair. But when it really walked alone, the important fact was announced to me in a note, for my friend could not wait till I called.

"Stand there," she said to me in an exulting voice. "No, stoop, I mean; how can you be so stupid?" And, as I obeyed, she took her station about a yard off, holding the little one by either arm. "Now, see him," she cried, as he toddled towards me, and finally succeeded in gaining my arms, though once or twice I fancied he would fall, a contingency from which he was protected, however, by his mother holding her hands on either side of him, an inch or two off. "There, did you ever see any thing so extraordinary? He's [illegible] a year old, either."

By this time I began to be considerably interested in "baby" myself. He had learned to know me, and would begin to crow whenever I entered the nursery; and I was, therefore, almost as delighted as my friend, when for the first time he pronounced my name.

"Djane," he said, "Djane!"

His mother almost devoured him with kisses in return for this wonderful triumph of the vocal organs; and when she had finished, I, in turn, smothered him with caresses.

I never, after that, smiled, even to myself, at the extravagance of my friend's affection for her baby! The little love had twined himself around my own heart-strings. How could I?

And now that I am a mother myself, I feel less inclination to laugh, as others may do, over that mystery of mysteries, a mother's love for her baby.

DAVIES' RECOVERY FROM SICKNESS.

The following is the closing part of a letter, written by this eminent and godly man, on recovering from a dangerous illness:—

"Formerly I have wished to live longer, that I might be better prepared for heaven; but this consideration had but very little weight with me, and that for a very unusual season, which was this: After long trial, I found this world is a place so unfriendly to the growth of every thing divine and heavenly, that I was afraid if I should live longer, I should be no better fitted for heaven than I now am. Indeed, I have hardly any hopes of ever making any great attainments in holiness while in this world, though I should be doomed to stay in it as long as Methuselah. I see other Christians around me making some progress; but when I consider that I set out about twelve years ago, and what sanguine hopes I then had of my future progress, and yet that I have been almost at a stand ever since, I am quite discouraged. O, my good and gracious Master, if I may dare to call thee so, I am afraid I shall never serve thee much better on this side of the region of perfection. The thought grieves me, it breaks my heart, but I can hardly hope better. But if I have the least spark of true piety in my breast, I shall not always labor under this complaint. No, my Lord, I shall yet serve thee—serve thee through an immortal duration—with the activity, the fervor, the perfection of the seraph that adores and burns. I very much doubt this desponding view of matters, and think it wrong, and I do not mention it with approbation, but only relate it as an unusual reason for my willingness to die, which I never felt before, and which I could not suppress. In my sickness I found the unspeakable importance of a Mediator, in a religion for sinners. O, I could have given you the word of a dying man for it, that Jesus, whom you preach, is indeed a necessary and an all-sufficient Saviour. Indeed, he is the only support for a departing soul. None but Christ! None but Christ! Had I as many good works as Abraham or Paul, I would not have dared to build my hope upon such a quicksand, but only on this firm eternal rock.

I am rising up, my brother, with a desire to recommend him better to my fellow-sinners than I have done; but alas! I hardly hope to accomplish it. He has done a great deal more by me already than ever I expected, and infinitely more than I deserved. But he never intended me for great things. He has beings both of my own and of superior orders, that can perform him more worthy service. O, if I might but untie the latchet of his shoes, or draw water for the service of his sanctuary, it is enough for me. My strength fails me, I must give over."

LAST WORDS.—A pious negro woman expressed herself in her last illness in the following original declaration:—"My house is now building in Paradise. As soon as it is finished I shall be called to inhabit it. I am ready; I have peace with all creatures, even with the ants." She meant that she did not fear corruption in the grave, nor that her body should be food for the worms. Perhaps she remembered the words of Job: "Though, after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh I shall see God."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, September 16, 1852.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.

Our anniversary season, this year, brought together a larger concourse of people than we have known to be assembled on any former occasion. The accommodating spirit of the New York and Erie Railroad Company induced the attendance of a large number from the churches located along its line, and there was also a goodly representation from the churches in other directions. The Central Railroad of New Jersey, issued excursion tickets also, giving all an opportunity to make the trip from New York to Plainfield, and return, for one fare. At Plainfield, the hospitalities of the people, so cheerfully and munificently bestowed, rendered our sojourn there, for the time, all that could be desired. We will add, that the meetings were characterized by great harmony, and we trust that God was with us. We heard quite a number say, that they thought it the best anniversary they had ever attended.

What particularly gratifies us is, that our Missionary, Publishing, and Tract Societies, appear to be working more and more into the affections of our people. The time was, (and it is not many years since) when we could scarcely induce a dozen persons, besides the delegates, to afford us their presence, or to show that they took any interest in the business done. Sometimes, on going to the places where they were appointed to be held, we found the meeting-house unopened, the people all away at their accustomed work, and seeming to be ignorant that any such meetings were about being held. Now we find the meeting-houses in readiness, the seats filled to overflowing, nay, a perfect eagerness on the part of the people to know what our benevolent enterprises are accomplishing. Indeed, they have come to understand, that the Annual Reports of our several Societies, and the Addresses by which they are followed, are quite as interesting as sermons, if not more so; and we learn that they look forward to them with the most pleasing anticipations.

Next year, it is determined to hold our celebration with the church at Adams, in the northern part of this State; a beautiful locality, and very easy of access by the Rome and Watertown Railroad. We hope that we shall see no diminution of interest on that occasion. The brethren of that vicinity, we know, will receive us with warm hospitality, and we trust that there will be a spiritual preparation for the event, not only by the church there, but by all those who shall go up to enjoy the holy festival. God grant that it may be a glorious occasion. T. B. B.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE.

The session of the General Conference opened on Fifth-day, Sept. 9, at 11 o'clock A. M., with a discourse by Eld. N. V. Hull, from 2 Timothy 2: 15—"Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." The object of the discourse was to show the importance, to the church and the world, of a truly learned and pious ministry, and the special interest which the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination have in such a ministry. The introduction was taken up with a statement of the range of ministerial influence and duty, which was represented as very wide—not limited to the teaching of catechisms and public discoursing upon religion, but including sympathy with men, and efforts to benefit them, in all the relations and interests of life. The first point presented was the power and glory of knowledge; and in considering it, the ignorant and the educated man were contrasted in such a way as to make every hearer feel the weakness of the one and the strength of the other. The second point was the position of the ministry, and its relation to the world; under which head the varied and weighty responsibilites of the ministry were brought vividly to view. The third and last point considered was the position of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination, as requiring special fitness for their work on the part of the ministry.

At the conclusion of the discourse, the Conference was called to order by the Moderator of the last session, a Committee to nominate officers was appointed, and a recess of one hour was taken.

On the opening of the afternoon session, the Committee nominated, and the Conference appointed, James Bailey, Moderator; and and H. H. Baker, J. M. Allen, and A. C. Burdick, Clerks.

Letters from the Churches were then read, among which were the following:—

1st, 2d, and 3d Hopkinton, Pawcatuck, Westerly, and South Kingston, in Rhode Island; Waterford and Greenmanville, in Connecticut; Shiloh, Marlboro, Piscataway, and Plainfield, in New Jersey; Berlin, Petersburg, 1st and 2d Brookfield, 1st Verona, Adams, 1st and 2d Alfred, and the Independent Church at Adams, in New York.

The Corresponding Secretary presented a report of correspondence during three years, and also a table of statistics, showing, as near as it is possible now to show, the officers, post-office address, number of members, and time when constituted, of all the Seventh-day Baptist Churches in the United States. This table will be found on our first page to-day.

The usual standing Committees were then appointed; after which it was proposed to appoint a Committee to revise the denominational "Expose," for publication in the minutes of the present session of the Conference—a proposition which led to a lengthy discussion, in which J. H. Cochran, T. E. Babcock, L. Crandall, S. S. Griswold, J. Summerbell, and others, took part. In the course of remark, the propriety of having any other standard of denominational views than the Bible was challenged, and the arguments for and against such standards were brought to view by the several speakers. The subject was not disposed of when the hour of adjournment arrived.

The evening was occupied with a discourse by Eld. S. S. Griswold.

On the morning of Sixth-day, Conference assembled at 9 o'clock. The subject under discussion at the time of adjournment was taken up, and disposed of by the appointment of a Committee to consider and report upon the propriety of publishing the "Expose," and to suggest such alterations as they may deem proper in case of its publication.

The Business Committee presented a report, embodying several resolutions for the consideration of the Conference.

A resolution was adopted, after remarks by several speakers, "that the General Conference appoint a committee, whose duty it shall be to collect all of the documents of the conference, and submit them to the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society, to aid them in their important and interesting labors; and especially that through this chanel we may secure a reliable history of the rise, progress and object of Conference." L. Crandall, T. B. Stillman, and W. B. Gillett, were appointed the Committee.

The following was adopted, after remarks by L. Crandall, W. B. Maxson, and others:—

2. That whereas there are several Churches, in various parts of the denomination, that have withheld connection with any of the Associations, it is thought by this Conference that, upon the whole, it would be promotive of the interests of religion for them to reconsider this matter, and connect themselves with the Associations within the bounds of which they are respectively located.

A resolution in relation to the manner of observing the Sabbath, was discussed by several persons, and finally adopted in the following form:

Resolved, That it is the duty of Seventh-day Baptists to do all in their power to impress the public mind with the sinfulness of violating God's holy Sabbath; and that this Conference would re-affirm the following resolution, adopted at its session in 1849:

> Resolved, That this Conference would urge upon all Sabbath-keepers the importance of a strict observance of the Sabbath, by abstaining from all unnecessary domestic labors and social visiting, and by devoting the hours of the Sabbath to the consideration of moral and religious subjects; and, especially, that they keep aloof from all connections or copartnerships which are likely to interfere with the faithful discharge of the duties of the Sabbath, or to weaken the influence of their testimony in its favor.

A resolution of the Committee on the subject of Slavery and the Fugitive Slave Law led to a long and warm discussion on the sinfulness of slavery and the duty of Christians to obey such a law as that for the arrest of fugitives, which occupied the remainder of the forenoon, and a part of the afternoon. The following is the form in which the resolution was finally adopted:—

Resolved, That we re-affirm our abhorrence of the system of American slavery; and that we deprecate the passage and enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Law, as hostile to the rights of humanity, and in conflict with the law of God and the benevolent spirit of the Gospel.

The following resolutions, presented by the Business Committee, were also adopted:—

Resolved, That as a Christian body we are deeply interested in favor of the success of the efforts now being made in the several States of this Republic to suppress the traffic in spirituous liquors by prohibitory legislation.

Resolved, That the efforts of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society have our warmest sympathies, and that we command its objects to the fervent prayers and liberal contributions of the denomination.

Resolved, That this Conference regards with deep interest the developments in the providence of God which lead us to hope that the set time to favor ancient Israel is at hand, and that we recommend Palestine as a missionary field to the consideration of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society.

[The consideration of the forgoing resolutions occupied the whole afternoon of Sixth-day. As the Conference had not quite completed its business when the hour of adjournment arrived, a brief session was held on the morning of Second-day; but we have no minutes of that meeting before us, and must close this hasty sketch by saying that the Conference adjourned to meet at Brookfield, N. Y., in October, 1855.]

Report on the State of Religion.

The Committee to whom was referred for consideration the state of religion in the churches, submit the following report as the result of their deliberations:

So far as we can learn from the letters of the churches, and the published minutes of the several Associations for the three years which have passed since the last session of the General Conference, the churches have been generally tranquil, and a pleasant union has been enjoyed among them. There are, however, a few painful exceptions to this desirable state of religious feeling. Some few of our churches have been passing through trying afflictions, from which, we trust, in due time, they will be delivered, and that the trial of their faith will result in their spiritual purification, and advancement in true holiness. The spirit of piety and dependence upon God, expressed in their communications to the Conference, give us reason to hope that the glory of God, and the true prosperity of his people, will happily result from these afflictions.

There appears to be a numerical decrease in many of our churches; occasioned principally, we think, by the revision of their several lists of members, in which many have been omitted, as being but nominally connected with them. We believe that, notwithstanding this apparent decrease, there has been an actual increase in the living and spiritual members of the body.

Revivals have been enjoyed by many of the churches, to some happy extent, in which the churches thus favored have received encouraging accessions.

Attendance on the means of grace and Sabbath meetings, appears to be general, and meetings for prayer and Christian Conference appear to be on the increase in the churches generally.

Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes are encouragingly increasing among us, and we hope the time is not distant when these auxiliaries of the Christian ministry will be established in every church and congregation of the denomination, and the juvenile portion of our families universally enjoy the advantages they afford.

We are happy in the persuasion that there is a growing interest felt by the churches generally in our missionary operations, and that our brethren are not weary in the work of contributing for their support. There appears to be an increasing willingness among our churches generally to increase their efforts to give the gospel to the destitute and perishing heathen.

Family devotions are, notwithstanding all these encouraging indications, we fear, by far too much neglected among us. We are aware that we must be pious and devotional at our homes, and in our own houses, if we would exert our best influence upon our families, and carry our religion into the various avocations of life, and faithfully let our light shine before the world. We trust that this very important department of our religious duty will receive increasing attention by all who occupy the responsible position of a head of a family.

In conclusion, we will say, that although we have many encouraging things among us, calculated to awaken and increase our gratitude to God for his abundant mercy, and to encourage his people to press forward in every good work, yet there is too little spirituality and too much apathy in divine things among us. We believe we are not the people we should be, and which our responsibility demands of us. On this account, we have reason to be deeply humbled, and to put our hands more efficiently to the work assigned us by our Divine Master.

On the evening following Sixth-day a discourse was preached by Eld. Joshua Clarke. On Sabbath morning, Eld. Wm. B. Maxson preached, and the discourse was followed by the celebration of the Lord's Supper. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon, a discourse was listened to from Eld. Charles M. Lewis, and in the evening one from Eld. Thomas E. Babcock. Of some of these discourses we hope to obtain sketches hereafter.

THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society held its Tenth Anniversary on Sunday, the 12th inst. A crowded house indicated the intense interest felt in its proceedings. Elder James Bailey, of Genesee, N. Y., delivered the opening discourse, from John 15: 8—"Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples." It was a discourse worthy of the occasion, and we should be glad to give our readers a synopsis of it; but we took no notes, and our memory is not sufficiently retentive. The chief point of it was, to illustrate the fruit-bearing nature of the Christian system, as displayed in the missionary enterprise. But on account of the little time intervening between the adjournment and the putting of our paper to press, we are obliged to defer a more full account till next week. We simply give the programm, and the resolutions adopted, which were as follows. T. B. B.

Programm.

1. Hymn.
2. Prayer.
3. Treasurer's Report.
4. Annual Report of the Board.
5. Address, by Eld. W. B. Maxson, of Brookfield, N. Y.
6. Hymn.
7. Address, by Eld. A. B. Burdick, of Westerly, R. I.
8. Address, by Eld. H. H. Baker, of Waterford, Conn.
9. Address, by Eld. N. V. Hull, of Alfred, N. Y.
10. Hymn.
11. Benediction.

The Resolutions.

1. Resolved, That in view of the preserving care exercised over the missionaries of this Society, and the success which has attended their labors, we are called upon by the God of missions to be grateful for his continued smiles, to acknowledge our dependence upon his grace, and to consecrate ourselves, our property, and influence, more entirely to his service.

2. Resolved, That we are more than ever impressed with the importance of this Society, humble though it be in the sight of men in its origin and history, and with the necessity of its continuance and enlargement; and that we consider ourselves embarked in a permanent enterprise for the promotion of the missionary cause.

3. Resolved, That this Society, in the prosecution of its work, aims to give a perishing world a knowledge of the way of salvation by the blood of Christ; that, in strict keeping with this object, it aims to magnify the Divine Law, as an unalterable standard of morals, an everlasting rule of equity and righteousness, of which not a jot or tittle can fail, and to which he that believes in Jesus is bound, by every consideration of love, justice and gratitude, to conform his conduct.

4. Resolved, That the law of the Sabbath, as recorded in the Decalogue, is an unrepealed statute of God our Creator, designed as a standing testimony against Atheism and Heathen Idolatry; and that in preaching the gospel to the heathen, it is necessary to a full and complete exhibition of the duties which it enjoins, to urge upon them the observance of this institution, that they may be the more deeply impressed with the fact, that the God whom the Gospel calls them to acknowledge and worship, is that Being who created all things by the word of his power.

5. Resolved, That while the conversion of the world is an enterprise which demands a far greater outlay of property, and a much stronger reinforcement of laborers, than has ever yet been witnessed, yet no amount of pecuniary resources, and no array of numbers, learning, talents or influence, can be of the least value, without a spirit of humble reliance on God, fixed and unwavering adherence to Christian principles, and an intelligent application of these principles to all the duties, relations, and responsibilities of human life.

6. Resolved, That this Society, in the prosecution of its labors among the heathen, will aim to put in circulation such translations of the Sacred Scriptures as will most faithfully and unequivocally express the sense of the inspired originals.

7. Resolved, That while this Society aims at giving a reasonable prominence to our denominational peculiarities, believing them to constitute an important part of that faith once delivered to the saints, for which we are required to contend earnestly, it nevertheless cherishes a sincere and ardent admiration for those self-denying missionaries of other persuasions, who have labored, and are continuing to labor, for the salvation of the heathen, and bids them God-speed in their work of faith, and patience of hope, and labor of love.

THE PUBLISHING SOCIETY.

The Third Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society was held on Second-day forenoon, Sept. 13, commencing at 9 o'clock.

After singing and prayer, and the appointment of a committee to nominate officers, the Annual Report of the Treasurer was read, showing that $3568 03 were received during the last financial year, and that there was a balance of $177 07 against the treasury at its close, on the 9th day of June, 1852.

The Annual Report of the Board was then read. It gave a concise statement of the year's operations, and of the condition and prospects of the Society's publications. The Report also set forth a plan entertained by the Board to secure in some accessible part of the city of New York a building for the use of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination, in which the business of our Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies, may be transacted, provided with a room for meetings of the Boards of those Societies, and a reading-room for a Sabbatic Library.

A motion that the Report be adopted, and published under the direction of the Board, was sustained by Wm. C. Kenyon and N. V. Hull in addresses of much interest, of which we hope to give a full report hereafter.

Thomas E. Babcock then offered the following resolution, which was adopted, after an address from him upon the subject:—

> Resolved, That the Board of Managers be encouraged to commence, as early as practicable, the publication of Religious Books, with a view to supply the wants of our Sabbath-Schools and Families.

The following resolution was presented and advocated by James Bailey, and adopted:—

> Resolved, That the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society commends itself to the patronage of the denomination as a medium of usefulness second only to the ministry of the Gospel.
